By this treaty we expressly agreed with Great Britain to maintain with her the neutrality of the canal and for absolute equality of treatment touching its use. Up to this point American opinion seems to have been without division as to these matters. Nowhere is any thought or suggestion either of a desire to exercise exclusive political control over the canal or to claim any preference as to tolls or otherwise in its use. Difficulties grew out of the treaty early after its enactment. We insisted on a construction under it as to Great Britain's claim to the Mosquito country that she was reluctant to concede. I need not recite these matters. Our contentions were finally agreed to and England relinquished the claims she had asserted. But as the years rolled on we became more and more impressed with the political importance of the canal. Its vital relation to the maintenance of the integrity of the United States began to be seen. The limitation on the Monroe doctrine that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty imposed was irksome. The need for British capital to aid in the construction of a canal was no longer felt.

NEW NOTE TOUCHING CANAL POLICY.

A new note is heard in the statement of public men touching the canal.

President Hayes in his message to Congress on March 8, 1880, said:

The policy of this country is a canal under American control. The United States can not consent to the surrender of this control to any European power, or to any combination of European powers. If existing treaties between the United States and other nations, or if the rights of sovereignty or property of other nations stand in the way of this policy—a contingency which is not apprehended—suitable steps should be taken by just and liberal negotiations to promote and establish the American policy on this subject consistently with the rights of the nations to be affected by it. * * *

An interoceanic canal across the American Isthmus will essentially change the geographical relations between the Atlantic and Pacific coasts of the United States, and between the United States and the rest of the world. It will be the great ocean thoroughfare between our Atlantic and our Pacific shores and virtually a part of the coast line of the United States. Our merely commercial interest in it is greater than that of all other countries, while its relations to our power and prosperity as a Nation, to our means of defense, our unity, peace, and safety are matters of paramount concern to the people of the United States. No other great power would, under similar circumstances, fail to assert a rightful control over a work so closely and vitally affecting its interest and welfare.

It will be noted in passing that while emphasis is laid on the political phase of the canal, no word is uttered intimating a desire to change our position touching equality of treatment in its use commercially.

SECRETARY BLAINE'S STATEMENT OF POLICY.

In November, 1881, Mr. Blaine, in a note to our minister to England, Mr. Lowell, clearly points out the objections then existing to the Clayton-Bulwer treaty and what the United States desired touching a modification of that treaty. It is so important as indicating the then and now position of America that I ask your careful consideration of it. The imprint of it is found in nearly every line and word of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. I quote from Moore's Digest International Law:

Referring to his instruction of June 24, 1881, Mr. Blaine addressed to Mr. Lowell, November 19, 1881, a further instruction specifically relating to the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, a treaty made, said Mr. Blaine, "more than 30 years ago, under exceptional and extraordinary conditions, which have long since ceased to exist, conditions which at best were temporary in their nature and which can never be reproduced."

WHAT WE OBJECTED TO.

Mr. Blaine objected to the "perpetuity" of the treaty on the ground (1) that it bound the United States "not to use its military force in any precautionary measure," while it left "the naval power of Great Britain perfectly free and unrestrained, ready at any moment of need to seize both ends of the canal and render its military occupation on land a matter entirely within the discretion of Her Majesty's Government"; (2) that it embodied "a misconception of the relative positions of Great Britain and the United States with respect to the interests of each Government in questions pertaining to this continent," and impeached "our right and long established claim to priority"; (3) that it gave the same right through the canal to a warship, bent upon an errand of destruction to the United States coasts, as to a vessel of the American Navy sailing for their defense, and that the United States demanded, for its own defense, the right to use only the same provision as Great Britain so emphatically employed in respect to the Suez route, by the possession of strategic and fortified posts and otherwise for the defense of the British Empire; (4) that only by supervision of the United States could the Isthmian Canal "be definitely and at all times secured against the interference and obstruction incident to war"; (5) that "a mere agreement of neutrality on paper between the great powers of Europe might prove ineffectual to preserve the canal in time of hostilities," and that if, in the event of a general European war, one of their naval powers should seize it, the United States might be obliged to enter upon a "defensive and protective war" in order to support her own commerce; (6) that while the European powers had often engaged with one another in war, "in only a single instance in the past hundred years" had the United States "exchanged a hostile shot" with any of them, and that, as it was impossible that "for a hundred years to come" such an incident would be repeated, the "one conclusive mode" of preserving the neutrality of the canal was to place it under the control of the United States as the Government "least likely to be engaged in war and able, in any and every event, to enforce the guardianship which she shall assume"; (7) that since the treaty was made the number of French and German vessels frequenting the Central American coasts had greatly and relatively increased; (8) that the expected aid in the construction of the canal from British capital, which the treaty was designed to secure, had not been realized, and that, owing to the great development of the United States, foreign capital could not in future enter as an essential factor into the determination of the problem. In conclusion, Mr. Blaine said:

WHAT WE DESIRED.

It is earnestly hoped by the President that the consideration now presented will have due weight and influence with Her Majesty's Government, and that the modifications of the treaty desired by the United States will be conceded in the same friendly spirit in which they are asked. The following is a summary of the changes necessary to meet the views of this Government:

First. Every part of the treaty which forbids the United States fortifying the canal and holding the political control of it in conjunction with the country in which it is located to be canceled.

Second. Every part of the treaty in which Great Britain and the United States agree to make no acquisition of territory in Central America to remain in full force. As an original proposition, this Government would not admit that Great Britain and the United States should be put on the same basis, even negatively, with respect to territorial acquisitions on the American Continent, and would be unwilling to establish such a precedent without full explanation. But the treaty contains that provision with respect to Central America, and if the United States should seek its annulment, it might give rise to erroneous and mischievous apprehensions among a people with whom this Government desires to be on the most friendly terms. The United States has taken special occasion to assure the Spanish-American Republics to the south of us that we do not intend and do not desire to cross their borders or in any way disturb their territorial integrity, and we shall not willingly incur the risk of a misunderstanding by annuling the clauses in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty which forbid such a step with Central America. The acquisition of military and naval stations necessary for the protection of the canal and voluntarily ceded to the United States by the Central American States not to be regarded as a violation of the provisions contained in the foregoing.

Third. The United States will not object to maintaining the clause looking to the establishment of a free port at each end of whatever canal may be constructed if England desires it to be retained.

Fourth. The clause in which the two Governments agreed to make treaty stipulations for a joint protectorate of whatever railway or canal might be constructed at Tehuantepec or Panama has never been perfected. No treaty stipulations for the proposed end have been suggested by either party, although citizens of the United States long since constructed a railway at Panama, and are now engaged in the same work at Tehuantepec. It is a fair presumption, in the judgment of the President, that this provision should be regarded as obsolete by nonaction and common consent of the two Governments.

Fifth. The clause defining the distance from either end of the canal where in time of war captures might be made by either belligerent on the high seas was left incomplete, and the distance was never determined. In the judgment of the President, speaking in the interest of peaceful commerce, this distance should be made as liberal as possible, and might, with advantage, as a question relating to the high seas and common to all nations, be a matter of stipulation between the great powers of the world.

WHAT WE DID NOT DESIRE.

In assuming as a necessity the political control of whatever canal or canals may be constructed across the Isthmus the United States will act in entire harmony with the Governments within whose territory the canal shall be located. Between the United States and other American Republics there can be no hostility, no jealousy, no rivalry, no distrust. This Government entertains no design in connection with this project for its own advantage which is not also for the equal or greater advantage of the country to be directly and immediately affected. Nor does the United States seek any exclusive or narrow commercial advantage. It frankly agrees and will by public proclamation declare at the proper time in conjunction with the Republic on whose soil the canal may be located that the same rights and privileges, the same tolls and obligations for the use of the canal, shall apply with absolute impartiality to the merchant marine of every nation on the globe. And equally in time of peace the harmless use of the canal shall be freely granted to the war vessels of other nations. In time of war, aside from the defensive use to be made of it by the country in which it is constructed and by the United States, the canal shall be impartially closed against the war vessels of all belligerents.

It is the desire and determination of the United States that the canal shall be used only for the development and increase of peaceful commerce among all the nations, and shall not be considered a strategic point in warfare which may tempt the aggression of belligerents or be seized under the compulsions of military necessity by any of the great powers that may have contests in which the United States has no stake and will take no part.

If it be asked why the United States objects to the assent of European Governments to the terms of neutrality for the operation of the canal, my answer is that the right to assent implies the right to dissent, and thus the whole question would be thrown open for contention as an international issue. It is the fixed purpose of the United States to confine it strictly and solely as an American question, to be dealt with and decided by the American Government.

No one can read this note of Secretary Blaine, an American statesman ever zealous in insisting on every American right, without being impressed with the fact that our desire and determination to secure an American canal, to be built by American capital, did not carry with it any idea of preference to American shipping. Evidently Mr. Blaine did not share the view expressed so frequently on this floor that equality of treatment as to tolls rested on the condition of joint obligation as to neutrality, or, as gentlemen put it, that when the United States took upon itself the entire burden of maintaining the neutrality of the canal, England lost all right to expect equality of treatment.

Listen again to his language—

Nor does the United States seek any exclusive or narrow commercial advantage. It frankly agrees and will by public proclamation declare at the proper time, in conjunction with the Republic on whose soil the canal may be located that the same rights and privileges, the same tolls and obligations for the use of the canal shall apply with absolute impartiality to the merchant marine of every nation on the globe. And equally in time of peace the harmless use of the canal shall be freely granted to the war vessels of other nations. In time of war, aside from the defensive use to be made of it by the country in which it is constructed and by the United States, the canal shall be impartially closed against the war vessels of all belligerents.

The effort of Mr. Blaine to secure a new treaty embodying the views he so clearly expressed failed, and it remained for Mr. Hay, as Secretary of State, to bring the 50 years of effort of the United States to a conclusion by the treaty of November 18, 1901. Prior to its adoption I find nothing that warrants, in my judgment, the belief that the United States desired to be relieved of the obligation to give equality of treatment with herself to all the nations in the use of the canal. I have endeavored by reading Mr. Blaine's note to show you that the idea of American political control was desired, that the neutralization of the canal was to be guaranteed by America alone, and that American money was to finance the undertaking. All these desires were obtained in the new treaty, but because they were obtained we are now told that equality in the commercial use of the canal went by the board. Unless the language of the treaty compels such construction, I submit that it can not be maintained. For I again assert the position that if language of a treaty is in doubt, that construction must be indulged in which is in harmony with the position previously maintained by a party to it.

HAY-PAUNCEFOTE TREATY.

Let us then examine the treaty itself. In its preamble it states that its purpose is to facilitate the construction of an isthmian canal—and to that end to remove any objection which may arise out of the convention of the 19th of April, 1850, commonly called the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, to the construction of such canal under the auspices of the Government of the United States without impairing the general principle of neutralization established in article 8 of that convention.

Article 1 of the treaty then provides that the present treaty shall supersede the Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

Article 2 gives to the United States the right to construct it either at its own cost or by aid to individuals or corporations, with the rights incident to construction and the exclusive right of regulation and management.

In article 3 the United States adopts as the basis of the neutralization of such canal certain rules, being six in number.

Article 4 agrees that no change of territorial sovereignty or of the international relations of the country or countries traversed by the canal shall affect the general principle of neutralization or the obligations of the contracting parties under the present treaty.

Article 5 is the ratification provision.

The full treaty is as follows:

The United States of America and His Majesty Edward VII, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and of the British Dominions beyond the Seas, King, and Emperor of India, being desirous to facilitate the construction of a ship canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, by whatever route may be considered expedient, and to that end to remove any objection which may arise out of the convention of the 19th April, 1850, commonly called the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, to the construction of such canal under the auspices of the Government of the United States, without impairing the "general principle" of neutralization established in article 8 of that convention, have for that purpose appointed as their plenipotentiaries:

The President of the United States—John Hay, Secretary of State of the United States of America.

And His Majesty Edward VII, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and of the British Dominions beyond the Seas, King, and Emperor of India, the Right Hon. Lord Pauncefote, G. C. B., G. C. M. G., His Majesty's ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary to the United States;

Who, having communicated to each other their full powers, which were found to be in due and proper form, have agreed upon the following articles:

ARTICLE 1.

The high contracting parties agree that the present treaty shall supersede the aforementioned convention of the 19th April, 1850.

ARTICLE 2.

It is agreed that the canal may be constructed under the auspices of the Government of the United States, either directly at its own cost or by gift or loan of money to individuals or corporations or through subscription to or purchase of stock or shares, and that, subject to the provisions of the present treaty, the said Government shall have and enjoy all the rights incident to such construction, as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal.

ARTICLE 3.

The United States adopts as the basis of the neutralization of such ship canal the following rules substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople, signed the 28th October, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Canal, that is to say:

1. The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

2. The canal shall never be blockaded, nor shall any right of war be exercised nor any act of hostility be committed within it. The United States, however, shall be at liberty to maintain such military police along the canal as may be necessary to protect it against lawlessness and disorder.

3. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not revictual nor take any stores in the canal except so far as may be strictly necessary; and the transit of such vessels through the canal shall be effected with the least possible delay in accordance with the regulations in force and with only such intermission as may result from the necessities of the service.

Prizes shall be in all respects subject to the same rules as vessels of war of the belligerents.

4. No belligerent shall embark or disembark troops, munitions of war, or warlike materials in the canal, except in case of accidental hindrance of the transit, and in such case the transit shall be resumed with all possible dispatch.

5. The provisions of this article shall apply to waters adjacent to the canal within 3 marine miles of either end. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not remain in such waters longer than 24 hours at any one time, except in case of distress, and in such case shall depart as soon as possible; but a vessel of war of one belligerent shall not depart within 24 hours from the departure of a vessel of war of the other belligerent.

6. The plant, establishments, buildings, and all works necessary to the construction, maintenance, and operation of the canal shall be deemed to be part thereof for the purposes of this treaty, and in time of war, as in time of peace, shall enjoy complete immunity from attack or injury by belligerents, and from acts calculated to impair their usefulness as part of the canal.

ARTICLE 4.

It is agreed that no change of territorial sovereignty or of the international relations of the country or countries traversed by the beforementioned canal shall affect the general principle of neutralization or the obligation of the high contracting parties under the present treaty.

ARTICLE 5.

The present treaty shall be ratified by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof, and by His Britannic Majesty; and the ratifications shall be exchanged at Washington or at London at the earliest possible time within six months from the date hereof.

In faith whereof the respective plenipotentiaries have signed this treaty and thereunto affixed their seals.

Done in duplicate at Washington, the 18th day of November, in the year of our Lord 1901.

JOHN HAY. [SEAL.]
PAUNCEFOTE. [SEAL.]

Now, by virtue of the treaty itself it becomes necessary to examine article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty wherein is set out the general principle of neutralization. It is as follows:

The Governments of the United States and Great Britain having not only desired in entering into this convention, to accomplish a particular object, but also to establish a general principle, they hereby agree to extend their protection, by treaty stipulations, to any other practicable communication, whether by canal or railway, across the isthmus which connects North and South America; and, especially to the interoceanic communication—should the same prove to be practicable, whether by canal or railway—which are now proposed to be established by the way of Tehuantepec or Panama. In granting, however, their joint protection to any such canals or railways, as are by this article specified, it is always understood by the United States and Great Britain that the parties constructing or owning the same shall impose no other charges or conditions of traffic thereupon than the aforesaid Governments shall approve of as just and equitable; and that the same canals or railways, being open to the citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain on equal terms, shall also be open on like terms to the citizens and subjects of every other State which is willing to grant thereto such protection as the United States and Great Britain engaged to afford.

NEUTRALIZATION EMBRACED EQUALITY OF TREATMENT.

Now, I assert that the general principle of neutralization embraced as a substantive proposition equality of treatment. Those who are claiming the right of preference must demonstrate that it did not in order to have any basis for their claim. What is their position?

Mr. Chandler Anderson, formerly counsellor for the State Department, states it in this way:

It is evident from this clause of the article that the agreement to extend protection was a conditional one, and the condition was that charges imposed on traffic should be approved by both Governments as just and equitable, and that the canal should be open to their citizens and subjects upon equal terms.

He then undertakes to prove that neutralization in a narrow sense, rather than equality of treatment, was the general principle sought to be maintained. I am unable to so read the language. I have shown you that when Mr. Blaine sought an agreement whereby America alone would have the right and burden of maintaining neutrality, he also expected that America would establish equality of treatment. He did not consider that equality of treatment was a concession to be given only at the price of agreeing to maintain neutrality. He believed that the two things were desirable and should be secured irrespective of the fact that America sought to alone assume the burden of maintaining the neutrality. Great Britain did not ask to be relieved of such burden. We wanted her relieved of it because we did not want her by virtue of her obligation in this respect to have any right to assert a political control. That was what we were aiming at, not to be freed from any obligation of equality of treatment as to tolls. But Mr. Anderson, in stating his position, and his position is that of most of those Members who claim our right to prefer, stated that the obligation to protect was conditional not only on equality of treatment, but also that the charges should be just and equitable. Now, in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, in article 2, the United States is expressly given the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal; this includes the right as to tolls. In article 3, section 1, of the treaty, it is required that "such condition and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable." This plainly places upon the United States an obligation that Great Britain has a right to insist upon. Now, here is one of the conditions upon which Mr. Anderson says that the obligation to extend protection was predicated on, and which, conversely, should only exist while protection was assured. Yet, after Great Britain's obligation to protect has been canceled, America's obligation for equitable treatment is preserved. If one of the conditions upon which the obligation of protection was based is preserved after that obligation is gone, what is there left of the argument that the other condition, to wit, that of equality of treatment, disappeared because such obligation of protection was taken off Great Britain. The truth is that neutrality in its narrow sense and equality of treatment were both embraced as substantive propositions in the general principle of neutralization. But this is not all.

SECTION 1, ARTICLE 3.

In article 3 of the treaty the United States adopt the rules that shall be the basis of the neutralization of the canal. Section 1 of that article provides that:

The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

Here the United States, in stating what neutralization meant, puts in the very beginning equality of treatment. To the ordinary man this would seem to make plain that the general principle of neutralization preserved in the preamble embraced equality of treatment. This is so apparent that the freedom-from-tolls advocates are forced to construe the words "all nations" as meaning "all other nations." Now, the word "all" is plain; the burden is on those who seek to qualify it. How do they attempt to do it? Why, by the words "observing these rules" that follow the phrase "all nations," and then contending that the nature of the rules themselves preclude the idea that the United States agrees to observe them; that while it adopts them, it does not observe them. They then state, at least by inference, that observing these rules means observing all these rules; and since, according to them, sections 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6 plainly do not apply to the United States, therefore section 1, the equality section, can not apply. But there is a part of section 1 that is expressly addressed to the United States. Now, if their theory is correct, in as much as other rules do not apply, this can not; what becomes then of the language—

Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

I have already shown that by article 2 the United States is given "the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal." No one will seriously contend that this does not give it the right to fix the conditions and charges of traffic. Now, one of the rules adopted is that such conditions and charges shall be just and equitable. Is not the United States a nation observing this rule?

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TEMPLE] made a most interesting speech, and to his adherents it apparently seemed conclusive. Being a good logician, he realized that he must demonstrate that the words "all nations observing these rules" did not include the United States, and in his argument he really argued as if the words he was construing were "all nations observing all these rules." This vice runs through all his argument. This is apparent in his answer to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS]. All of it is predicated on the notion that unless the United States must observe all the rules under all conditions it can not be held to be embraced in the term "all nations." It needs only to point out this fault for this part of his argument to crumble.

Following the same line of reasoning gentlemen assert that since the equality clause embraces vessels of war as well as of commerce that if it applies to the United States, we are limited by the rules touching belligerents as to our warships, all of which I repeat is falsely predicated on the idea that all these rules must apply to the United States at all times, if any do. But the treaty must be read as a whole, and it must be read with due regard to the rights of sovereignty that belong to the United States bearing in mind the clear distinction between our rights as a sovereign nation at a time when we are at war as distinguished from our obligations as to other belligerents as well as our obligations as to its use generally in times of complete peace.

I do not believe for a moment that all the rules adopted by the United States were intended to be in all ways and at all times observed by the United States. I fully agree with the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] that in time of war the United States by virtue of its sovereign power would have the right to close the canal against its enemy—would have the right to use the canal as an effective weapon of defense. This was contemplated by the treaty and is conceded by the British Government. What the treaty does not say, in connection with what a previous draft did say, clearly proves this. Unless the treaty expressly forbade it, the United States as a practical sovereign would have all the rights of a belligerent for its protection. It was because the original draft of the treaty signed on February 5, 1900, had in it in article 1 the terms "in time of war as in time of peace" that the Davis amendment was agreed to.

THE DAVIS AMENDMENT.

Let me recite the language of that treaty down to and including article 1, which for the present argument is all we need now to consider. It reads:

The high contracting parties, desiring to preserve and maintain the general principle of the neutralization established in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer convention, adopt as the basis of such neutralization the following rules, substantially as embodied in the convention between Great Britain and certain other powers, signed at Constantinople October 29, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Canal; that is to say:

First. The canal shall be free and open in time of war as in time of peace to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise.

Now, because of the language "in time of war as in time of peace" the amendment proposed by Senator Davis was adopted. That amendment reads:

It is agreed, however, that none of the immediately foregoing conditions and stipulations in sections numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5 of this article shall apply to measures which the United States may find it necessary to take for securing, by its own forces, the defense of the United States and the maintenance of public order.

In the treaty as finally agreed to, this amendment is omitted because rendered unnecessary by the omission of the words "in time of war as in time of peace" and the provision preventing fortifications. Secretary Hay, in the note sent to the Senate with the new treaty, said:

The next important change from the former treaty consists in the omission of the words "in time of war as in time of peace" from clause 1 of article 3. No longer insisting upon the language of the Davis amendment, which had in terms reserved to the United States express permission to disregard the rules of neutrality prescribed when necessary to secure its own defense, which the Senate had apparently deemed necessary because of the provision in rule 1, that the canal should be free and open in time of war as in time of peace to the vessels of all nations, it was considered that the omission of the words "in time of war as in time of peace" would dispense with the necessity of the amendment referred to, and that war between the contracting parties, or between the United States and any other power, would have the ordinary effect of war upon treaties when not specially otherwise provided, and would remit both parties to their original and natural right of self-defense, and give to the United States the clear right to close the canal against the other belligerent, and to protect it and defend itself by whatever means might be necessary.

The language of Secretary Hay, together with the admission of the British Government, makes the contention that we are bound by all the rules of neutrality in time of war if the United States is one of the nations "observing these rules" of little worth. Most of the eloquence of gentlemen have been expended in showing what a deplorable condition the advocates of the repeal would put our country in during war. In the light of the facts, what a waste of words there has been.

Mr. Speaker, I have endeavored to show that the equality clause does relate to the United States, and to answer the arguments advanced for a contrary construction. Further support for my position is found in article 2 of the treaty. It clearly shows that the words "all nations" must include the United States. As I have said, it is an article where the United States is given specifically certain rights, but these rights are declared to be subject to the provisions of the present treaty. Are not the rules to be observed in its use part of the provisions of the treaty?

Again, article 3 adopts as the basis of the neutralization of the canal "the following rules substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople * * * for the free navigation of the Suez Canal."

Now, the Suez convention in its first article states that the canal shall always be free and open * * * to every vessel of commerce or of war without distinction of flag, and in its twelfth article speaks of "the principle of equality as regards the free use of the canal," a principle which forms one of the bases of the present treaty.

When we established substantially these rules, did we not by fair inference carry the principle of equality? The differences between the rules the United States adopt and those pertaining to the Suez are all, in my judgment, the result of our desire to make certain our political control of the canal and not from a desire to change the rule of equality.

THE CANAL IS TO BE USED IN A PUBLIC CALLING—IT IS IMPRESSED WITH A PUBLIC TRUST.

Let me suggest the thought, also, that we are in the position of a person or corporation engaged in a public calling and by the rules of law well recognized in this country are required to serve all users without discrimination. For years past we have had the same plea of public corporations in justification of preferences that is made here. It is an old story to the Commerce Commission—this plea that it is our property, we created it, we can do as we will. But it is a plea that has always been made in vain.

Remember, that the United States when operating a canal is not engaged in performing any right of sovereignty. It is engaged in a public calling which carries with it public duties. Remember, also, that there is a plain distinction between its own vessels and those of its citizens. Disregarding the distinction between the rights that belong to the United States in regard to political control as a result of sovereignty with those as the operator of the canal, great stress is laid by some on the fact that the treaty finally adopted was one under which it was contemplated that the United States might itself build the canal, whereas the treaty originally submitted to the Senate and amended by it contemplated a joint obligation on the part of the United States and Great Britain relative to a canal to be built by private enterprise. Over and over again it is asserted that our rights come from the fact that we built the canal. They declare in ringing tones "it is an American canal." But the rights under the treaty that the United States obtained are no different because the Government built it than if private enterprise had. But it is argued that whatever those rights or obligations might have been, our relationship to the canal was changed by the acquisition of sovereign rights from the Republic of Panama. And this is when gentlemen become most dramatic and declaim against a supine surrender of sovereignty. My friend, the gentleman from Alabama, in his most impressive manner declared:

There is a more serious question involved in the passage of this bill. The right to discriminate in favor of our ships, the opportunity to encourage our shipping and to increase our commerce are matters of vital importance, but they pale into insignificance when compared with the attack on the sovereignty of our country in the Canal Zone.

OUR RIGHTS IN THE CANAL ZONE.

What are our sovereign rights in the Canal Zone? Are they the same as to the United States proper? Clearly not; and every man who has taken the trouble to read the Hay-Pauncefote treaty knows they are not. Gentlemen are not candid when they speak of the matter. The gentleman from Alabama must know that we acquired our title to the canal strip for a specific purpose. The very boundary of it indicates it. It is a strip 10 miles wide, with the axis of the canal as the center line. The canal strip was obtained that we might build a canal. The canal was not built because we owned the strip. This is what makes untenable the contention of gentlemen that the Panama Canal bears the same relationship to the United States as do canals within the United States proper. These were built as an incident to our sovereignty. Our sovereignty in the Zone is incident to the canal. But this is not all. The very treaty that conveys away Panama's title gives title to the United States, subject to the obligation imposed on us by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. Article 18 of that treaty provides that—the canal when constructed, and the entrances thereto shall be neutral in perpetuity, and shall be opened upon the terms provided for by section 1 of article 3 of and in conformity with all the stipulations of the treaty entered into by the Governments of the United States and Great Britain on November 18, 1901.

Why did not the gentleman from Alabama read that article? Was it because it clearly shows that we have taken a limited title—that we hold it subject to a trust? These are the facts. And the very condition of limited sovereignty was provided for in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. Article 4 of the treaty provides that—it is agreed that no chance of territorial sovereignty or of international relations of the country or countries traversed by the before-mentioned canal shall effect the general principle of neutralization or the obligations of the high contracting parties under the present treaty.

No, Mr. Speaker; no one is imperiling our true sovereignty. No one is seeking to limit our political control of the canal in all ways essential to our national integrity. But some of us are unwilling to disregard a trust placed upon our title in order to aid by subsidy a legalized monopoly. Gentlemen must be in sore straits when they are forced to such wild appeals. But while I do not think the gentleman from Alabama was completely frank in dealing with the question of our title to the Canal Zone, he was most frank as to his ultimate desires. He does not shield himself behind any plea that the coastwise trade, because it belongs exclusively to American ships, is on a different footing from over-seas trade touching our right to exempt it. He knows full well that while there may be no competition as to ships, there is as to products the ships carry. He realizes that to establish the right to exempt coastwise trade, you must establish the right as to foreign trade, and so he says "there is no word that even by implication denies our right to give free tolls to our vessels in any trade, and the day will yet come when we will free our vessels from tolls in the foreign trade."

The day may come, Mr. Speaker, but when it does, we will have to exempt the shipping of all other nations also if we are to keep our faith under the treaty.

The right to free from tolls exists, but not the right to discriminate by charging other nations tolls.

Gentlemen frequently overlook this fact. They call attention to the fact that all the canals in the United States are free from tolls for American ships, and then they declare, "Can it be that as to this canal, built by America with American money on American soil, we can not let American ships go through free?" Of course we can let American ships go through free; but the real question is, Can we let American ships go through free without also letting the commercial ships of other nations go through free? They not only state the question wrongly but they assume that our sovereignty and control are the same as to canals in the United States and this international waterway. Let me repeat that we obtained sovereignty in the zone in order to build the canal; we did not build the canal because we had the sovereignty. In the United States proper our development of our waterways has been incidental to our sovereignty; in the zone the reverse is the fact. Let it also be remembered that our waterways in America are not only free to American ships but they are free to the ships of other nations.

VALUE OF THE CANAL.

But the gentlemen say, "Of what use is the canal to be to America if we can not prefer American shipping? Can it be possible that we expended all of the money, all the labor, in the creation of the greatest of all works of man without having the right to get any special benefit from it?" They ignore the advantage that comes to us in a military way, the facilities afforded in transferring our fleets from one ocean to the other, which in many ways was the moving cause for the construction of the canal. The trip of the Oregon around the Horn brought to the consciousness of all—what had been realized by the farseeing for many years—the tremendous advantage created to us in a military way in making a water transit across the Isthmus. But this is not all. You who doubt the value of the canal to American shipping unless such shipping be subsidized by being freed from the payment of tolls, look at an atlas of the world, realize that the canal is due south of Buffalo, N. Y., that the west coast of South America is east of New York City; measure the distances from American ports through the canal to the west coast of South America, measure the distances from our Atlantic States to our Pacific States, and then measure the distance from England, Germany, and France to the Pacific, and you will not need to ask of what advantage is the canal.

The gentleman from Alabama speaks of the wonderful generosity of America in fixing rates for the use of the canal very much below those charged at Suez, notwithstanding the fact that the Panama Canal cost several times what the Suez did. It was not our generosity that dictated the rate; it was our common business sense. We fixed the rate at what we did in order to divert traffic for the Far East from the use of the Suez, and traffic for the west coast of North and South America from not only Suez, but the route around the Horn.

Coal and its cost was the determining factor in making these tolls, and that same factor gives to America all the advantages that she needs or is justly entitled to.

TREATY WITH COLOMBIA.

Mr. Speaker, I desire to say but a few words in answer to the contention that has been made that in the treaty that was entered into with Colombia and ratified by the Senate, we expressly gave to her the right to pass her ships and munitions of war through the canal free, and that if the contention I have urged touching the construction of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty is right this was in clear violation of the treaty; and it is said, amid applause, that similar provisions existed in the present treaty with Panama. The gentleman did not state, however, that the United States Government, before it concluded the treaty with Colombia, submitted this question to Great Britain and obtained from her a statement that such action would not be objected to, it being recognized that this was but one of the considerations for the concession by Colombia to the United States whereby we were to obtain the right to construct a canal. Manifestly, with these facts existing, in making a treaty with Panama it could not be presumed that objection would be made by England to similar terms in that treaty, and no such objection will have any weight.

The clear right of the owner of the territory through which the canal passed to make such a condition when conferring on us the right to build the canal is too plain. I submit, therefore, that there is no value in this contention of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

I have already spoken of the original Hay-Pauncefote treaty that was amended by the Senate. Let me but recall to you the fact that every amendment that was placed by the Senate upon that treaty was one looking simply to make certain our political control over the canal, and that the Bard amendment, seeking to exempt coastwise trade, when offered, was overwhelmingly defeated. Men may undertake to explain the reason for the votes cast, recollections of Senators years afterwards may be cited as evidence of the fact that it was not agreed to simply because it was thought unnecessary, as we had the right under the terms of that treaty to prefer our ships, but such statements now are of little worth. Other gentlemen insist that we did not have the right to prefer under that treaty, because there was in it the joint obligation on the part of Great Britain and the United States to maintain the neutrality of the canal, and only when the obligation of England was removed in the new treaty did our right to prefer come into existence. I leave these gentlemen to settle this conflict between themselves. It is enough to say that there is no evidence that I am aware of to warrant the assertion that the policy of the country from the beginning touching the Isthmian Canal was reversed in the drafting of the present Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

Gentlemen may assume that because England, at our instance, was relieved from the obligation to jointly maintain with us the neutrality of the canal, she surrendered the right to equality as to its commercial use. Strained construction can be put upon individual words and phrases, but after a most conscientious study of the treaty and of all the facts that surrounded its making, with a knowledge of the expressed desire on our part for nearly a century for equality of treatment to all other nations, I can not bring myself to believe that in building this canal in response, as President Roosevelt said, "to a mandate from civilization to effect an object the accomplishment of which was demanded in the interest of mankind," we ever expected or are in justice entitled to give our ships an exemption from "the just and equitable charges" that we are to impose.

SENATE AMENDMENTS.

If such had been our intention, the amendments offered by Senator Bacon to the present treaty would have been adopted. Senator Bacon proposed (1) After the words "United States" in the tenth line to strike out the words "without impairing the general principle of neutralization established in article 8 of that convention." (2) Strike out from article 2, in line 10, the following words: "Subject to the provisions of the present treaty." (3) Strike out all of articles 3 and 4.

If his amendment had prevailed, there would have been left in the treaty only the right of the United States to build the canal; all obligations on our part would have been swept away. See with what discernment he moves to strike out the provisions in the present treaty whereby we are obligated to give equality of treatment. He would have eliminated (1) from the preamble the general principle of neutralization, (2) the words in the second article "subject to the provisions of the present treaty." Remember, this article is the one that confers upon the United States the right to construct the canal. Senator Bacon clearly saw that the words "subject to the provisions of the present treaty," bound the United States to the requirements of article 3; (3) he would have eliminated article 3 entirely, not that the United States might not have to treat all other nations equally with each other, but because he must have construed article 3 as applying to the United States also; (4) he would have eliminated article 4 because it also impressed the general principle of neutralization upon the United States. His amendment was voted down on a record vote by 60 nays to 18 yeas.

The amendment of Senator MCLAURIN, which was also defeated without even the formality of a roll call, is instructive. He proposed to strike out of article 3 the words "substantially as embodied in the Convention of Constantinople, signed the 29th of October, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Canal." It must have been clear to him, even though gentlemen now profess to be unable to see it, that we could not substantially embody the rules for the Suez Canal for its free navigation and leave ourself a right to discriminate.

Against the plain inference of the amendments, gentlemen put simply their own statements that because the United States is alone to maintain neutrality the right of Great Britain to equality of treatment disappeared. It must not be forgotten that the duty to maintain neutrality gave to England rights that were limitations upon the Monroe doctrine. These rights were of value. She surrendered them when relieved of the duty to protect. Can it be believed that she also surrendered the very great right of equal treatment with the United States?

I shall not discuss the Olsen case and the treaty of 1815. The matter has been fully dealt with by others, and especially by Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. The treaty there involved dealt only with ships and not traffic, and, in my judgment, clearly did not relate to coastwise trade. In article 3 it expressly excluded coastwise trade in the West Indies and by article 2 by fair inference did as to all coastwise ships. The decision only dealt with an incident of commerce, to wit, the pilotage laws of Texas, and not with commerce in a fundamental sense; and the language of Justice White is broader than the facts warranted. The distinction between an incident to commerce and the commerce itself is so well recognized by the courts that a silence of Congress touching interstate commerce is held by them to be a permission to the States to act as to an incident of commerce, while it is a prohibition on the States to act as to a fundamental aspect of such commerce.

Mr. Speaker, I have endeavored to show that a construction of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty permitting the United States to prefer American shipping is not warranted.

First. Because it means a reversal of a century-old position of America in favor of the freedom and equality of the seas, and there is no compelling language to warrant the belief that such a reversal was intended.

Second. That our declared policy for nearly a century touching the use of an Isthmian Canal shows that we hoped for no exclusive or narrow commercial advantage, but did desire equality of treatment to all nations to prevail.

Third. The terms of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty show that no preferential right could be exercised. (1) This because the general principle of neutralization in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty embraced the idea of equality. (2) Because the words "all nations," in section 1 of article 3, clearly embrace the United States.

Fourth. The terms of the Hay-Varilla treaty gave title to the United States subject to the conditions as to the use of the canal imposed in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, and our title is impressed with the obligation of a public trust.

Fifth. The history of the amendments adopted and rejected to the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty show that political control, not the right to prefer, was what was sought.

Sixth. The history of the amendments rejected to the existing Hay-Pauncefote treaty show that we recognized our obligation to give equal treatment with ourselves to all nations.

I have also sought to show that while we were thus restricted to equality of treatment in its use, our rights over the canal in a political sense are such as to warrant us in taking any steps necessary in time of war to protect it or the United States.

This distinction between our sovereign rights in a political sense and our obligations as the operator of a canal that is a great international highway is, in my judgment, the key to the whole question.

I realize that appeals have been made here in the name of patriotism by men on both sides. With this confusion of voices how shall you determine which is the true and which the false? "By their fruits ye shall know them." What will the policy that they insist we should maintain lead to? Will it promote peace? Will it promote friendly relations among the nations? Will it promote equality and justice? Will it not, on the contrary, promote discord and distrust? Will it not turn us back to that darker age of long ago when all the nations sought special privileges? No, gentlemen, an appeal to patriotism that has in it such results as that can not be a true appeal. It is not the patriotism that America stands for. We no longer agree with the statement of Madame De Stael that "the patriotism of a nation should be selfish." Higher and above that is our belief that the patriotism of a nation should be altruistic, that it should be intelligently unselfish. That has been the true position of America. Oh, my countrymen, as we approach the dawn of a new Easter may we so act that the voice of our country may be in harmony with the spirit of that day, and that it may help, not hinder, "Peace on earth, good will toward men!" [Applause.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD took the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

Mr. ADAMSON. Did the gentleman from Kentucky use all his time?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is informed that the gentleman from Kentucky used all his time.

[Mr. PORTER addressed the House. See Appendix.]

[Mr. PARKER addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. SWITZER. Mr. Speaker, the opening of the Panama Canal, regardless of all its attending woes and ills, presidential nightmares, and the trials and tribulations of a great political party in successfully or unsuccessfully maintaining its platform pledges to the people, has been looked forward to by the people of the Ohio Valley as the coming dawn of an increased prosperity in that great industrial region.

With the Ohio River canalized from Pittsburgh to Cairo, and its improved tributaries tapping the great coal and iron producing regions of Ohio, western Pennsylvania, West Virginia, Kentucky, Tennessee, and northern Alabama, affording these great staples—iron and coal—the lowest possible transportation rates to the Mississippi Valley and the great Southwest, and through the Panama Canal to the Pacific coast and the Orient, who would undertake to fathom the possibilities of this great water highway as a future carrier of freight?

But just as we are about to reap the reward of toilsome years spent in agitation for river improvement we are told that while the immense commerce initiated in the great industrial region I have just referred to may pass down our improved rivers free, it can not continue its journey to the Pacific coast without paying a heavy toll in passing through the Nation's canal, constructed with the people's money for the express purpose of reducing transportation rates, and to facilitate the mobilization of our naval vessels in either ocean in time of war.

Coal is transported on the Great Lakes from Ashtabula, Ohio, to Duluth, Minn., a distance of more than 800 miles, at a cost of from 32 to 35 cents per ton, and with the Ohio River properly canalized it can be transported from Pittsburgh to New Orleans, a distance of 2,000 miles, at the same cost. But if it is routed to our western coast it is proposed to make a charge of nearly 50 cents a ton for a 52-mile trip through an American-owned canal.

Congress has recently voted $35,000,000 for the construction of railroads in Alaska for the development of that great mineral region, and especially to make her coal more accessible to the Pacific coast and incidentally to give employment to a small part of that large army of the unemployed that we always find lurking in the wake of a Democratic tariff law. Recent newspaper advices are to the effect that 2,000 people have already left Seattle for the land of hope and promise, and there to engage in a long struggle for an equitable division of the $35,000,000. Although voting this large bonus to the future Alaskan coal baron, it is further proposed to encourage and protect him by handicapping his competitor, the coal producer of the Middle West and East, by taxing his product 50 cents a ton for passing through the ditch his money helped to construct.

During this debate some exponents of cheaper freight rates have made the startling announcement that the exemption of our coastwise trade from tolls would inure solely to the benefit of the owners of the vessels engaged in such trade and work no advantage whatever to the consumer or the shipper.

Why not, then, impose tolls on the steamers plying upon the waters of the Ohio and the Mississippi?

I have never heard it suggested that such a scheme would tend to lower our river freight rates, and every sane man knows that it would have the opposite effect.

But it is contended that our coastwise vessels are in a combine and the proposed exemption would amount to a subsidy to such combination.

Have there not been such combinations on our lakes and rivers and among our railroads?

Who would propose to bring relief from such combinations by the imposition of a heavy toll on the commerce they carry?

I, for one, see no reason why the Interstate Commerce Commission, if authorized, can not as easily supervise and regulate coastwise rates as it can railway rates, and establish a fair rate, regardless of the ownership of the 24,765 vessels engaged in this trade.

Does anyone think that the imposition of a toll of 50 cents a ton on freight sent by water from Pittsburgh to Cincinnati would in any way tend to reduce transportation rates between these two points, either by rail or water?

If a ton of coal is sent by water from Pittsburgh through the Panama Canal to the Pacific coast and 50 cents a ton in toll is collected for going through the canal, is it not apparent that the shipper or the consumer, or both, must bear the increased burden?

It seems to me to be a monstrous proposition that a domestic commodity of as low an order as coal, yet such a necessity that everyone is interested in obtaining it as cheaply as possible, should be made to bear a tax of 50 cents a ton for passing through an American-owned canal 52 miles in length.

So much for the economic phase of this question.

I fully recognize that if we have no right to exempt from tolls our coastwise trade, and to do so violates treaty rights securing us the privilege of constructing and operating the canal, the economic features of the question pale into insignificance. On the other hand, if we have the right, however much it may be questioned, shall we surrender it at the behest of England and subject our domestic commerce to the outrageous burden I have just referred to for all the centuries to come, with no hope to free it but by granting to the commerce of the world passage through the canal at the sole expense of this Nation?

Certainly we should not grant such an unreasonable concession upon a mere request or because of any acts of intimidation on the part of any foreign power. I will not volunteer to surrender the right to deal with our commerce as we please while in transit through the property which we have secured at a cost of nearly $400,000,000 and which has cast upon us the burden of protecting and maintaining it through the years to come at an enormous annual expenditure.

By repealing the canal tolls exemption clause at the request of Great Britain we concede that we were wrong in passing it; but if we were right in the first instance, the repeal loses to us a most valuable right forever.

I do not believe that we should yield on a matter of such national importance or, at least, not until there is an opportunity for the people to reverse the position we are fairly warranted in believing they took, judging by the result of their ballots cast at the last presidential election.

The present contention arises over the interpretation placed upon what is known as the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, entered into between Great Britain and this country in 1901. The warped construction of this treaty contended for by our critics now is the same that they contended for at the last session of Congress. Congress then in interpreting this treaty declared by the passage of the exemption clause now in question that we had a right to deal as we deemed proper with our coastwise trade in its passage through the canal. Within a few weeks after the free-toll act passed the House and while the discussion was still fresh in the minds of all, the Democratic national convention at Baltimore adopted the same construction of the treaty by declaring:

> We favor the exemption from tolls of American ships engaged in coastwise trade in passing through the Panama Canal.

And a similar declaration appears in the national platform of the Progressive Party.

Ex-President Taft, in a special message to Congress August 19, 1912, stated:

> After full examination of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty and of the treaty which preceded it, I feel confident that the exemption of the coastwise vessels of the United States from tolls and the imposition of tolls on the vessels of all nations engaged in the foreign trade is not a violation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

A similar view was expressed by ex-President Roosevelt in the Outlook January 18, 1913.

Reading the language of the treaty in the light of the treaty preceding it and the events and negotiations which led the high contracting parties to enter into the convention, I am of the opinion that we have a perfect right to exempt our coastwise trade from canal tollage if we so desire without the consent of Great Britain or any other nation.

The Clayton-Bulwer treaty of 1850, respecting a transportation route across the Isthmus connecting the two Americas, established a joint protectorate over the route; each party to the treaty agreed on its part to furnish protection and enforce neutralization. This treaty was superseded by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty of 1901, and in entering into the new treaty Great Britain withdrew her obligation to protect and entered into the new convention in the relationship of a customer applying to the owner for the use of the canal. The treaty of 1901 expressly states that it shall supersede the convention of 1850.

Article 2 of the treaty sets forth the following stipulations:

> It is agreed that the canal may be constructed under the auspices of the Government of the United States, either directly at its own cost, or by gift or loan of money to individuals or corporations, or through subscription to or purchase of stock or shares, and that, subject to the provisions of the present treaty, the said Government shall have and enjoy all the rights incident to such construction, as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal.

Rule 1 of article 3 is as follows:

> The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic, or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

Article 2 concedes to the United States not only all rights incident to the construction of the canal, but also the right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal. These are the usual attributes which accompany the absolute ownership of property.

And article 3 of the treaty states that the "United States adopts" as a basis of neutralization certain rules. It will be noted that the United States does the adopting. Why? Because the high contracting parties to the treaty recognized her then as the owner of the canal.

It also will be well to bear in mind that the treaty contemplated the construction of a canal by the United States through territory not then belonging to either of the high contracting parties.

Great Britain, recognizing that the United States would be unquestionably the owner of the canal, which the treaty contemplated she would construct, and being desirous of securing a permanent passage through for her vessels, requested the owner to prescribe the terms and conditions which would permit the passage of her ships, and thereupon the United States adopted the "rules" set out in article 3, and agreed on her part that "the canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules."

The status of the United States being that of owner and the status of Great Britain and other nations being that of customers, the treaty merely bound the United States not to discriminate between the customers of the canal, and to treat them alike "in respect of conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise," but so far as her own shipping is concerned she is at liberty to deal with it as she sees fit. The rules adopted by the United States, as set out in the treaty, are to be enforced against the customers of the canal by the United States, the owner of the canal.

That the United States is the owner of the canal is supported by the following facts:

Great Britain conceded to the United States the right to construct the canal, and gave her the exclusive right of providing for its regulation and management.

In pursuance of the treaty, the United States constructed the canal after having acquired title to and sovereignty over the territory through which it is constructed, all at the enormous expense of $400,000,000.

There is cast upon the United States the burden of the upkeep and maintenance of the canal, as well as the duty to protect it and enforce the neutralization stipulated for in the treaty, requiring an annual expenditure estimated by some at $5,000,000.

We have erected in the Canal Zone modern fortifications and equipped them with the latest and most improved ordnance and defensive armament, manned by trained soldiers, for the purpose of resisting the most formidable assault that might be made upon it by any foreign power. This has all been done without protest on the part of any nation.

We recognize the canal as the most strategic point within our domain, and as such we are guarding it as strongly as we would any other vital point of our country.

Suppose the two parties to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty were to exchange positions and England possessed the territory of the Canal Zone and owned the Panama Canal, does anyone throughout the length and breadth of this land imagine for a moment that she would submit to any dictation on the part of this or any other nation respecting the levying of tolls on her vessels passing through the canal?

Suppose this great strategic point belonged to her, as it belongs to us, does anyone believe she would brook any interference whatever with her shipping passing through the canal on the part of this or any other power?

I can not bring myself to believe that the limitations placed by the treaty on the use of the canal by vessels of commerce and of war are applicable to the vessels of this country or of its citizens.

And, so believing, I will not truckle to the beck and call of Great Britain.

She has nothing whatever to do with an American vessel while it is passing through an American canal under the protection of the American flag and American guns.

If we must obtain the consent of Great Britain before an American vessel can pass through an American canal commanded by an up-to-date American armament, we had better dismantle the showy fortifications now on the Canal Zone, pull down our flag, and move off our Army.

I can not believe that our expensive armament on the zone is there for the mere purpose of ornamentation or entirely for the purpose of preserving order along the canal and to maintain the harmonious passage of foreign vessels; but I believe it is also there for the purpose of protecting American rights and interests; and I have no doubt but what all our rights will be amply protected and fully preserved unless Congress runs up the white flag and capitulates to Great Britain.

THE HAY-PAUNCEFOTE TREATY.

A PROCLAMATION BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

Whereas a convention between the United States of America and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, to facilitate the construction of a ship canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, by whatever route may be considered expedient, and to that end to remove any objection which may arise out of the convention of the 19th April, 1850, commonly called the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, to the construction of such canal under the auspices of the Government of the United States, without impairing the "general principle" of neutralization established in article 8 of that convention, was concluded and signed by their respective plenipotentiaries at the city of Washington on the 18th day of November, 1901, the original of which convention is word for word as follows:

"The United States of America and His Majesty Edward the Seventh, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and of the British Dominions beyond the Seas, King, and Emperor of India, being desirous to facilitate the construction of a ship canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, by whatever route may be considered expedient, and to that end to remove any objection which may arise out of the convention of the 19th April, 1850, commonly called the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, to the construction of such canal under the auspices of the Government of the United States, without impairing the "general principle" of neutralization established in article 8 of that convention, have for that purpose appointed as their plenipotentiaries:

"The President of the United States, John Hay, Secretary of State of the United States of America;

"And His Majesty Edward the Seventh, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and of the British Dominions beyond the Seas, King, and Emperor of India, the Right Honorable Lord Pauncefote, G. C. B., G. C. M. G., His Majesty's Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary to the United States;

"Who, having communicated to each other their full powers which were found to be in due and proper form, have agreed upon the following articles:

"ARTICLE 1.

"The high contracting parties agree that the present treaty shall supersede the aforementioned convention of the 19th April, 1850.

"ARTICLE 2.

"It is agreed that the canal may be constructed under the auspices of the Government of the United States, either directly at its own cost, or by gift or loan of money to individuals or corporations, or through subscription to or purchase of stock or shares, and that, subject to the provisions of the present treaty, the said Government shall have and enjoy all the rights incident to such construction, as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal.

"ARTICLE 3.

"The United States adopts, as the basis of the neutralization of such ship canal, the following rules, substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople, signed the 28th October, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Canal; that is to say:

"1. The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

"2. The canal shall never be blockaded, nor shall any right of war be exercised nor any act of hostility be committed within it. The United States, however, shall be at liberty to maintain such military police along the canal as may be necessary to protect it against lawlessness and disorder.

"3. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not revictual nor take any stores in the canal except so far as may be strictly necessary; and the transit of such vessels through the canal shall be effected with the least possible delay, in accordance with the regulations in force, and with only such intermission as may result from the necessities of the service.

"Prizes shall be in all respects subject to the same rules as vessels of war of the belligerents.

"4. No belligerent shall embark or disembark troops, munitions of war, or warlike materials in the canal, except in case of accidental hindrance of the transit, and in such case the transit shall be resumed with all possible dispatch.

"5. The provisions of this article shall apply to waters adjacent to the canal within 3 marine miles of either end. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not remain in such waters longer than 24 hours at any one time, except in case of distress, and in such case shall depart as soon as possible; but a vessel of war of one belligerent shall not depart within 24 hours from the departure of a vessel of war of the other belligerent.

"6. The plant, establishments, buildings, and all works necessary to the construction, maintenance, and operation of the canal shall be deemed to be part thereof for the purposes of this treaty, and in time of war, as in time of peace, shall enjoy complete immunity from attack or injury by belligerents and from acts calculated to impair their usefulness as part of the canal.

"ARTICLE 4.

"It is agreed that no change of territorial sovereignty or of the international relations of the country or countries traversed by the beforementioned canal shall affect the general principle of neutralization or the obligation of the high contracting parties under the present treaty.

"ARTICLE 5.

"The present treaty shall be ratified by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof, and by His Britannic Majesty; and the ratifications shall be exchanged at Washington or at London at the earliest possible time within six months from the date hereof.

"In faith whereof the respective plenipotentiaries have signed this treaty and thereunto affixed their seals.

"Done in duplicate at Washington the 18th day of November, A. D. 1901.

"JOHN HAY. [SEAL.]
"PAUNCEFOTE. [SEAL.]"

And whereas the said convention has been duly ratified on both parts, and the ratification of the two Governments were exchanged in the city of Washington on the 21st day of February, 1902;

Now, therefore, be it known that I, Theodore Roosevelt, President of the United States of America, have caused the said convention to be made public, to the end that the same and every article and clause thereof may be observed and fulfilled with good faith by the United States and the citizens thereof.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the city of Washington this 22d day of February, A. D. 1902, and of the Independence of the United States the one hundred and twenty-sixth.

[SEAL.] THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

By the President:
JOHN HAY, Secretary of State.

Mr. BARTON. Mr. Speaker, "Millions for defense but not one cent for tribute." If these words of the great Pinckney were uttered to-day some newspapers of the country would at once brand the remark as the statement of a jingo, and yet I feel that the spirit of patriotism and loyalty to the country prevails to-day as it did a century ago; that we are just as jealous of our rights as at any period in the history of our country.

This bill before us to-day for our consideration proposes to yield to England an American right. The right to control our own domestic commerce and to manage a work—the Panama Canal—that has cost us $400,000,000 to construct, and which will cost several millions a year to maintain.

The difference of opinion rests on the different construction of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, England naturally placing an interpretation on this treaty that will extend her rights and domination. The United States, through its various officers for the past several years, maintaining the rights of this Government and which quite recently has been conceded by England, are now asked through this Congress, without any intelligent reason given, to surrender to the English construction, right or wrong. To do so, in my judgment, would foreclose rights that will be precious to this Government in its future administration, and resenting any foreign power laying down rules with which to govern our property I refuse to subscribe to the policy and shall vote against the bill.

England from her early history has been a nation of aggrandizement. Their proud boast that the sun never sets on English territory is true. She has won more territory by sharp diplomacy than by her soldiery. She has never in one instance failed to take advantage of every technical point in a contract, construing it her own way, and always ready to dominate any weak force presented as an obstruction. She attempted in the early history of our country to tax tea, and our statesmen and citizens defended our rights and she failed in the attempt. Again, in 1812 she attempted to dominate our commerce and impress our seamen into her service, but on account of sturdy qualities in our citizens and statesmen she did not succeed. In the boundary dispute between the United States and Canada she again attempted, through diplomatic work, to fix the northern boundary of this country, but she was met with the spirit of "fifty-four forty or fight," and the result was in meeting this sort of American quality and spirit of compromise the boundary was fixed to the satisfaction of both countries without an abject surrender of American interests, and the Government rose higher in the estimation of nations.

I do not propose to devote much time in discussing the economic features of free tolls. It has enthusiastic advocates and enthusiastic opponents, and much argument can be arrayed on either side of the question to support the argument presented. To me the question of free tolls pales into insignificance when compared to yielding to Great Britain's construction of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty and yielding to her equal rights with America after we have used the genius and wealth and force of this country to produce for the world a work that had been declared by other nations as impossible, and one that contains a strategic point not only in commerce but in war.

I can not refrain from saying just a word relative to ship subsidy. Every man that has taken the affirmative side of this question and most vociferously talked for the repeal of the free-tolls provision has endeavored to eliminate the question of treaty rights and based their argument on the economic platform. The economic side of this question is not a new one, nor neither is it a question that has not been considered. It had been considered before I came to Congress by both branches of this body, and a law was passed permitting American coastwise shipping to transport goods through the canal free. This was done after careful consideration, and done on the theory that it would restrain exorbitant freight charges of transcontinental railroads. That it would secure reasonable transportation charges by connecting the American coast liners on both the Pacific and Atlantic Oceans with an all-water carrying service. That it would encourage shipping and shipbuilding, which greatly needed encouragement in our country, and to preclude transcontinental railroads from apparently competing with themselves the law carries a provision that compels all railroad-owned ships to pay tolls. This matter had been so widely discussed and came before our country in such prominence that the Democratic Party wrote this plank in their party platform:

We favor the exemption from toll of American ships engaged in coastwise trade passing through the canal. We also favor legislation forbidding the use of the Panama Canal by ships owned or controlled by railroad carriers engaged in transportation competitive with the canal.

And say at the conclusion:

Our platform is one of principle which we believe to be essential to our national welfare. Our pledges are made to be kept when in office as well as relied upon during the campaign.

And so forth.

And Mr. Bryan, who had much to do in framing that platform, said, in a speech before the house of representatives in Pennsylvania, at Harrisburg, May 13, 1913:

I lay it down as a proposition, and I am prepared to defend it anywhere, that the representative who secures office upon a platform and then holds the office and betrays the people who elect him is a criminal worse than the man who embezzles money intrusted to him.

And also said:

If a man after his election finds that his platform contains something which he can not honestly support what ought he to do? Violate his conscience? No. Then what? He should resign and let the people select a man to do what they would have him do. I desire to announce it as a settled principle not to be questioned in this country that a platform is binding upon every honest man who runs upon that platform.

The position for voting against this plank has been defended from the Democratic side by the statement that it was in conflict with the plank that declares against ship subsidy, but I would invite the attention of Members who take that position to inspect the roll call registering their votes on the Underwood tariff bill, which bill declares for a 5 per cent subsidy to all American ships.

President Wilson also as a candidate has gone on record on this specific proposition, and no one can dispute but that he gave the platform of the Democratic Party very careful study. He said in a speech at Washington Park, N. J., when talking to the farmers of that vicinity:

One of the great objects in cutting that great ditch across the Isthmus of Panama is to allow farmers who are near the Atlantic to ship to the Pacific by way of the Atlantic ports. Now, at present there are no ships to do that and one of the bills pending, passed, I believe, yesterday by the Senate as it had passed the House, provides for free tolls for American ships through that canal and prohibits any ship from passing through which is owned by an American railroad company. You see the object of that don't you? We don't want the railroads to compete with themselves because we understand that kind of competition. We want water carriage to compete with the land carriage, so as to be perfectly sure that you are going to get better rates around the canal than you would across the continent.

So you can see I have very high authority for believing that the Canadian Pacific and other transcontinental lines are intensely interested in this question of tolls and nearly every periodical that I have seen calling attention of the people to ship subsidy carries also an account, usually on the front page, of the railroads of the country losing great money and asking the Interstate Commerce Commission to grant them higher rates.

The rule that causes the disagreement is clause 1 of rule 3 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, which reads as follows:

The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

Who made these rules? The preamble says "the United States adopts as a basis of the neutralization of such ship canal the following rules," and so forth. Now, if the United States adopts these rules to govern all nations it seems to me weak to say that these rules also apply to her. If I own a tract of land adjacent to the city of Grand Island, Nebr., and this land lies in such a position as to cause the farmers beyond it to drive out of their way to reach the city and I conclude at my own expense to build a road straight through for my own convenience and also for the convenience of my neighbors, and I say in a set of rules that I adopt that this road shall be free and open to the traveling public of all the citizens of this country observing these rules on terms of entire equality, and so forth, and then should lay down a set of rules governing trespassing, upkeep, and things material, do you think from an equitable or legal standpoint that any man would question but that I had superior rights?

We are told that we must make this surrender for our national honor. The law exempting American coastwise ships from tolls has been in effect since early in 1912. The Democratic Party, by their platform, approved it, and their candidates in speeches approved it. The Progressive Party wrote a plank favoring the law in their platform. Roosevelt, Taft, and many other Republicans in administrative offices approved it. The people, by their vote on the platform declaration, approved it. Are we now to say that those forces all stood for national dishonor?

This country has complained and condemned Republicans for boss and gag rule, and yet we now have a bill presented for our consideration that can not be amended, and a special rule is brought in limiting the time of debate and forbidding amendment. This action was approved by the Democratic majority, but I do not believe that such procedure will be approved by the Democratic Party. Are Members of this body simply automatons, to move just when the President pulls the string? Do the voters of this great country send Representatives to this, the greatest body on earth, just for the purpose of having him obey the mandate of one man? If so, our theory of government is wrong, and we should have an absolute monarchy, having our laws made by mandates handed down from this power and doing away with legislative expense.

I can not understand how Democrats, who united solidly with the Republican minority, and who were applauded by the people for their action in taking away from the Speaker absolute and autocratic powers, can come now with this power transferred and put their stamp of approval on such action.

I am not governed in this matter by politics, and want to, right here, make this record that under no Speaker or President or any other authority would I be so disloyal to the interests of my people and my country as to unite in actions of this kind, which absolutely robs a Member of this House of his individuality, independence of thought, and independence of action.

A roll call in the House of Representatives on the Hensley resolution proves that not only I but nearly every man on this floor wants peace; but for my part, while I want peace, I do not want it at the price of disloyalty to the instructions of the voters of this country and meek subservience to English power. I would vote for arbitration. We have taught and preached that for years, but I will not vote to take an English construction on a question already passed upon by our statesmen and people.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, probably at no time in the history of this country has there been such a difference of opinion among learned men in public and private life, regardless of party affiliations, as exists at this time in regard to the meaning of a treaty or as to economic questions, such as are involved in the bill now under consideration. Men of national reputation as lawyers and with long experience in this and the other branch of Congress are unable to agree upon the exact meaning of section 1, article 3, of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, ratified in 1901, with reference to vessels entering the Panama Canal, which is as follows:

The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise.

I believe that a treaty between nations is just as binding as a contract between individuals, and that their provisions should be as conscientiously observed; but at the same time, when we sincerely and honestly believe that we are not obligated to perform a condition insisted upon by the other party to a contract, we should not be influenced to change our opinion simply because of the contention of the opposite party. Feeling confident that the present law exempting our coastwise vessels from payment of tolls through our own canal is not infringing our treaty with England, I shall vote against the repeal of the law.

I have no doubt the President is conscientious in his views, otherwise he would not repudiate the plank in the platform committing the party to free tolls. I have no sympathy with those who have heaped criticism upon the President because of the reversal of his position on this question, believing that he is acting from conscientious and patriotic motives, and that he is just as sincere in his contention as those who are opposing him in his desire to have this law repealed. I do think that it is unfortunate that during the campaign he sought the support of the people on a plank of the platform which he now repudiates.

I was somewhat surprised at his remarkable declaration in his message to Congress, as follows:

The large thing to do is the only thing we can afford to do—a voluntary withdrawal from a position everywhere questioned and misunderstood. We ought to reverse our action without raising the question whether we are right or wrong, and so once more deserve our reputation for generosity and for the redemption of every obligation, without quibble or hesitation.

This statement implies that we should confess ourselves to be wrong, whether or not we are wrong, and that we should comply with the suggestion of Great Britain that the law exempting our vessels from tolls be repealed, with the hope of elevating ourselves in the estimation of foreign countries.

So far as I am advised, no other nation is asking that our position on this question be reversed. The President may have reasons which appear to be sufficient to him for repealing this law, but his failure to impart these reasons to Congress has left its Members in the dark, and it is not surprising that they do not feel warranted, in the absence of more detailed information, to reverse their views on the canal-tolls question.

In all questions involving the foreign policy of the administration, I feel impelled to support the President from patriotic motives, but after a careful perusal of the treaties, and after listening to the arguments for and against the repeal of the law providing for exemption of tolls for our coastwise vessels, I am convinced that Congress made no mistake in passing this law nearly two years ago.

In questions of such vast importance as the one now under consideration we naturally have great confidence in the judgment of great men who are versed in statecraft in this country and in England. For over half a century an interoceanic canal has been contemplated, and I quote from what some of our Presidents have said in regard to uniting the two oceans.

President Grant said:

I commend an American canal on American soil to the American people.

President Hayes said:

The policy of this country is a canal under American control. The United States can not consent to surrender this control to any European power. It is the right and duty of the United States to assert and maintain such supervision and authority over any interoceanic canal across the isthmus that connects North and South America as will protect our national interests.

Our national policy, now more than ever, calls for its control by this Government

All of these utterances indicate that it was always the intention to construct a canal over which we were to have complete jurisdiction.

President Harrison said:

The British chargé d'affaires, Mr. Innes, less than two years ago said, in speaking of the treaty in an official note:

If the trade should be so regulated as to make it certain that only coastwise traffic, which is reserved for the United States vessels, would be benefited by this exemption, it may be that no objection could be taken.

Another distinguished Englishman, Mr. Cox-Sinclair, in an article in the London Law Magazine and Review, said:

The United States can support its action on the precise words of the material articles of the treaty; its case is strengthened by reference to the preamble and context, and its case is difficult to challenge on the grounds of national justice.

Another well-known and learned international English lawyer, Mr. C. A. Hereschoff-Bartlett, said:

The treaty could never have been intended to prevent the Federal Government from arranging and regulating its domestic or coastwise commerce and its use and enjoyment of its own property as it saw fit. The use of the words "vessels of war" shows plainly that the word "vessel" as used refers only and exclusively to those of all nations other than those of the United States, and that the word "nations" was restricted to foreign nations; that is to say, nations foreign to the United States.

It is also interesting to observe that many of the United States Senators who participated in the approval of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty have stated that it was understood that the treaty left the United States in complete control of the tolls upon its own vessels.

The memorandum made by Secretary Hay in presenting the treaty which he negotiated is as follows:

The whole theory of the treaty is that the canal is to be an entirely American canal. The enormous cost of construction is to be borne by the United States alone. When constructed it is to be exclusively the property of the United States, and is to be managed, controlled, and defended by it.

In 1912 former President Taft said:

After full examination of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty and of the treaty which preceded it, I feel confident that the exemption of the coastwise vessels of the United States from tolls and the imposition of tolls on vessels of all nations engaged in the foreign trade is not a violation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

Former President Roosevelt in January, 1913, said:

I believe that the position of the United States is proper as regards this coastwise traffic. I think that we have the right to free bona fide coastwise traffic from tolls. I think that this does not interfere with the rights of any other nation, because no ships but our own can engage in coastwise traffic, so that there is no discrimination against other ships when we relieve the coastwise traffic from tolls.

On August 15, 1912, President Wilson himself made the following statement:

One of the great objects in cutting that great ditch across the Isthmus of Panama is to allow farmers who are near the Atlantic to ship to the Pacific by way of the Atlantic ports.

Now, at present there are no ships to do that, and one of the bills pending—passed, I believe, yesterday by the Senate, as it had passed the House—provides for free tolls for American ships through that canal and prohibits any ship from passing through which is owned by any American railroad company. You see the object of that, don't you? We don't want the railroads to compete with themselves, because we understand that kind of competition. We want water carriage to compete with land carriage, so as to be perfectly sure that you are going to get better rates around the canal than you would across the continent.

If the British interpretation of the treaty is correct, then in time of war, when the United States is a belligerent, the United States could not blockade its own canal, and its representatives at Panama must open the locks and escort through the canal a hostile and foreign fleet intent upon making an attack upon our own seacoast. In short, if the United States should become a belligerent it could not use its own canal for naval and military purposes, and the canal would be of no more strategic value to it than it would be to its enemy.

Is it not unreasonable to suppose that when the United States entered into this treaty it intended to subject itself to such a danger and to limit its right of self-defense in this way? Yet, if the treaty is to be interpreted as the British Government and the administration contend it should be interpreted, this result naturally follows.

If, for the sake of argument, we concede that the words "all nations" as used in the treaty do include the United States, it is still clear that the act exempting coastwise trade from tolls does not violate the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. It is settled under our navigation laws that foreign nations can not compete with the United States in coastwise trade. This law is similar to that which exists in other nations, and excludes foreign nations from engaging in coastwise trade. The tolls law treats the foreign commerce of the United States and the foreign commerce of every other nation upon terms of absolute equality. It provides that American vessels engaged in foreign trade shall be subject to like tolls as those which the law imposes upon the vessels of other foreign nations engaged in foreign trade. The only exemption which is made is one that in no way discriminates against foreign nations. The exemption relates merely to American vessels engaged in coastwise trade.

So that it is evident that we have treated our foreign commerce and that of foreign nations upon terms of entire equality. So far as exemption of coastwise trade is concerned, it is purely a regulation of our own domestic commerce.

The Panama Canal is an American waterway and not an international body of water.

We have constructed the Panama Canal with our own money upon our own land, with a view of having it in our complete control in order that we may improve our commerce and widen our influence in the business world. For the same reason we have spent hundreds of millions of our money in improving the great waterways of our country, notably the Mississippi River, and while our Democratic friends express themselves as opposed to subsidies, it is to be observed that they are constantly clamoring for appropriations for river and harbor improvements in their districts. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that there is no more reason for requiring our coastwise vessels to pay toll going through the Panama Canal than that we should require them to pay tolls in passing up or down any river or entering any harbor which was made navigable or improved at the expense of the United States.

About $13,000,000 a year is made by Great Britain from tolls in the Suez Canal, nearly three-fourths of which goes to her shipping as a subsidy. Is it not probable that she may pass a law subsidizing her shipping which will pass through the Panama Canal to the extent of the tolls which they are required to pay? If this should be done, and other nations should follow her example with reference to their own vessels, our coastwise vessels would be placed at a great disadvantage if we did not exempt them from tolls.

The United States insists on having exclusive control of its domestic affairs, and its coastwise trade should in no way concern England or any other country. The American ports and American vessels belong to American citizens and the activities of our coastwise trade do not in any way interfere with the activities of the vessels of other nations. It is difficult therefore to understand why Great Britain should be concerned in regard to this question and we are left to conjecture the reasons for her insistence that the law providing for tolls for our coastwise vessels be repealed.

Ever since the first proposal was made to unite the two oceans the argument has been advanced that it would make it possible to carry our produce to a good market at less expense, and that a large proportion of the saving would be divided between the producer and the consumer. If our coastwise vessels are required to pay tolls for going through our own canal, the hopes of the people for a lowering of prices on commodities will have been shattered, and the competition which we had expected between transcontinental railroads and the shipping by water will be a delusion. If the present law remains upon the statute books, shipping and shipbuilding will be greatly encouraged, and reasonable transportation charges will be assured by making possible an all-water transportation service from one side of the continent to the other.

This entire question is succinctly stated in an editorial in the Kimberly (Idaho) Call, as follows:

Not only does almost every jurist of repute in the United States Senate take the position that the free-tolls clause of the Panama Canal act does not violate the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, but here is the British Law Review, one of the authorities of the United Kingdom, giving expression to the same view. Opinions may differ on almost every subject under the sun, but it seems to us little short of idiotic for any man to argue that an American ship carrying American cargo from one American port to another American port can not be exempted from tolls in a canal built by the United States, owned by the United States, defended by the United States, maintained by the United States, and lying wholly within United States territory. We have just as much right to handle the matter of canal tolls without interference from the rest of the world as we have to regulate railroad rates wholly within our boundaries. And that about sums up the case.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I wish to enter my earnest protest against what I conceive to be the surrender of a great right to England without reasonable excuse or justification. That was a singular spectacle witnessed by this House not many days ago, when the President of the United States came in person and in a very brief message, delivered orally, asked the Congress of the United States to reverse their deliberate action and repeal that portion of the act of August 24, 1912, which secures to the American coastwise trade free passage through the Panama Canal, built and owned by the American people. I will not yield to anyone in the matter of duty to him, whoever he may be, that occupies the high place of President of the United States. If I had voted for him, he would indeed be my President, but when elected this fact becomes insignificant, for he then becomes the President of the whole people, and as such is the Chief Magistrate of my country and my President. I will therefore refer to him and his message in terms of respect. I will not question his motives. I have no question as to his honesty of purpose. But I do criticize the method and substance of his request, and my criticism of the substance is based upon historical facts and a fair interpretation of the treaty.

The President of the United States urged upon Congress the repeal of this section of the act of 1912, not upon the basis of his personal views but upon the ground that—

We ought to reverse our action without raising the question whether we were right or wrong, and so once more deserve our reputation for generosity and for the redemption of every obligation without quibble or hesitation.

I ask this of you in support of the foreign policy of the administration. I shall not know how to deal with other matters of even greater delicacy and nearer consequence if you do not grant it to me in ungrudging measure.

It is true that he did advance as reasons existing in his own judgment two things: First, that the exemption constituted a mistaken economic policy, and, second, that it was in plain contravention of the treaty with Great Britain concluded on November 18, 1901. But the President does not urge upon us his personal views, and so declared in his message. Therefore we are not asked to make this repeal on the ground that it involves a mistaken economic policy, nor are we asked to do so because, in his judgment, it seems to be a contravention of the treaty. We are, however, asked to take this very important step upon the ground that outside of the United States there is no difference of opinion concerning the allegation that this legislation is a contravention of the treaty. With this last reason I must respectfully take issue. Already the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD shows instances in which the position of America with respect to the interpretation of this treaty is questioned across the water. High authority in England and Germany and elsewhere have reviewed the whole subject, and concluded that the position of the United States is not only arguable but conclusively correct. The basis of the request is clearly and solely the theory that we ought to yield our interpretation to the interpretation of others abroad and do what might be considered a generous thing, and thereby place ourselves before the world as having no disposition to quibble over the language of a treaty, but as a people willing to make a sacrifice so that we may appear in the eyes of Europe to be "good fellows." This, the President said, would give him support in the handling of his foreign policy in other matters of greater delicacy and nearer consequence. What those other matters are we do not know. The Congress is left entirely in the dark. No explanation is vouchsafed, but we are asked willy-nilly and ungrudgingly to make this great reversal of our action. The vital question involved is not whether a toll should be charged upon vessels flying the American flag so much as it is, Shall we reverse our former action and yield to the interpretation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty which England presses upon our attention? This naturally excludes all question of economic policy, even though that question exists in the mind of the President in this connection. It is clearly out of place and entitled to no consideration whatever, for the point of this legislation and the effect of this legislation will be to declare that the treaty forbids our permitting our own vessels to pass through the canal without paying toll. Men may differ as to the economic policy, but in my humble judgment men have no right to differ upon the question of what the treaty of 1901 means in this respect. The objections of Great Britain should not be recognized unless we are convinced as a Nation that the treaty makes it unlawful or dishonorable to permit the use of the canal in the way provided for in the act of 1912.

In passing, may I be permitted to say one thing in criticism of the President's methods? I think in the President's management of this and other legislative matters there is presented to the country an invasion of the fundamental laws of our land. We have a Government that is divided into three parts, each one equal to the other. We have the legislative, judicial, and the executive—the legislative to make the laws, the judicial to interpret the laws, and the executive to carry them into effect, with the additional power in the Executive of the right of veto in case he deems them against the public welfare or unconstitutional. But to-day we see one man exerting his personal influence and power in a measure—and I say it respectfully—to coerce Congress into doing his bidding. This may be done to-day, and probably is in his opinion being done for wise purposes, but let us remember that it is dangerous to break down the lines of demarcation between the several branches of our Government. Particularly is this true when the invasion comes from the executive department of the Government into the legislative. The question of patronage plays a large part. So much in our political institutions depends on gift of place that men are frequently robbed of their independence and their self-judgment for fear of giving offense and perhaps forfeiting their claim to appointments and the privilege and enjoyment of patronage. For the Executive to dictate what bills shall be passed by Congress and for a caucus to meet and determine to enforce his will, leaving scarcely any room for debate and none for amendment, is an erroneous method and one that will return some day to plague those who invented it. It is certainly unusual, and would appear to me to be a subject for fair criticism, for the Chief Executive to come and present without argument or reason a personal request, a personal plea, for the adoption of a specific piece of legislation.

The action of the majority of the House in adopting the report of the Committee on Rules, which limited debate and excluded all amendment while considering this momentous question, is also subject to grave criticism. No question has been discussed in the present Congress which nearly approaches in magnitude and importance this question of repeal, involving, as it does, an interpretation by us of a treaty. It is the decision of a question which is more far-reaching than the mere exclusion of our coastwise ships from free passage through the canal. It involves to a degree the surrender of our sovereignty over our own property and over a canal which has been constructed through the use of American money by the aid of American skill. No wonder the distinguished Speaker of the House made his fearless statement in behalf of fair play while the rules of procedure reported by the committee were being considered. The report involved the adoption of a rule similar to those which he had always fought in legislation and against which he achieved victories for his party. His manliness and courage are worthy of all admiration. Surely, when considering a question as great as the one now under consideration, with the power behind the majority to always move the previous question and enforce it, no harm could come from debating the question to its fullest extent, permitting interrogation and answer to flow, so that the finer points might be brought out clearly. It was cruelty to confine men to 5, 10, or 15 minute speeches in which to attempt to compass the broad field opened up for discussion. But we are in the midst of the debate, and the Committee on Rules has triumphed, although opposed by such eminent leaders as MANN and CLARK and UNDERWOOD and MURDOCK.

In considering this question it is well for us to remember that the American people have completed one of the greatest works of any age—one infinitely greater than the Suez Canal, infinitely more promising in its results to the world, and of vaster importance to us in America. We have practically finished what was at one time thought to be impossible—the great Panama Canal. It was American courage, American endurance that did it. It was the skill and ability of our Army officers and engineers and surgeons that enabled us to go into this disease-ridden territory and conquer from it one of the greatest victories ever won from nature.

This canal has been the dream of the centuries. As early as 1528, the Spaniards petitioned Charles the Fifth of Spain to make a cut across this Isthmus, so as to connect the great Atlantic with the great Pacific. But until recent years it was only a dream. Perhaps it required some great and startling event to crystallize our thought and transmute it into a fixed purpose. You will recall, just before the Spanish War, the discussions pro and con, the uncertainty and vacillation of our thoughts. But once the explosion of the Maine illuminated the southern sky there was no longer uncertainty or doubt. In its place came a great resolve, and the Nation could not be held back from the inevitable War with Spain upon which we entered. That was the startling incident which largely brought about that result. And so an event occurred which brought our uncertain thoughts of the canal to a head and transformed them into living action. You remember that wonderful story, how a great battleship traced a pathway over the waters of the calm Pacific; passed through the Straits of Magellan, and plowed up the waters of the Atlantic in her mad haste to get to the scene where soon the Navy of the United States would be involved in deadly conflict with its Spanish foe. The Nation watched with wonder and anxiety as day after day was consumed in this marvelous trip. When is was accomplished, and the great ship took her place beside her sister ships in the Battle of Santiago, every American heart was filled with pride and every man rejoiced over the wonderful achievement. This event presented more than a picture of a racing ship to our statesmen and the American people. It pointed out the weakness of our position, owing to our extended coast lines, in time of war or great national peril. It taught us that something must be done and done quickly, in order that we might not be in a defenseless position, but be able at once, if necessary, to unite the East and the West and make them one in any struggle against any foe that might assail us. It was not the passage of the ships of commerce from ocean to ocean that moved our people to action. The great dominant thought was one of military strategic importance. It was the question of protection for our country more than the question of commerce. Beyond all this, of course, lay the other thought of benefiting our commerce and securing for the traffic of our country the cheap water rates which would help in the distribution of them to the consuming public. But we must never forget that the building of the canal, as finally determined upon, was largely for the purpose of relieving our helplessness with respect to joining our Navy in the eastern waters with those in the western ocean, or vice versa. With our Navy in or about the Panama Canal, with a part of our Navy perhaps to rendezvous in the great lake in the heart of the Isthmus, ready to pass out on either side, a great element of strength would be added to our power and greater ability given to us in the line of self-defense, for we are not an aggressive Nation, we are not given to seeking a quarrel, but we desire always to be prepared to defend our land, our liberty, and our rights to the utmost limit of human power.

What was the situation when the spectacular performance of the Oregon took place? There had been speeches delivered, some little action taken in Congress, but nothing very definite had ever been done. Men were divided in opinion as to where it was best to locate the great canal. Some pointed toward the Nicaraguan route in Central America as the safer and the better one. Some had fears of the pestilence and the disease that might smite the canal builders in an attempt to cross the Isthmus. Yet others thought that this was the place at which it should be constructed. The skill of our Army surgeons and the sanitary methods adopted by our Army officers have solved the question of peril from disease and made the Panama route a safe and advantageous one, and perhaps from all considerations a more acceptable one. The original scheme, however, was to build through Nicaragua. It was not a scheme by which the Government was to build the canal, but one in which a corporation was to be protected and encouraged or aided and which contemplated that it was to be constructed through alien territory. In the original scheme as provided for by the Clayton-Bulwer treaty neither of the great powers was to acquire any territory, and England agreed to abandon her pretended claims to everything in Central America, Nicaragua, and Costa Rica, including the Mosquito Coast. Greytown was covered by England's pretended claim, and it was to be the Atlantic terminus of the canal. It was this position of affairs which caused negotiations to be entered into with England and which resulted in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty of 1850. Anyone reading that treaty must, if he reads it dispassionately and without prejudice, conclude that it was a compact by which the United States and Great Britain formed, so to speak, a partnership under which they were to tender protection and encouragement to anyone who would undertake the building of the canal. It did not contemplate that either of the great powers who were parties to the contract would build for themselves. It was a canal to be built on neutral territory, or, to speak more explicitly, on alien soil. Under such circumstances it might have been and was perfectly proper that the various clauses which were introduced in that treaty should have been placed within its four corners. Among other things, the contracting parties agreed that neither one would attempt to acquire an interest in Central America, Nicaragua, or Costa Rica, or obtain or exercise sovereignty or control over any land in these countries. It is well to remember in passing that that covenant did not include Panama, for Panama is not a part of any one of the countries named. It does not belong to Central America, but was part of South America. It was part of the State of New Granada, afterwards Colombia, which State is a part of South America. This treaty, in the contractual part of it, was confined to the proposed route named therein by way of the river and the lake across Nicaragua to the Pacific Ocean. In that connection they covenanted that neither of them would own or control anything that could be fortified or made a military basis so as to give undue influence to one over the other.

Did England keep her part of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty? History and the records compel us to answer "No." President Pierce in 1856, in his message to Congress, complained as follows:

> It was with surprise and regret that the United States learned * * * that a military expedition under the authority of the British Government had landed at San Juan del Norte, in the State of Nicaragua, and taken forcible possession of that port, the necessary terminus of any canal or railway across the isthmus within the territories of Nicaragua.
> It did not diminish to us the unwelcomeness of this act on the part of Great Britain to find that she assumed to justify it on the ground of an alleged protectorship of a small and obscure band of uncivilized Indians, whose proper name had even become lost to history, who did not constitute a State capable of territorial sovereignty, either in fact or in right, and all political interest in whom and in the territory they occupied Great Britain had previously renounced by successive treaties with Spain when Spain was sovereign to the country and subsequently with independent Spanish America.

Again, as pointed out in the very able address of ex-Senator Foraker, published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Fifty-first Congress presented an indictment against England, and this indictment was signed by the following distinguished and conservative men: John Sherman (chairman), George F. Edmunds, William P. Frye, William M. Evarts. This indictment, as taken from the unanimously agreed upon report of January 10, 1891, is as follows:

> We think it can be justly affirmed that the convention of 1850 has become obsolete. * * *
> One of the provisions of the convention of 1850 most important to the United States and to the preservation of the republican Governments on this continent was that which declared that neither party to the convention should "occupy or fortify or colonize or assume to exercise any dominion over Nicaragua, Costa Rica, the Mosquito Coast, or any part of Central America."
> At that time the "settlement" of British subjects, as it was called, at the Belize, on the coast of Central America, was of the smallest dimensions and had no substance or form of a territorial dominion. British woodcutters were there under an ancient Spanish license of timber cutting, and nothing more. * * *
> "This was substantially the condition of things when the convention of 1850 was entered into.
> "The next step taken after the convention of 1850 was in 1853, when a legislative assembly was constituted to manage the affairs of the settlement. This was followed by a convention between Great Britain and Guatemala in 1859 for the establishment of the boundaries between what the treaty chose to call 'Her Britannic Majesty's settlement and possessions in the Bay of Honduras' and the territories of Guatemala. * * * By this treaty that which was before a licensed industrial establishment became instantly a possession of the British Crown. The settlement government continued until 1862, when the settlement was declared a colony of the British Crown and a regular colonial establishment was set on foot; and so from that time to this the form and substance of a regular colonial government as a part of Her Majesty's dominions has continued. It is understood that its geographical dominion has been vastly enlarged from the licensed woodcutting limitations and boundaries that existed in 1850. All this has taken place systematically and persistently, notwithstanding the declaration of Her Majesty's Government that it should not 'colonize or assume or exercise any dominion over * * * the Mosquito Coast or any part of Central America.' * * *
> "In view of all these considerations the committee is of opinion that the United States is at present under no obligation, measured either by the terms of the convention, the principles of public law, or good morals, to refrain from promoting, in any way that it may deem best for its just interests, the construction of this canal, without regard to anything contained in the convention of 1850."

It will be evident to everyone, from the record, that England had forfeited all her rights under the treaty of 1850, not only by the lapse of half a century without anything being done in furtherance or pursuance of the terms of the treaty, but also by her aggressive acts in violation of the terms of the treaty. This Nation was not bound by it in any degree whatever. It is true that the Hay-Paunceforte treaty, subsequently adopted, contained a reference to the Clayton-Bulwer treaty in the preamble, wherein, after reciting the object of the new treaty to be the removal of any objection "which may arise out of the convention of the 19th of April, 1850, commonly called the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, to the construction of such canal under the auspices of the Government of the United States without impairing the 'general principle' of neutralization established in Article 8 of that convention."

This, however, did not revive or restore the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. On the contrary, the Hay-Pauncefote treaty provided:

The high contracting parties agree that the present treaty shall supersede the aforementioned convention of the 19th of April, 1850.

What was it, therefore, that was preserved out of this old violated and obsolete treaty of 1850? Only this: A declaration that in that old treaty the two contracting parties had not only desired "to accomplish a particular object, but also to establish a general principle, they hereby agree to extend their protection by treaty stipulation to any other practicable communications, by railway or canal, across the Isthmus which connects North and South America, or by way of Tehuantepec." The "particular object" referred to can mean none other than the Nicaraguan Canal, to which the treaty related. The "general principle" which they seek to establish with reference to a canal by way of Panama or Tehuantepec is not defined, but the contracting parties "hereby agree to extend their protection by treaty stipulations to any other practicable communications."

This article 8 is nothing more nor less than an agreement thereafter to make another treaty—in other words, an agreement to make, at a future date, another agreement. Such a provision is nothing more than a mere declaration and is not a part of the contract itself. There is no law that would enforce an agreement to make an agreement, and it has nothing whatever behind it but a moral obligation. In point of fact, for half a century no effort was made to make any other treaty stipulation. England not only violated the treaty of 1850, but had made her plans in connection with the Suez Canal and had acquired her interests therein, so that the building of a canal across any part of America no longer had the same interest for her that it had in 1850, when she was seeking for a quick passage to the Indies for the protection of her outlying possessions.

The Clayton-Bulwer treaty was intended to apply to a canal through Nicaragua, constructed, owned, and operated by parties other than the nations who were parties to the treaty. The reference in article 8 to a canal across the Isthmus of Panama does not embody a binding stipulation, but, as expressly stated therein, is left to be dealt with and reduced to definite contractual obligations by some future treaty. It was simply a joint agreement between the contracting parties to extend protection to any person or party who would first secure authority to the local Governments through whose territory the canal would pass, and such persons were to be protected by the Governments of the United States and Great Britain, besides providing that neither nation should obtain or maintain for itself any exclusive control over said ship canal. It is clearly manifest that neither nation was to build the canal. It would be incongruous for a nation to pledge its protection to itself. If it had been intended to pledge the aid of one nation to the other in case either was expected to build the canal, surely appropriate language would have been used. In article 5 it was provided that "if the person or company undertaking or managing the same" shall make unfair discriminations, and so forth, either Government may withdraw protection. Such a provision and mandatory words in the treaty are only applicable where neither nation was to build or own the canal. It would not be likely that if one of the nations did build or own that such a provision, in case of unfair discrimination, as the "withdrawal of its protection," would be inserted. It is perfectly clear, therefore, that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty did not deal with the ownership of the Nicaragua Canal by either of the treaty nations, except substantially to prohibit it. It follows from this that every provision having this object in view would be highly inapplicable to a case where the canal was built over the property of one of the nations and paid for out of its treasury. In addition, protection and guaranty of neutrality were to be tendered to the owners of the canal as an option to be availed of by their own free choice, not as an obligation to be enforced by the treaty nations against unwilling owners. And if this option were accepted by the owner, the only penalty or remedy against him for refusing to comply with the conditions on which protection was offered would be the withdrawal of protection.

It was not even obligatory on both nations to withdraw. One might withdraw and the other might decline to withdraw and still continue to offer protection, notwithstanding the breach of contract. The treaty fully recognized and took into account the moral and legal rights of the owner of the canal, which were inherent in him as owner. Among these was the right to regulate the rates of traffic over his property. He was not to be deprived of any rights. The treaty offered benefits, and these were believed to be so important and so valuable that no owner of the canal could afford to refuse them, in view of the reasonable terms upon which they were offered. If he did refuse, however, he would be within his rights. Upon this point it will be interesting to cite the language of article 5:

The contracting parties further engage that when the said canal shall have been completed they will protect it from interruption, seizure, or unjust confiscation, and that they will guarantee the neutrality thereof, so that the said canal may forever be open and free and the capital invested therein secure. Nevertheless, the Governments of the United States and Great Britain, in according their protection to the construction of the said canal, and guaranteeing its neutrality and security when completed, always understand that this protection and guaranty are granted conditionally, and may be withdrawn by both Governments, or either Government, if both Governments or either Government should deem that the persons or company undertaking or managing the same adopt or establish such regulations concerning the traffic thereupon as are contrary to the spirit and intention of this convention, either by making unfair discriminations in favor of the commerce of one of the contracting parties over the commerce of the other or by imposing oppressive exactions or unreasonable tolls upon passengers, vessels, goods, wares, merchandise, or other articles. Neither party, however, shall withdraw the aforesaid protection and guaranty without first giving six months' notice to the other.

There was no provision in this treaty requiring either Government to forbid its vessels of commerce to accept such discrimination or to penalize them. The sole instrument of enforcement—the only penalty—was withdrawal of protection by the aggrieved nation, or both.

So far as the treaty is concerned, the canal might have been built by a British corporation or an American corporation, or, indeed, it might have been built by one of the Central American States. Either Government might have taken all of the bonds issued to build such a canal, and also become a holder of the stock, if stock were issued, provided always that neither should obtain exclusive control. It should be noticed that the right of the owner of such a canal as was contemplated by the treaty of 1850 to use the canal without the payment of tolls, and without conferring the same privilege on others, is clearly conceded. The only thing forbidden was making unfair discriminations in favor of the commerce of one of the nonowning treaty nations over the commerce of the other, or imposing oppressive exactions or unreasonable tolls. There was no limit upon the right of the owner. If a South American or Central American State had obtained the financial aid requisite to enable it to do so, had undertaken to build and had constructed a canal, and acquired the protection and the guaranty of neutrality under the treaty of 1850 from the parties to that treaty, there is not one line or syllable in the treaty, from beginning to end, that would have regulated or attempted to regulate the matter of the ships of the owner nation passing through or using the canal by the payment of any different toll from that charged to the protecting nations; or, either by the failure to collect tolls at all, or, in other words, to permit its own vessels flying its own flag, to use the canal freely and without charge.

So much reference has been made to this old treaty that it is important for us to carry in mind its provisions, and to what they were intended to be applicable. The Clayton-Bulwer treaty attempted nothing more than to establish the condition that in order to gain protection and the guaranty of neutrality the owner should treat nonowners alike.

Under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty there was no provision forbidding either Great Britain or the United States to pay the canal tolls of their vessels of commerce. Either nation could have granted to their own ships a subsidy, for services or otherwise, equal to the tolls without violating the terms of the treaty in any respect. The other nation could not complain of such action. Neither could either of the contracting parties complain if the owner relieved its own commerce from the payment of all tolls.

Mr. ELIHU ROOT, in the Senate debate, stated that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty prohibited the United States to construct and operate a canal across the Isthmus of Panama, or to occupy or acquire territory there for canal purposes, and that but for the enabling provisions of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty the United States could not have built or acquired ownership of the canal. Not only was this statement incorrect, but it is without even colorable excuse in the language of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. The treaty is absolutely silent upon this matter. In the stipulations contained in that treaty the only prohibition the most careful examination can discover is that which is defined in the following language:

Neither will ever erect or maintain any fortifications commanding the same—

"The same" refers to the Nicaragua Canal—or in the vicinity thereof, or occupy or fortify or colonize or assume or exercise any dominion over Nicaragua, Costa Rica, the Mosquito Coast, or any part of Central America.

The Isthmus of Panama never formed any part of the territory of any Central American State. It was the connecting link between North and South America—a part of the property of a South American State. The reference to article 8 clearly demonstrates that this language was not intended to cover a canal either by way of Panama or Tehuantepec. Article 8, as heretofore pointed out, does not by its terms purport to create treaty rights and obligations, but only expresses a tentative purpose to negotiate a treaty thereafter; and the provision in article 8 therein of the building of a canal by way of Panama and Tehuantepec to be the subject of future treaty stipulations shows that neither of these two routes was contemplated in the binding or obligatory portions of the treaty. Everyone will admit that an agreement to make an agreement can not be enforced in law.

Before passing from the Clayton-Bulwer treaty it is only proper to remark that Great Britain gave nothing for it but a promise, which was broken. It surrendered nothing. But on the contrary, in 1862, when we were busily engaged in our Civil War, it perfected its hold upon British Honduras, part of the territory over which it was to give up sovereignty. Those who prate about a consideration having passed are without fact upon which to base such a statement. There was therefore no sacrifice made by England. The only vestige of this old treaty that is saved from being superseded absolutely and unquestionably is the "general principle" declared for in article 8, and our criticisms upon it may be summed up as follows:

First. It contains no binding stipulation, but a promise to make an agreement in the future. By reason of its relations to and connection with the other parts of the treaty it can be safely asserted that it does not apply to a case which involves the ownership of the canal. The agreement to extend protection and guarantee neutrality involves, necessarily, some owner who will receive the protection and neutrality; and, finally, there is no condition in article 8 that charges on traffic shall be the same for all persons. The United States did not need the aid of the new treaty for any purpose connected with the Panama Canal. It could have owned and controlled that canal and could have imposed upon other nations any terms it saw fit for the privilege of using it. The United States was not bound to avail itself of any grant of protection or guarantee of neutrality at the hands of Great Britain, even if article 8 had created a contractual obligation, for the United States could only have stood committed jointly with Great Britain to grant protection to a corporation or private person who might own the canal.

Passing over some intermediate matters, I would call attention to the next treaty. This treaty was not adopted at once. The Hay-Pauncefote treaty when first presented was in such objectionable shape that the Senate of the United States passed amendments to it. When it went back to England with those amendments that country rather curtly rejected the amendments and the negotiations fell. It was at that time that the committee of the Senate of the United States on foreign relations, whose report I have heretofore referred to, after a careful and laborious investigation, found that, in their judgment, the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was no longer in force. John Hay, who negotiated the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, knew this, and I am sure that with the watchfulness over developments in every part of the world exercised by the diplomatic corps of England she was well advised of what had been done in that committee. Perhaps in consequence of this it was that negotiations were subsequently resumed, when another form of treaty was presented; and this form, which left out those things which the Senate objected to, was adopted by our country, and later ratifications between the two great contracting parties were exchanged and the treaty became the law of the land.

I would ask the attention of every thoughtful American citizen to this fact: That at the time that treaty was thus finally ratified and adopted the United States did not own a single foot of land in Central America, or even in Panama. The title to land in Panama was all subsequently obtained. The new treaty, as has already been noticed in the recital of it, provided that it was the intent of the contracting parties to preserve the "general principle" of article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty with reference to the neutralization of the canal. This clause has already been discussed and shown to be a mere agreement to make an agreement at some future time. This was mere recital. The contractual part of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty provided:

The high contracting parties agree that the present treaty shall supersede the aforementioned convention of the 19th April, 1850.

It is agreed that the canal may be constructed under the auspices of the Government of the United States, either directly at its own cost, or by gift or loan of money to individuals or corporations, or through subscription to or purchase of stock or shares; and that, subject to the provisions of the present treaty, the said Government shall have and enjoy all the rights incident to such construction, as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal.

ARTICLE 3.

The United States adopts, as the basis of the neutralization of such ship canal, the following rules, substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople, signed the 28th October, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Canal; that is to say:

"1. The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions of charges of traffic, or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

"2. The canal shall never be blockaded, nor shall any right of war be exercised, nor any act of hostility be committed within it. The United States, however, shall be at liberty to maintain such military police along the canal as may be necessary to protect it against lawlessness and disorder.

"3. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not revictual nor take any stores in the canal except so far as may be strictly necessary; and the transit of such vessels through the canal shall be effected with the least possible delay in accordance with the regulations in force, and with only such intermission as may result from the necessities of the service.

"4. No belligerent shall embark or disembark troops, munitions of war, or warlike materials in the canal except in case of accidental hindrance of the transit, and in such case the transit shall be resumed with all possible dispatch.

"5. The provisions of this article shall apply to waters adjacent to the canal, within 3 marine miles of either end. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not remain in such waters longer than 24 hours at any one time except in case of distress, and in such case shall depart as soon as possible; but a vessel of war of one belligerent shall not depart within 24 hours from the departure of a vessel of war of the other belligerent.

"6. The plant, establishments, buildings, and all works necessary to the construction, maintenance, and operation of the canal shall be deemed to be part thereof for the purposes of this treaty, and in time of war as in time of peace shall enjoy complete immunity from attack or injury by belligerents and from acts calculated to impair their usefulness as part of the canal."

The recital in the preamble of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty referring to the "general principles" of neutralization, established in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, is misleading and ineffectual. The "general principle" mentioned in said article was the principle of "protection" against unjust seizure, and so forth, in time of peace as well as of war, and by the civil power as well as the military power. No "general principle" of neutralization could be transplanted from article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, because no such principle was ever incorporated in that article, nor is it available in aid of the definiteness of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. In any event, a mere declaration of "general principles" could not take the place of a contractual obligation. It has been repeatedly held by courts of all jurisdictions, national and international, that a "general principle" can not be enforced or made to operate as a legal obligation.

Assuming, for the sake of argument, that there was some general guaranty of neutrality in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, the United States could not be compelled to accept it when it subsequently became the owner of the canal. As no particular canal is mentioned in the treaty, and by its terms the treaty is declared to apply to a ship canal to connect the "Atlantic and Pacific Oceans by whatever route may be considered expedient," it is obvious that the guaranty of neutrality must be granted to the owner of the canal, whoever he may be, and it is therefore not limited to any particular nation or person, but is available to all the persons who in the event build and own the canal that answers the general description. The guaranty under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was intended only for owners, not parties to the treaty, and was offered to them as an option. Under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty it must also be granted as an option to owners, not parties to the treaty, since it can not lawfully be forced upon them. Under the option the guaranty might either be accepted or rejected by them.

At the time of making the Hay-Pauncefote treaty the field of the Panama Canal was open to all comers. By expressly repealing the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, however, it relieved the United States and Great Britain from certain restrictions interfering with their rights, or the right of either of them, to obtain exclusive control of the Nicaragua Canal. So far as the question of building the Panama Canal was concerned, the permissive provisions of article 2 of the treaty were surplusage and unnecessary. When the treaty was made the United States had not decided what canal should be built, or whether it would aid some corporation or persons to build it, or have it constructed under its own direction. It must also always be remembered that the United States had acquired at that time no national sovereignty over territory on the Isthmus of Panama. From the terms of the treaty and the subsequent act of the United States it is clear that the treaty contemplated the extension of aid to some corporation or persons who might build the canal, and it also contemplated that the canal would be built, in all probability, over alien territory. The very fact that the bases of neutralization quoted in article 3 of the treaty were taken substantially from the convention which provided rules for the government of the Suez Canal confirms this position. The Suez Canal is owned and operated by a corporation. England and France and others are stockholders. The soil over which the canal is constructed is under the dominion of Turkey, and the provisions of the convention of 1888 would readily and properly apply to such a state of facts. They could only apply in the American case to a similar state of facts. Certainly they could have no relation to a case in which a canal should be built by the United States as the owner and constructor of the canal.

The six rules quoted in article 3 by the terms of the article are declared to be the bases on which the United States asserts it will maintain the neutralization of the Panama Zone and Canal.

Passing over the first for a moment, and considering the remaining five, we can not help but be convinced that they apply to a state of war and the neutrality which is incident to a state of war. It can not be denied that they also refer to a condition similar to that which existed with reference to the Suez Canal. Can it be contended for a single moment that "the canal shall never be blockaded"? Surely if an enemy of the United States were to assail us we would have a perfect right to blockade the canal against such enemy, notwithstanding the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

Again, this declaration:

Nor shall any right of war be exercised nor any act of hostility be committed within it.

Is the United States to be limited in this respect? Will she not be able at any time to exercise any right of war or to commit an act of hostility, if need be, in defense of her own domains? Can it be said that the rule with reference to the vessels of "war of a belligerent," that they shall "not revictual" "nor take any stores in the canal except so far as may be strictly necessary," and that they shall be hurried through the canal, applicable to the United States of America in defending her own possessions in the canal? Would any reasonable interpretation of this part of the treaty say that "no belligerent shall embark or disembark troops, munitions of war, or warlike materials in the canal, except in case of accident," applies to the United States of America if she should be engaged in war? The owner certainly is not to be affected by such a rule.

Then, again, it is almost too absurd for argument to say that vessels of war of the owner "shall not remain in such waters longer than 24 hours at any one time, except in case of distress." It is not conceivable that this should apply to the vessels of war of the United States, as the owner of the canal. The spectacle of the United States chasing her own vessels out of the canal at the expiration of 24 hours is beyond the realm of reasonable acceptance. Likewise, the first rule adopted as the basis of the neutralization of such ship canal, wherein it says, "The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and war of all nations observing these rules," can not be claimed to apply to the vessels of war of the United States of America. The owner of the canal can surely send her vessels of war through the canal without the payment of tolls. Why should the Government be compelled to pay tolls to herself? But this rule, when taken in all its verbiage in connection with the context, means only one thing, when applied to the subject of being the "bases of the neutralization," and that is that it is a paragraph which enforces the spirit of equitable treatment, but it is equitable treatment "to all nations observing these rules." The United States is the maker of the rules, and it can not be, by any system of interpretation, argued that the observance of these rules is applicable to the maker, or that the maker will pursue these rules, having declared them to be the rules on which the canal's neutralization shall be based. "All other nations observing these rules" excludes the United States from being comprehended or included within the term "all nations."

I call attention to another thought, which, in my judgment, is of great importance. It is not original with me. It was suggested by a paper written by Justice Seabury, of the Supreme Court of the State of New York. He brings out very sharply and clearly that which the text-writers on international law sustain, that when any basic condition upon which the minds of people to a contract is changed so substantially that they practically no longer exist, the compact or agreement, ipso facto, ends. What effect, then, has the acquisition of territory on the Isthmus and the building and construction of the canal by the United States Government at its own expense upon this Hay-Pauncefote treaty? The Hay-Pauncefote treaty was passed at a time when we owned no land. The very fact that the contracting parties followed the rules and regulations of the Suez Canal showed that they contemplated that a corporation—a private corporation, if you please—would build the canal, and that these rules would then fit properly to a condition which was similar to that which existed with reference to the Suez Canal, built by a private corporation over land owned by Turkey. Is it not perfectly clear to every mind that what must have been in the view of those men who framed the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was that a similar condition was contemplated to that which existed in the case of the Suez Canal? Otherwise why did they borrow the rules and regulations governing that canal?

The American Government showed that this was its own view, for immediately after the promulgation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty it began negotiations with Colombia in order to get the right to cross the Isthmus and have the canal built. A treaty was tentatively agreed upon with Colombia, ratified by the Senate of the United States, but ultimately rejected by the State of Colombia. They demanded $25,000,000 besides what had been provided for in the treaty. Then they raised a question as to their right to grant what was called for in the treaty. It has always been believed, however, that this was only adopted as a reason for holding up the treaty until the additional money demanded should be paid to them. Thereupon the people of the State of Panama, incensed at what took away from them their great advantages, rose in insurrection or rebellion. England, France, and the United States recognized the new Republic of Panama. It was recognized not by the United States alone, but recognized by these European nations. It was a new star that came out in the southern horizon. Panama became a nation. When the government of this new nation was organized, in 1903, we entered into a treaty with it by which Panama sold to us a strip of land crossing the entire Isthmus—10 miles wide, 5 miles on each side of the median line of the canal—land under water, land out of water—and this territory became the absolute property of the United States of America. It became part of our possessions and subject to our sovereignty and control. It is true we have a charge upon it that exists in the nature of the ground rents that are charged upon land in Pennsylvania. An absolute fee is passed to a purchaser and a ground rent reserved. Each party has an absolute fee simple title; there is a fee simple title to the land, and the rental is simply a charge upon the land. We have a charge of the annual payment which is to be made to the Republic of Panama as a charge upon our absolute ownership of the territory that was ceded to the United States.

This, in my judgment, changed the whole aspect of affairs absolutely. The subject matter of the negotiations in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, as I have observed, was the building of a canal somewhere on alien territory by some third party or private corporation aided, if you please, by the United States, to which these rules and regulations of neutrality would fit and apply. But once we became the sovereign owner of that territory, once we began and concluded the digging of this memorable ditch through our own property, the Hay-Pauncefote treaty did not and could not apply, and could have no application, and ipso facto would be abrogated.

But it is perhaps unnecessary to even go so far in sustaining the position of the American Government in this controversy. It can be sustained on the language of the treaty plus the circumstances and conditions and the acts of the parties who made the treaty. It is useless to quote what men, even though they were great statesmen, said upon this occasion or upon that, or what some writer, delivering a message for himself, presented upon this subject. What such people said was only the product of their own minds. They may have said, "We are going to build this canal for the use of all the world." That did not bind us—the people out of whose pockets the money was to come that was to build this canal upon our own territory and under the protection of our own sovereignty. We were not an eleemosynary institution to make such a gift to the universe. What right would our legislators have, out of the pockets of the people, to make such a bountiful gift? When, however, one takes the language of the treaty itself and the constructions that have been placed upon it there is no difficulty in interpreting what it means. If there should be conceded any ambiguity with reference to what the words "all nations" include, under such circumstances, following the well-known legal rule, it might be permissible to refer to the language and utterances of those who framed the treaty; but certainly this rule would not extend the right to take into consideration the irresponsible utterances of statesmen or writers disconnected with the negotiation of the treaty. It is of great significance in this connection to recall that John Hay, while Secretary of State, showed very clearly that he did not regard the Hay-Pauncefote treaty as a barrier to free tolls when the owner was considered, for in the treaty which he negotiated with Panama in November, 1903, promulgated in 1904, he provided that:

The Government of Panama shall have the right to transport over the canal its vessels free from tolls.

Panama was the owner of the territory covered by the treaty. In arranging the terms of the treaty by which we acquired our title he made a binding stipulation for "free tolls" for the ships of that Republic.

In the proposed treaty with Colombia which that country rejected, free tolls for her ships was offered and agreed to by John Hay. This treaty was negotiated prior to the treaty with Panama, and the State of Colombia as the owner would have been entitled to freedom from tolls as the owner.

There are certain words in the first rule of those submitted as the basis for neutralization that must be taken into account and considered with regard to the source from which they came and by whom they were dictated as a part of this treaty. The words "observing these rules" were inserted in the treaty at the request of Lord Lansdowne, and the correspondence that passed between the negotiating powers shows that these words were put in the treaty for a particular purpose. That purpose was to protect England in what might be termed the right to equal treatment with all other nations. The contention of our adversaries in that the words "all nations" include and cover the United States. My position is that they do not include the United States. The treaty says "the canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality." The words "observing these rules" were not in the original text, and Lord Lansdowne wrote:

I must emphatically renew the objection of His Majesty's Government to being bound by stringent rules of neutral conduct not equally binding upon other powers. I would therefore suggest the insertion in rule 1, after the words "all nations," of the words "which shall agree to observe these rules."

Thus it is seen that these words emanated from England's side, for the purpose of making it clear and sure that there was to be an equality between England "and the other powers" who might come in and observe these rules. This correspondence took place immediately after there had been stricken out of the treaty a provision that it should be the duty of the United States to invite other powers to participate in it. That having been stricken out, Lord Lansdowne made this request, which was finally agreed to, and these words appear in this record solely because of that request and for the purpose of making it clear that as between the other nations using the canal and England there should be absolute equality. No implication of reason nor any rule would warrant the inference that the "other nations using the canal" could by any possibility include the owner and constructor of the canal.

This view is further confirmed when we consider what Mr. John Hay, our own branch of the treaty-making on that occasion, said in writing about it:

In conformity with the Senate action upon article 3 of the treaty, which provided that the high contracting parties would, immediately upon the exchange of the ratification, bring it to the notice of the other powers and invite them to adhere to it, no such provision was inserted in the draft of the new treaty. That is what Lord Lansdowne was seeking to cover in another way. It was believed that the declaration that the canal should be free and open to all nations on terms of entire equality, now that Great Britain was relieved of all responsibility and obligation to enforce and defend this neutrality, would practically meet the force of the objection generally made by Lord Lansdowne to the Senate article inviting powers to come in, namely, that Great Britain was placed thereby in a worse position than other nations in the case of war with the United States.

So it is that this language was put in for England's protection and to make for her a really favored-nation clause in the treaty, so that all who might come in and would observe the rules should have the benefit of this neutralization.

After all, what does this paragraph mean? Reduced to its last analysis it means equity—equity as to the tolls and charges. All, therefore, that England could possibly demand, if we give the fullest and most elaborate interpretation to these words and a meaning that is not warranted by the context, is this: That the whole tonnage passing through the Panama Canal should be counted as forming the basis upon which the registered ton charge should be fixed and levied. The figures are given in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, showing that in framing the tolls or charges President Taft did that very thing. Our coastwise trade was estimated at about a million and our foreign trade at about eight hundred and seventy-odd thousand, while the trade of all other nations was estimated at upward of eight and one-half million. Our coastwise trade figures as a small incident in this great array of tonnage, but the whole was counted. Now, what right has England, under this neutralization clause, if the clause can be said to have any application to us and if the treaty is still in force? Nothing more than to have equality in the charges made. On that basis she has had equity.

Sir Edward Grey practically admitted, in the correspondence printed by direction of the House, that—

Now that the United States has become a practical sovereign of the canal, His Majesty's Government do not question its title to exercise belligerent rights for its protection.

This shows that the question of sovereignty has much to do with the modification, if not the destruction, of the language of this treaty. That is one of the phrases quoted from that correspondence.

The first rule mentioned in article 3 declares for equality of treatment. It is contended most earnestly that this equality of treatment can only relate to others besides the owner. There can be no equality of treatment if the owner is included in "all nations." The United States, as the owner of the Panama Canal, stands in a totally different relation to it from that of any other nation. It has expended $400,000,000 in the construction of the canal. It has taken great risks in accomplishing this wonderful work. The perils of its ownership continue. Landslides, earthquakes, and other upheavals of nature may at any time destroy it. The whole capital invested in it is at the peril of any or all of these things. If it were wrecked there is no chance of recoupment. England has no obligation. The duty of protection and encouragement which was laid upon her shoulders by the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was removed by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. The burden of maintenance and protection, including all the risks we have enumerated, rests solely and only upon the United States of America. No personal use which the United States could make of the canal would repay it for the risk involved if it maintained it for a hundred years. All other nations may use or not use it at their volition. The United States is always burdened with its maintenance and upkeep.

Nevertheless, the United States can not make charges that would be unreasonable or unjust—this much good morals, and the treaty, if it be in force, require of her. Can it be urged that it is equality, or just and equitable, that after having borne the whole burden and peril of the past, and continuing to be burdened with all the risks of the future, that the United States should in addition bear an equal current burden with those who have stood and still may stand by and enjoy the use of the canal at their pleasure? That would not be equality, but gross inequality. The discrimination that is forbidden in this treaty is the discrimination against a nation or its citizens. Where the discrimination falls alike upon all nations there can be no unfair discrimination against any nation. A discrimination in favor of the United States upon the ground of ownership of the canal would not be a discrimination on the grounds of nationality, even though all the owners happened to be citizens of the same nation. It is unfair to even raise or propound the question that such a discrimination would violate any rule of equality, when one takes into account the position of owner. If the canal remains an unpaying proposition the loss is to be borne exclusively by the people of the United States. Why prate of equality when all these unequal conditions exist?

It has been well said that—

Ordinarily a covenant to third parties by a natural person that he would pay rent to himself would be void for repugnance, and also because the right to receive payment and the obligation to pay would be merged in the same person, and it would make no difference whether the covenant were made for a valuable consideration or not. There can be no different rule in the case of a nation. The difference is fundamentally and logically not technical.

In this country the theory of our Constitution is that the people rule and that the Government is but the agent of the people. The people—all the people—are the principals. They have the entire beneficial interest in all Government property. They have paid for it, they own it, and the Government simply holds it as their agent. All the people are the principals.

Besides, the Hay-Pauncefote treaty describes the vessels of commerce as the vessels of the nation. It makes no distinction between vessels of war and vessels of commerce. Both shall use the canal upon terms of entire equality. It must, therefore, be obvious that the conditions of rule 1 can not be carried out, so far as it affects the owner of the canal, although such owner may be a party to the treaty; and this creates the strongest of all possible presumptions that the condition was never intended to apply to the owner. The provision of equal terms, as it existed in the rules of the Suez Canal, did not in that treaty apply to the owner. How can it be said, then, when transferred into the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, that it can apply to the United States as the owner of the Panama Canal? The clear interpretation, and the only sane and reasonable one, for the language of this rule 1 of the rules announced by the United States as the basis of neutralization, is that the United States has the right to use the canal personally, without tolls, for its vessels of war and commerce alike, and all other nations have the right to use it upon the payment of just and equitable tolls.

The construction contended for by our adversaries who advocate repeal is harsh and inequitable as against the United States. It disregards the inherent rights of ownership and the annexed risks and burdens which the owner of this particular property sustained in creating it and will always sustain in caring for it. It virtually attempts to require that the owner shall pay for the use of the property twice—once by a sum in gross and again by additional payments for its use equal to payments made for the same use by strangers who bore no part of the cost and who assume none of the risks of its management and upkeep.

I, personally, heartily concur in the theory that the term "just and equitable" could be fully complied with should estimates for each year be prepared, including the amounts necessary for maintenance, upkeep, alterations, betterments, interest, and other fixed charges, a moderate reserve, a fund for extraordinary repairs, such as damages by landslides, damages by earthquakes, and so forth, and a modest dividend returned to compensate the United States, not only for the great work it organized and accomplished, but for the formidable unknown risks it took and which it must continue to bear. The whole work may at any time be destroyed by some natural phenomena. Against this it can have no indemnity.

Such an estimate would form a fair total amount, and this sum could be ratably divided in an equitable manner among all shippers of every nation—except the owner—using the canal. In such treatment every other nation would only bear its ratable tax and its just share, and there could be no unfair discrimination against any vessel or owner. In doing this the United States would exercise the largest spirit of equity. It would satisfy the utmost claim of honor, and comply with every requirement of the treaty, that rates shall be just and equitable, even in the eyes of those who charge us with dishonor in exempting the coastwise traffic.

Some of our opponents have argued that when the treaty was before the Senate a Senator from California moved an amendment, which was rejected by a large vote. This amendment provided specifically that our coastwise trade should go through free. There has been a great discussion about the effect of the rejection of that amendment. The consensus of opinion, as this matter has been exploited and discussed, would seem to me to result in the conclusion that when that amendment was rejected it was because it was regarded as superfluous and unnecessary. The language of the treaty required no such qualification. Be this as it may, the fact remains that an amendment providing affirmatively that we have the right to fortify the Isthmus was also rejected by the Senate while they were considering the treaty. Did that rejection mean that the Senators of the United States, when they were voting it down, did so because the treaty forbade it? Just as they voted down the resolution or amendment with reference to the tolls on coastwise trade, so they voted down the question with reference to fortifications, and it was defeated. Later on, however, our Government resolved to fortify our own possessions and maintain these fortifications for its protection and defense. Again, the protest from England, that we had not the right. After discussion England was compelled to abandon this position and concede that the right inherently existed in the United States by virtue of her sovereignty over the territory. Since then, also, we have undertaken to spend millions of dollars in fortifying the Canal Zone. What use, therefore, to say that the voting down of the one amendment meant any more than the voting down of the other?

The object of the provision in the act of 1912 was to build up the merchant marine. No country in the world has suffered so much as our country by reason of subsidies. Take the Suez Canal. The report of a committee of Congress, made after the most careful examination and now published, shows that millions and millions of dollars, sums more than equalizing the tolls, have been paid and given in subsidies by Russia, Italy, Germany, France, and England, and in addition to all this England has drawn out, as a dividend on her stock ownership in the Suez Canal, five or six millions of dollars a year. Our Government and our people have been prejudiced against subsidies to our merchant marine. But since the foundation of the Government, under Democratic and Republican rule alike, the policy of this country has been to discriminate wherever it could in favor of building up our merchant marine. The passage of the coastwise trade through the canal is an instance of discrimination and not subsidy.

I challenge our opponents on the other side, when they say this is a subsidy, to prove it if they can. Freight rates are charges that the consuming public have to meet. If these ships pass through the canal without toll, the public will gain the benefit of it. If they go through the canal and are obliged to pay toll, then the shipper simply adds the amount of the toll to the other freight charges, and these, as the cost to the consumer, the public is obliged to pay. It is a case of discrimination and not subsidy, and it is as justifiable, and no more to be called privileged class legislation, than is that legislation which is passed so frequently throughout the States where a toll road is taken and the gates are beaten down so that the public shall go through free and pay no toll. The cost of the upkeep and maintenance of the former toll road falls upon the public, but the benefit to the public is considered indirectly and directly to be so great that it has always been regarded as a proper charge, although the road may be used by but a very small part of the public. The United States Government has spent millions of dollars on our navigable rivers and harbors. The great Mississippi River is only a canal running up into the heart of our country from the open sea. Our Government has spent many dollars upon it, and I trust is going to spend a great many more, to protect those vast southern portions of our country from inundation, suffering and loss. Will anyone dare to say that we must exact tolls from every ship that goes up or down the Mississippi River? No. The great theory of our Government has always been for free intercourse in commerce between the States. No barriers—no tollgates. And the Panama Canal is a part of the territory of the United States and a part of our coastwise line, and we will send, now or hereafter, our coastwise traffic through it free.

The basis upon which we are asked to make this repeal is one of extraordinary humiliation. The President has asked us not to stop to argue the right or wrong of the question. We are asked to make this great surrender of what, I believe, is a sovereign power of this Nation in deference to public opinion concerning us on the other side of the Atlantic. It is the first time in the history of this great Nation that her people have been asked to bend the knee and bow the head to the opinions of others upon a question, without discussing the right or the wrong of the question.

No man has a right to consider this question on the ground of subsidy or economic policy, but only upon the treaty, and with the great thought before his mind that the action taken upon this question does not decide economic theories, but it settles the question of sovereign right and the interpretation of the treaty. Because a world should think that opinion wrong—a world actuated by selfishness; a world whose interests cloud its judgment—are we to ungrudgingly give this repeal at the behest of the Executive? No! For that would be to ask us to surrender our manhood and our American independence. All honor does not exist in those who prate most about honor. Honor consists in doing the right thing fearlessly, earnestly, and persistently, though all the peoples of all the world should sneer at us and wag their heads. Those who refer to the wide reaching and gracious promises made by some about the Panama Canal being for the use of the whole of mankind can not say that we are not keeping our promise to the world of conferring upon it a great benefit; they have no ground for such a criticism. There was never such a promise made by the Nation. The very creation of the canal was and is a blessing to humanity. The fact of its existence is a perpetual benevolence. Its rates and charges will always be reasonably and honestly levied. Our Government will always deal fairly in the question of rates with all the world. Surely that nation which had the courage and the ability to undertake this great task and to carry it to successful conclusion can be trusted to administer it in justice and equity.

I feel that this is one of the crisis periods in the history of our country. A request to vote upon the ipse dixit of any man against one's own convictions is a most unusual and unreasonable request. To be asked to so vote upon a question that involves the surrender of the sovereignty and dignity of my country is a request which, though I respect never so highly as an official and a man the person who made the request, I must, in all sincerity, in obedience to the dictates of logic and my appreciation of the right, decline, and emphatically make reply: My country first. Her rights above all others. Equity and justice before every theory of politics or diplomacy. No dictation from any nation about our domestic affairs. No surrender, not even so much as an atom of our sovereignty over the Panama Canal.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, when this matter was before the House, some two years ago, it was not then complicated with any political considerations. I then gave it quite careful consideration and came to the conclusion that there was no good reason for allowing the coastwise ships to go through the canal free of tolls, and consequently voted against the exemption now sought to be repealed. The coastwise trade is a monopoly under existing laws. No foreign ships can engage in this trade, though in many ways they do compete with coastwise ships in seeking to supply our markets with foreign goods. The coastwise marine is large and prosperous. No one contends that it is in need of additional favors. It can carry freight in competition with the railroads after paying the tolls at a small fraction of the fares that the railroads are compelled to charge to do business.

The Panama Canal cost us approximately $400,000,000. Interest upon this sum, together with the annual expenses for operating and maintaining it, will greatly exceed the receipts from tolls. Why under these circumstances should we not compel the coastwise shipping to contribute its fair share to the expense of operating and maintaining this canal? Or, perhaps, I should ask why should not the people who live along the coast and who are specially benefited by this canal contribute a small share to the payment of this expense? If we exempt coastwise shipping from paying its proportion of the tolls, the amount lost by the exemption will have to be made up from taxes upon the whole people. Is it just to make the interior of the country bear this added taxation? Can it be contended that it will get any reasonable return for the money thus paid. It seems clear to me that not only will the interior section be compelled to pay this tax without any adequate recompense, but free tolls will create an added disadvantage to this section as compared with present conditions. To the extent that this exemption from tolls makes it possible to carry merchandise from coast to coast now carried by railroads, it will tend to deprive these railroads of business and thus cause a higher rate to be charged against the remaining business. It is idle to contend that the railway commission can prevent this increase in rates. The Supreme Court has held, and we have lately had an illustration of it in our State, that the railways are entitled to charge a rate high enough to give them a revenue sufficient not only to pay for operating expenses and maintenance but also a reasonable return upon the value of the property used by them. Under this rule it is an easy deduction that the cheaper you make the transcontinental ocean rates the greater will be the railway rates on the transcontinental roads in the interior of the country. It has been urged that this is an argument in favor of the railroads. I do not care, as between the railroads and the coastwise shipping monopoly, I am for the railroads, but I am not specially concerned about either. The question with me is, How will our people be affected?

Another reason why I am not enthusiastic about granting to the coastwise shipping this special privilege is the fact that the Pacific coast States, Washington and Oregon, are large producers of grain, such as wheat and barley, that seeks a foreign market. Why should I vote for a proposition that, in effect, pays a part of the freight upon this wheat and barley to enable this grain to enter the markets of New York, Boston, Philadelphia, and the other large cities on the Atlantic coast to compete with grain raised in my section? It seems to me that this traffic from the Pacific coast should at least help pay a part of the expenses that the Government incurs in lifting it over the Isthmus of Panama. It is my impression that the treaty entered into with Great Britain, and under which the canal was built, does not necessarily prevent us from discriminating in favor of our shipping, both foreign and coastwise, so long as there is no discrimination between different foreign nations and the charges on foreign ships are just and equitable. And, by the way, there is nothing in the bill now before Congress that would prevent us at some future date from discriminating in our own favor should we consider it advisable. There is, however, a consideration that will always make it next to impossible to exercise this right, if it is a right. Our foreign commerce has grown by leaps and bounds until to-day it is a very large commerce. Nearly all of it is carried in foreign bottoms. If we do not treat foreign nations fairly they have at hand a remedy. They can easily discriminate against us. Great Britain practically controls the Suez Canal. I understand that she owns 40 per cent of the stock and controls enough additional to dictate the policy of the Suez Co. Our ships are permitted to pass through the Suez Canal on exactly the same terms as the English ships. On the north of us we are using the Canadian canals connecting the Great Lakes on terms of absolute equality with those accorded Canadian vessels. My colleague, Mr. STEVENS, has called attention to the fact that Canada is at work deepening her canals to 30 feet so as to permit ocean vessels to go from lake to lake, and is busily engaged in planning an outlet of that depth to the ocean. It may be possible for Canada to build such a canal, while on the American side this does not seem possible. Can we afford to discriminate against Canada under the circumstances? The Panama Canal will probably never carry but a very small fraction of the total tonnage that would float to the sea from the Great Lakes. Canada can now discriminate against us. How much greater would her power to discriminate become if she builds a canal through her own territory that will allow ocean vessels to enter the Great Lakes.

I realize that many of the speeches and much of the editorial matter used in the discussion of this tolls question appeals very strongly to the patriotic feeling of the people, but when analyzed is it, in fact, patriotic? It would certainly not be patriotic in me to vote for a proposition that, in my judgment, is against not only the best interest of my section but the best interest of the country as a whole.

In connection with these observations I desire, without entering into any extended discussion of our rights under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, to call attention to some reasons why I believe that we may, should we consider it wise, discriminate against foreign shipping.

In 1850 we entered into the Clayton-Bulwer treaty with Great Britain. That treaty provided for construction by a canal company under the joint protection and control of the two nations. It was not to be fortified, but the United States and Great Britain in the treaty invited all nations to join with them in agreeing to maintain its neutrality. It contemplated an international canal to be built by the financial and commercial interests of the world, and the treaty naturally provided that the citizens and subjects of every country agreeing to the treaty should be accorded equal terms. The purpose sought in getting rid of this treaty was to enable the American people to construct an American canal, with American money, under American control. The United States felt that its interest in the canal was much greater than that of Great Britain. It had shores on two oceans to defend and a commerce to serve peculiar to this country, in which Great Britain had comparatively slight interest. In 1900 a draft of a new treaty was prepared. When this was submitted to the Senate for ratification it was amended in such a way that it was finally rejected by Great Britain. As originally drafted it but slightly modified the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. It gave to the United States no greater right to use the canal than Great Britain or any other nation that might adhere to it. The United States was forbidden to fortify or make use of it in case of war, though nominally it was the owner of the canal. The Senate amendments expressly abrogated the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, struck out the provision against fortification and the provision requiring other nations to agree to it, and added what has been spoken of as the Davis amendment. This gave the United States a right to take such measures as they might find necessary to secure by their own force the defense of the United States and the maintenance of public order. These amendments to the treaty of 1900 indicated to the treaty-making powers the features of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty that were objectionable to the Senate. Hay, our Secretary of State, redrew the treaty so as to carry out the views of the Senate. In form the new draft was quite like the treaty of 1900, but in legal effect it was very different. The following is a copy of the treaty as finally agreed on:

The United States of America and His Majesty Edward the Seventh, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and of the British Dominions beyond the Seas, King, and Emperor of India, being desirous to facilitate the construction of a ship canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, by whatever route may be considered expedient, and to that end to remove any objection which may arise out of the convention of the 19th April, 1850, commonly called the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, to the construction of such canal under the auspices of the Government of the United States, without impairing the "general principle" of neutralization established in article 8 of that convention, have for that purpose appointed as their plenipotentiaries:

The President of the United States, John Hay, Secretary of State of the United States of America;

And His Majesty Edward the Seventh, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and of the British Dominions beyond the Seas, King, and Emperor of India, the Right Hon. Lord Pauncefote, G. C. B., G. C. M. G., His Majesty's ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary to the United States;

Who, having communicated to each other their full powers, which were found to be in due and proper form, have agreed upon the following articles:

"ARTICLE 1.

"The high contracting parties agree that the present treaty shall supersede the aforementioned convention of the 19th April, 1850.

"ARTICLE 2.

"It is agreed that the canal may be constructed under the auspices of the Government of the United States, either directly at its own cost, or by gift or loan of money to individuals or corporations, or through subscription to or purchase of stock or shares, and that, subject to the provisions of the present treaty, the said Government shall have and enjoy all the rights incident to such construction, as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal.

"ARTICLE 3.

"The United States adopts, as the basis of the neutralization of such ship canal, the following rules, substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople, signed the 28th October, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Canal, that is to say:

"1. The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic, or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

"2. The canal shall never be blockaded, nor shall any right of war be exercised nor any act of hostility be committed within it. The United States, however, shall be at liberty to maintain such military police along the canal as may be necessary to protect it against lawlessness and disorder

"3. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not revictual nor take any stores in the canal except so far as may be strictly necessary, and the transit of such vessels through the canal shall be effected with the least possible delay in accordance with the regulations in force, and with only such intermission as may result from the necessities of the service.

"Prizes shall be in all respects subject to the same rules as vessels of war of the belligerents.

"4. No belligerent shall embark or disembark troops, munitions of war, or warlike materials in the canal, except in case of accidental hindrance of the transit, and in such case the transit shall be resumed with all possible dispatch.

"5. The provisions of this article shall apply to waters adjacent to the canal, within 3 marine miles of either end. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not remain in such waters longer than 24 hours at any one time, except in case of distress, and in such case shall depart as soon as possible; but a vessel of war of one belligerent shall not depart within 24 hours from the departure of a vessel of war of the other belligerent.

"6. The plant, establishments, buildings, and all works necessary to the construction, maintenance, and operation of the canal shall be deemed to be part thereof, for the purposes of this treaty, and in time of war, as in time of peace, shall enjoy complete immunity from attack or injury by belligerents and from acts calculated to impair their usefulness as part of the canal.

"ARTICLE 4.

"It is agreed that no change of territorial sovereignty or of the international relations of the country or countries traversed by the before-mentioned canal shall affect the general principle of neutralization or the obligation of the high contracting parties under the present treaty.

"ARTICLE 5.

"The present treaty shall be ratified by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof, and by His Britannic Majesty, and the ratifications shall be exchanged at Washington or at London at the earliest possible time within six months from the date hereof.

"In faith whereof the respective plenipotentiaries have signed this treaty and thereunto affixed their seals.

"Done in duplicate at Washington the 18th day of November, in the year of our Lord 1901.

"JOHN HAY. [SEAL.]
"PAUNCEFOTE. [SEAL.]"

It is to be noted that in this discussion those who maintained that this Nation must grant equal tolls to foreign and American shipping insisted on reading into this treaty provisions of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty and every expression of policy and opinion that anyone has uttered in negotiating or ratifying this or any prior canal treaty. Much of this is very misleading. The instrument speaks for itself and can not be modified or rewritten in this fashion. But adopting in a measure this same method, let us see how Great Britain understood this treaty when it was negotiated.

The first section of the treaty abrogates the Clayton-Bulwer treaty; the second, in effect, declares that, subject to the provisions of this treaty, this shall be an American canal, owned, regulated, and managed by this Government. These two sections give to our Government absolute control of the canal except so far as they are modified by section 3. Does section 3 limit the power of the United States over its own commerce? If it does, it is because the expression "all nations observing these rules," contained in the first subdivision of section 3, applies to the United States.

Lord Lansdowne, in the negotiation that resulted in this treaty, submitted in behalf of Great Britain to Secretary Hay a note that seems to me shows that he did not construe the words "all nations" to include the United States. In the treaty of 1900 Great Britain and the United States jointly prescribed rules similar to those of section 3 and invited all nations to agree to them, while in the present treaty these rules are prescribed by the United States alone. Commenting on this change, Lord Lansdowne said:

In form the new draft differs from the convention of 1900, under which the higher contracting parties, after agreeing that the canal might be constructed by the United States, undertook to adopt certain rules as the basis upon which the canal was to be neutralized. In the new draft the United States intimate their readiness "to adopt" somewhat similar rules as the basis of the neutralization of the canal. It would appear to follow that the whole responsibility for upholding these rules, and thereby maintaining the neutrality of the canal, would henceforward be assumed by the Government of the United States. The change of form is an important one; but in view of the fact that the whole cost of the construction of the canal is to be borne by that Government, which is also to be charged with such measures as may be necessary to protect it against lawlessness and disorder, His Majesty's Government are not likely to object to it.

In what respect was this change important? He answers it in part by saying that it imposed upon the United States the whole responsibility for maintaining the neutrality of the canal, and he reiterates in this note that his Government would be released from such responsibility. How did he figure out that this change was effected? If the United States was still bound by all the rules of neutrality in section 3, it would seem that Great Britain, after signing the treaty, would be equally bound. Evidently his reason was this, that the United States, as owner of the canal, was prescribing rules for other nations—including Great Britain—rules that if observed by Great Britain would prevent that Government from taking the necessary steps to enforce such neutrality. In this he is clearly right. These rules would certainly prevent Great Britain from taking any such steps, and as a consequence released that Government from any obligation to defend the neutrality of the canal. On the contrary, he must and does assume that the United States, as the power prescribing the rules, would not be bound by them, and as such would be at liberty to take any proper means for their enforcement. It seems quite clear, not only from the foregoing statement but also from other parts of this note, that this was his view. In referring to the omission from this treaty of any provision in regard to fortifying the canal, he observed:

I understand that, by the omission of all reference to the matter of defense, the United States desires to reserve the power to take measures to protect the canal.

Speaking further on this same subject, he says:

I am not prepared to deny that contingencies may arise when, not only from a national point of view but on behalf of the commerce of the world, it might be of supreme importance to the United States that they should be free to adopt measures for the defense of the canal at the moment when they are themselves engaged in hostility.

In still another part in this note he says, speaking of certain objections made by him to the treaty of 1900:

The same exception could not be taken to an arrangement under which, supposing that the United States as the power owning the canal and responsible for the maintenance of its neutrality, should find it necessary to interfere temporarily with its free use by the shipping of another power, that power would thereupon at once and ipso facto become liberated from the necessity of observing the rules laid down in the new treaty.

I do not see how anyone can read this note and contend that Lord Lansdowne believed that the words "All nations observing these rules," contained in section 3 of this treaty, applied to the United States. He conceded that we might do nearly everything forbidden by these rules. He admitted that the United States would have the right to fortify the canal which necessarily would include the right, contrary to the rules, to disembark troops, munitions of war, and war-like material; he repeatedly insisted that it would be our duty to defend the canal; a duty that would certainly give us the right, denied by the rules, to keep vessels of war there for that purpose, and he even conceded that we would have the right under the treaty to blockade the canal, a thing expressly forbidden. All these concessions must rest upon the idea that the United States as the owner of the canal would prescribe rules not for themselves but for other nations.

How was it possible that a person as keen as Lord Lansdowne failed to observe that this change in the treaty not only released the United States from observing its own rules in regard to the defense of the canal but also in dealing with its own commerce. Is it possible that the ordinary and the obvious meaning of the language in this treaty escaped him? No one would imagine, should President Wilson issue an order, that all men must stay away from the White House that he had in mind to exclude himself. Is it more reasonable to contend that the language "All nations observing these rules" includes the nation that owns this canal and prescribes the rules. It seems quite clear that Great Britain must have understood that the United States were not to observe all these rules. Who, then, is to determine what rules the United States must observe? The treaty does not enlighten us on that point, and this treaty, like all other treaties, only grants what clearly appears from its language.

There is in this note from Lord Lansdowne another bit of evidence that may have a bearing. He sought to have incorporated in the present treaty section 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. This section provided that the canal shall be open to the citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain on equal terms.

If this had been embodied in the treaty, Great Britain's claim would have been plain, at least as to our foreign commerce, but the United States refused to agree to this proposal. Is not this move on the part of the British Government significant? The words now sought to be incorporated in this treaty by Great Britain are contained in this section 8. In connection with this same offer, Lord Lansdowne proposed, as an amendment to section 3 of this treaty, the provision which was accepted and embodied in to the effect that "conditions and charges of traffic should be just and equitable." There would be but slight reason for urging this last amendment if the citizens and subjects of all nations, including the United States, were to be treated on terms of entire equality without discrimination against either. A provision against discrimination was already in the treaty. If this provision applied to the United States, Great Britain would certainly have been content, as she could not reasonably have asked for better treatment than that accorded American shipping; but this provision would be important if the rules did not prevent the United States from discriminating in favor of their own shipping. This amendment to section 3, as Lord Lansdowne then said, was taken from this same article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, which he sought to have reincorporated in full. Evidently he did not expect to have both provisions accepted by the American Government, or was he only blundering when he offered to incorporate the whole of this article 8 at the same time that he offered to incorporate a part of it? Is it not more reasonable to believe that the man knew what he was doing? This note was not a hasty utterance, but a careful and deliberate statement. He knew what section 8 contained and what he was seeking to have written into this new treaty. He evidently expected that the United States might refuse to readopt the part of the section that required equality of treatment of American and British shipping, but saw a chance to secure a provision requiring just and equal treatment.

Notwithstanding our refusal to readopt the provisions of section 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, Great Britain claims that this section 8 is in force. In support of this contention reference is made to the recital contained in the preamble of the new treaty to the effect that its object is to remove objections to the Clayton-Bulwer treaty without impairing the general principles of neutralization established by this section. I am not able to see how anyone can seriously urge any such contention. In the first place, the preamble only expressed the purpose had in making the treaty. The treaty itself must determine how and to what extent that purpose has been carried out. It was not intended to carry into this treaty all the provisions of this section in regard to neutralization. That would have defeated entirely its object. If the new treaty had been silent on the subject of neutralization and there had been no expressed abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, it might have been argued that this recital recognized this section as in force; but when you read the new treaty and find that it nearly all relates to neutralization and that every provision of section 8 is covered by either being espressly abrogated or rewritten in some modified form, it seems idle to urge any such claim. May it not with much more show of reason be argued that those who contend otherwise confess their inability to find in the new treaty any satisfactory provision requiring equality of tolls between American and foreign shipping.

If it was the intention of Secretary Hay and Lord Lansdowne to require equal treatment of the shipping of the United States and Great Britain, I do not understand why they did not copy into the new treaty the specific language to that effect contained in section 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. Every other provision of that section in regard to traffic and tolls that could be made applicable was inserted in the new treaty. It certainly does no credit to the intelligence of the draftsmen to urge that they considered the language written in the treaty as equivalent to it, language that many of the ablest lawyers both here and abroad insist can not under any fair construction convey the meaning now claimed for it by Great Britain. Is it not more reasonable to suppose that the British Government had in mind that it could not expect to secure this equality in a canal built and owned by the American Government, an equality which might in many instances be unfair to this country on account of its relationship to and the location of the canal. Great Britain was, no doubt, very anxious to have this canal built, and it seems to me she might well have felt very certain that there would be no unfair discrimination. This Government can not afford to treat foreign nations unfairly in a great international waterway such as this. Eventually we shall have to bow to a demand for fair treatment, a demand infinitely more persuasive and compelling than the language of any treaty.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Speaker, on May 8, 1912, when the question of Panama tolls was under consideration in the House, I made some remarks, and in the course of what I had to say made the following statement:

I do not admit, Mr. Chairman, that by any treaty that this Government has entered into with any foreign power there is any nation on this earth that has anything whatever to say about what we shall do with reference to our own domestic questions.

Further on I said:

And so I say, in conclusion, regarding tolls on the Panama Canal that it seems to me this is a question that is purely an American problem. Whether we shall remit a part of the tolls is a question for our country alone. It is an American problem, an American canal planned by American engineers and American brains and dug by American people with American money. It is a part of the United States, and we have a right to do with it as we please.

Those statements, made two years ago when this subject was under discussion, I have had no occasion to change or amend. I am still of the opinion that this is an American problem, and after full consideration of all the treaties that have ever been made by this country with other nations relative to the Isthmian Canal I am still strongly of the opinion that the question as to what we should do in the matter of tolls is purely a question of policy. I do not believe that under a fair interpretation of all of the treaties that can possibly have any bearing on this question that the right of the United States to deal with this problem as to it may seem proper is foreclosed or mortgaged in any way. I do not propose by my act to give up substantial American rights at the mere request of another party to the treaty. It is urged by those who are in favor of this bill that the opponents of it are unwilling to perform their international obligations.

Mr. Speaker, there is no one in this House who is more earnest in his determination to insist upon the maintenance of our international honor and the performance of our treaty obligations than am I. But as I understand the matter, international honor does not demand that we in all cases admit the contention of the other signatory party to the treaty or that we concede American rights and mortgage the future at the behest of any foreign power whatever. In fact, I think if the Government of the United States, instead of expressing its willingness to give up its own rights and recede from its claims at the request of a foreign power, had defended those rights there would have been no difficulty whatever about this problem. The British Government, in its first note to the United States on the subject of Panama tolls, dated July 8, 1912, said:

As to the proposal that exemption shall be given to vessels engaged in the coastwise trade, a more difficult question arises. If the trade could be so regulated as to make it certain that only bona fide coastwise traffic which is reserved for United States vessels would be benefited by this exemption, it may be that no objection could be taken.

It will be noted that the British diplomats couched their position in very careful language, for it is clearly seen from a reading of this note that in the beginning there was no objection raised by the British Government to the right of the United States to deal with the question of tolls as related to its own coastwise traffic as to it seemed best. Of course, subsequently the British Government changed its policy and grew more positive in contending that the coastwise exemption was in violation of the treaty. But originally there seems not to have been any serious doubt in the minds either of British or American statesmen that under the terms of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty the Government of the United States had the right to deal with the question of tolls as related to its coastwise traffic as a purely domestic question.

Let us examine the Hay-Pauncefote treaty to see what it really says upon this question of canal tolls. The third article of that treaty, dealing with this subject, is in full as follows:

The United States adopts, as the basis of the neutralization of such ship canal, the following rules, substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople, signed the 28th October, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Canal, that is to say:

1. The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

2. The canal shall never be blockaded, nor shall any right of war be exercised nor any act of hostility be committed within it. The United States, however, shall be at liberty to maintain such military police along the canal as may be necessary to protect it against lawlessness and disorder.

3. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not revictual nor take any stores in the canal except so far as may be strictly necessary; and the transit of such vessels through the canal shall be effected with the least possible delay in accordance with the regulations in force, and with only such intermission as may result from the necessities of the service.

Prizes shall be in all respects subject to the same rules as vessels of war of the belligerent.

4. No belligerent shall embark or disembark troops, munitions of war, or warlike materials in the canal, except in case of accidental hindrance of the transit, and in such case the transit shall be resumed with all possible dispatch.

5. The provisions of this article shall apply to waters adjacent to the canal within 3 marine miles of either end. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not remain in such waters longer than 24 hours at any one time, except in case of distress, and in such case shall depart as soon as possible; but a vessel of war of one belligerent shall not depart within 24 hours from the departure of a vessel of war of the other belligerent.

6. The plant, establishments, buildings, and all works necessary to the construction, maintenance, and operation of the canal shall be deemed to be part thereof, for the purposes of this treaty, and in time of war, as in time of peace, shall enjoy complete immunity from attack or injury by belligerents, and from acts calculated to impair their usefulness as part of the canal.

Now, let us take up the various paragraphs of this article 3 and examine them to ascertain, if possible, what the meaning of the signatory powers must have been. It will be observed that paragraph 1 says that the canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality. It is also stated that such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable. The important question to determine in this connection is, Does the language "all nations," as used in paragraph 1 of article 3, include the United States? Let us examine this proposition. Does anyone contend that the warships of the United States are to be treated the same as the warships of France or Great Britain? Is it claimed that if the warships of the United States are allowed to go through the canal free of tolls therefore the vessels of foreign nations are to be allowed to go through on the same terms? If this expression "entire equality" is to apply to all nations, including the United States, it is difficult to escape the conclusion just stated. But no one contends for a moment that the war vessels of the United States are to be required to pay toll. Then if not, it must be evident that those who wrote this article of the treaty did not have in mind that the United States would be included in the term "all nations" as it is used in paragraph 1 of article 3. And if it once be admitted that the United States has a right to pass its war vessels through the canal without payment of tolls, then attention should be called to the language whereby vessels of commerce and of war are mentioned in the same sentence. If it was the intention that the United States should have rights as to the passage of its own warships through the canal which were not enjoyed by foreign nations, then by the same reasoning it must be concluded that the United States also has rights as to its vessels of commerce which are not enjoyed by other nations.

Now, look at paragraph 2 for a moment. In this paragraph it is stated that the canal shall never be blockaded nor shall any right of war be exercised nor any act of hostility be committed within the canal. Does anybody believe that by the terms of this article the United States is deprived of the right of blockading this canal if it shall desire to do so as an act of war? Does anyone think that the Federal Government is deprived of the right of exercising any act of hostility in the canal or near it? Is it possible that this canal, which has been dug by the American people and paid for with American money, can not be defended by the Government of the United States in time of war by establishing a blockade if it so desires? It surely can not be seriously contended that any such meaning is to be attached to paragraph 2. In other words, it must be admitted that the intention of this paragraph was to establish certain rules for the government of nations other than the United States, and if it is once conceded that paragraph 2 was a statement of rules for nations other than the United States, and that the United States has rights for its ships which are not enjoyed by other nations, then on what basis can it be contended that the United States is included in the rules which are laid down in paragraph 1?

Paragraph 3 of article 3 provides that vessels of war of a belligerent shall not revictual or take on stores in the canal except so far as may be strictly necessary. It surely can not be successfully argued that the United States of America, which has built the canal and paid for it, shall be subject to any restriction whatever as to the revictualing of its ships or any other act which it may see fit to perform within the limits of the canal.

The paragraph in question further provides that the transit of vessels through the canal shall be effected with the least possible delay. Does any one seriously contend that this is intended to apply to the United States? This canal is ours and we have a right to send our ships through as rapidly as we please, or if we want to we have a right to start them through the canal and have them remain in transit as long as we like. No foreign nation has anything whatever to say about this matter. If this be true, and no one has undertaken to deny it, can it be claimed that paragraph 1 applies to the United States when it is admitted that paragraph 3 does not so apply. Paragraph 4 lays down rules as to the embarking and disembarking of troops and provides that no belligerents can embark or disembark its troops except in case of accident. Can it be imagined that any American statesman or diplomat would have ever signed a treaty that restricted the right of the United States to embark or disembark its troops at any time or place within the limits of the Canal Zone? This is a question which concerns our people only. It is a domestic problem and no foreign nation by international law, by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, or by any other treaty, has anything whatever to say as to the movement of our troops in the Canal Zone. In other words, it is clear that paragraph 4 does not apply and was not intended to apply to the United States. By parity of reasoning, then, it must be urged that paragraph 1 was not intended to apply to the United States when it states that the canal shall be free and open to vessels of commerce and of war of all nations on terms of entire equality. This means entire equality so far as nations other than the United States are concerned. Our Nation being the builder, owner, operator, and controller of the canal has a right which no other nation can possibly enjoy, and the clear interpretation of the language of this treaty makes this meaning evident.

Paragraph 5 of the article in question states that the provisions of article 3 shall apply to waters adjacent to the canal within 3 marine miles of either end thereof, and that vessels of war of a belligerent shall not remain in such water longer than 24 hours at one time, and that the vessel of war of one belligerent shall not depart within 24 hours of the departure of the vessel of war of another belligerent. The most casual consideration of this paragraph makes it evident that these rules were intended to apply to belligerents other than the United States. Suppose our country should happen to be at war with France, or with Japan, or with any other great power, it certainly can not be seriously contended that the vessels of war of the United States are not to remain within the limits of the canal more than 24 hours, or that if a French vessel shall depart therefrom, one of our warships shall not be allowed to leave until 24 hours shall have elapsed. Clearly these rules are intended to apply and do apply to other belligerents. It is apparent that article 5 does not apply to the United States, but is intended as a code of rules for the Government of nations other than the United States. Considering then all the paragraphs of article 3 together, inasmuch as paragraphs 2, 3, 4, and 5 were clearly not intended to apply to the Government of the United States, upon what reasonable grounds can it be insisted that paragraph 1 was intended so to apply? In the construction of these rules they are to be taken all together, and so reading and interpreting them it seems clear that all the paragraphs were intended to apply to nations other than the United States. At all events it must be admitted that the question is at least open to argument. The passage of this bill concedes everything. If the matter is to be debated, we ought at least to insist upon our rights and let the matter finally be decided by a court of arbitration rather than to concede everything which the other party to the contract demands.

There is eminent authority to sustain the position which I have just stated regarding the right of the United States in the premises. For example, the case of Olson v. Smith (195 U. S., 332). This clearly sets forth the doctrine that a foreign Government has no right to complain as to restrictions as to their commerce when these restrictions are not to apply to the coastwise vessels of the United States, the court holding definitely that this was an American proposition and that in as much as the coastwise trade is reserved entirely to American ships foreign Governments have no rights in the premises. Upon this point the views of the minority submitted to the House on March 20, 1912, in the question of Panama Canal tolls makes the following statement:

> The court held that this treaty was not violated by either the Texas statute or the Revised Statutes of the United States (sec. 4444), exempting coastwise steam vessels from the payment of pilotage charges. In that connection, speaking for the court, Mr. Justice White, now Chief Justice, said:
> "Nor is there merit in the contention that as the vessel in question was a British vessel, coming from a foreign port, the State laws concerning pilotage are in conflict with the treaty between Great Britain and the United States, providing that 'no higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed in any ports of the United States on British vessels than those payable in the same ports by vessels of the United States.' Neither the exemption of coastwise steam vessels from pilotage resulting from the law of the United States nor any lawful exemption of coastwise vessels created by the State law concerns vessels in the foreign trade, and, therefore, any such exemptions do not operate to produce a discrimination against British vessels engaged in foreign trade and in favor of the vessels of the United States in such trade. In substance, the proposition but asserts that because by the law of the United States steam vessels in the coastwise trade have been exempt from pilotage regulations, therefore there is no power to subject vessels in foreign trade to pilotage regulations, even though such regulations apply without discrimination to all vessels engaged in such foreign trade, whether domestic or foreign."
> If a treaty with Great Britain providing that "no higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed in any ports of the United States on British vessels than those payable in the same ports by vessels of the United States" is not violated by an exemption in favor of our own vessels engaged in coastwise trade from payment of pilotage charges, it must necessarily follow that the Hay-Pauncefote treaty would not be violated by a similar exemption of our coastwise vessels from the payment of tolls at the Panama Canal.

Men of all parties admit that President Taft was a great lawyer and as President was insistent on the maintenance of our high standards of international honor. In his message to Congress on this subject he said:

I am confident that the United States has the power to relieve from the payment of tolls any part of our shipping that Congress deems wise. We own the canal. It was our money that built it. We have the right to charge tolls for its use. Those tolls must be the same to everyone; but when we are dealing with our own ships, the practice of many Governments of subsidizing their own merchant vessels is so well established in general that a subsidy equal to the tolls, as equivalent remission of tolls, can not be held to be a discrimination in the use of the canal. The practice in the Suez Canal makes this clear. * * *

In the platform of the national Progressive Party, which was unanimously approved in Chicago on August 7, 1912, the following statement is made:

The Panama Canal, built and paid for by the American people, must be used primarily for their benefit. We demand that the canal shall be so operated as to break transportation monopoly now held and misused by the transcontinental railroads, by maintaining sea competition with them; that ships directly or indirectly owned or controlled by American railroad corporations shall not be permitted to use the canal; and that American ships engaged in coastwise trade shall pay no tolls.

And ex-President Theodore Roosevelt, in a letter in the Outlook on January 18, 1913, said:

I believe that the position of the United States is proper as regards this coastwise traffic. I think that we have the right to free bona fide coastwise traffic from tolls. I think that this does not interfere with the rights of any other nation, because no ships but our own can engage in coastwise traffic, so that there is no discrimination against other ships when we relieve the coastwise traffic from tolls. I believe that the only damage that would be done is the damage to the Canadian Pacific Railway. Moreover, I do not think that it sits well on the representatives of any foreign nation, even upon those of a power with which we are, and I hope and believe will always remain, on such good terms as Great Britain, to make any plea in reference to what we do with our own coastwise traffic, because we are benefiting the whole world by our action at Panama, and are doing this where every dollar of expense is paid by ourselves. In all history I do not believe you can find another instance where as great and expensive a work as the Panama Canal, undertaken not by a private corporation but by a nation, has ever been as generously put at the service of all the nations of mankind.

Furthermore, there is eminent Democratic authority for the position taken. The national Democratic Party, in convention assembled at Baltimore on July 2, 1912, adopted the following plank relative to the toll question:

We favor the exemption from tolls of American ships engaged in coastwise trade passing through the Panama Canal. We also favor legislation forbidding the use of the Panama Canal by ships owned or controlled by railroad carriers engaged in transportation competitive with the canal.

And President Wilson, then Governor Wilson, is reported in the Philadelphia Record of August 16, 1912, as making in part the following statement in an address which he delivered on August 15, 1912, as Washington Park, N. J.:

One of the great objects in cutting that great ditch across the Isthmus of Panama is to allow the farmers, who are near the Atlantic, to ship to the Pacific by way of the Atlantic ports, to allow all the farmers on what I may—standing here—call this part of the continent to find an outlet at ports of the Gulf or the ports of the Atlantic seaboard, and then have coastwise steamers carry their products down around through the canal and up the Pacific coast or down the coast of South America.

Now, at present there are no ships to do that, and one of the bills pending—passed, I believe, yesterday by the Senate as it had passed the House—provides for free toll for American ships through that canal and prohibits any ship from passing through which is owned by any American railroad company. You see the object of that, don't you? [Applause.] We don't want the railroads to compete with themselves, because we understand that kind of competition. We want water carriage to compete with land carriage so as to be perfectly sure that you are going to get better rates around the canal than you would across the continent.

Our platform is not molasses to catch flies. It means business. It means what it says. It is the utterance of earnest and honest men, who intend to do business along those lines and who are not waiting to see whether they can catch votes with those promises before they determine whether they are going to act upon them or not.

Much other distinguished and eminent authority might be quoted, but this is sufficient to show that there is at least reasonable ground for maintaining the position that the United States has the right to determine the toll question as it relates to its own coastwise vessels as to it may seem wise. This being the case, it certainly is unwise legislation to pass a law which will absolutely mortgage the future and foreclose any rights that the United States may have in the premises. As stated above, this question should at least be left open to be settled by arbitration instead of passing a law which absolutely destroys forever any rights that the United States has with reference to the canal.

Personally I am in favor of a system of preferential tolls, and if not prevented by a tyrannical rule, adopted without justification or excuse, I would offer such an amendment at the proper time. This system which I favor would levy tolls on every vessel passing through the canal, but would give our American ships the advantage by fixing a higher rate on foreign ships than on American-owned ships. This would make the canal self-supporting, and thus remove all burden for its support from the Government, and at the same time would encourage our merchant marine by giving preference to ships owned by the United States or its citizens.

Since the canal is ours, built with American money, and engineered by American brains, and since by our laws the coastwise trade is reserved exclusively to American vessels, no foreign nation can complain if we give an advantage to ships engaged in the coastwise trade and owned exclusively by American citizens. The people of the United States have conferred a benefit upon the civilized world by constructing the most marvelous engineering work of the ages; if our people are not to be allowed to enjoy any benefits other than those enjoyed in common with all other commercial nations, there will be small recompense for the expense and toil and hardship involved in its construction. It was not the intention of John Hay and the other diplomats and statesmen whose leadership made the Panama Canal first a possibility and then a reality that America should dig the canal and pay for it while England should make rules for its operation and control it. This bill forecloses American rights; it does not even leave the question open to arbitration, but weakly concedes everything that is demanded and more than was demanded at the beginning of the controversy.

When doubt exists, that doubt should be resolved in favor of our own people and not in favor of Europe. On economic grounds, I am strongly in favor of preferential tolls, but this bill disposes of the question not on economic but upon legal grounds, and resolves every doubt against America and in favor of England. The third sentence of the third paragraph of section 5 of the existing canal act reads as follows:

When based upon net registered tonnage for ships of commerce the tolls shall not exceed $1.25 per net registered ton, nor be less, other than for vessels of the United States and its citizens, than the estimated proportionate cost of the actual maintenance and operation of the canal, subject, however, to the provisions of article 19 of the convention between the United States and the Republic of Panama, entered into November 18, 1903.

Section 2 of the pending bill is as follows:

SEC. 2. That the third sentence of the third paragraph of said section of said act be so amended as to read as follows: "When based upon net registered tonnage for ships of commerce the tolls shall not exceed $1.25 per net registered ton, nor be less than 75 cents per net registered ton, subject, however, to the provisions of article 19 of the convention between the United States and the Republic of Panama, entered into November 18, 1903."

It will be observed that the existing law makes exception as to vessels of the United States and its citizens. If the language of section 2 stands in the pending bill and that bill should become a law in its present form, the language referred to regarding vessels of the United States and its citizens will be stricken out. What will be the effect of the repeal of this language? As the law now stands the United States has the undoubted right to pass war vessels and commercial vessels owned or that may be hereafter owned by the Government of the United States through the canal free of tolls. If this language should be stricken from the law, the right of our Government to pass its own warships through the canal toll free is left in grave doubt; or, at any rate, if it sends its warships through without payment of tolls, under the interpretation of paragraph 1 of article 3 insisted upon by the proponents of this bill, it must grant free tolls to the warships of all foreign nations under the equality clause of that paragraph. Furthermore, if the language referred to is stricken from the law, the right of the United States Government to pass commercial ships owned by it through the canal free of tolls is absolutely taken away.

The Government now really owns a line of commercial vessels plying between New York and Colon. Of course, technically, those ships are owned by the Panama Railroad Co., though every dollar of the stock of that company is owned by the Government of the United States; so that, practically speaking, our Government now owns and operates a line of commercial steam vessels. Suppose that it desires, after the canal is completed, to continue this line of vessels, to add other ships to it, and to send these ships through the canal to our Pacific ports. Under the provisions of the pending bill it can not do so, except by paying tolls on these ships. The Government now finds it to its profit and in the interest of the people to operate these commercial vessels; the future may develop the desirability and necessity for the continuance and extension of this line in order to protect the country from exorbitant freight rates between the East and the West. Why should we absolutely give away this sovereign right and surrender to a foreign Government the power to dictate our policy as to transportation questions? Let us maintain ourselves in an independent position, where we can meet and decide the question of Government-owned steamships on its merits and from the standpoint of the interests of our own people.

This is a domestic question. Why surrender its control to England? This difficulty could have been met by an amendment specifically exempting all war or commercial vessels owned by the Government of the United States, and such an amendment would have been offered by me in the House but for the adoption of a tyrannical rule which shut off all amendments. The people of the United States have decided at the ballot box that there should be freedom of debate and amendment in this House. Yet in face of this fresh mandate from the people a rule has been adopted here, the most high-handed, despotic, unfair, and unjustifiable in in the history of American parliamentary procedure. No opportunity is given to propose amendments, the bill is jammed through by parliamentary methods unworthy of the American Congress and but lately condemned in scathing terms by the party in power.

If I were in favor of this bill I could not support it—thus crowded down the throat of Congress without opportunity to offer amendments.

Such methods of legislation are un-American, and I shall not support them. This bill undertakes to settle a momentous question of national policy, far-reaching in its importance, that is to be settled by conceding American rights and mortgaging the future. The Panama Canal question is to be settled in England's favor in exchange for some supposed, mysterious advantage of nearer consequence. The rights of the American people to offer, through their Representatives, amendments to pending legislation have been taken away by a rule drastic, tyrannical, and un-American. I am unable to subscribe to this program of unexplainable haste and indefensible abandonment of American rights; I am unwilling for the Court of St. James to settle our domestic problems; I protest against an unjustifiable cloture rule which cuts off all opportunity of amendment; and therefore I shall vote against this bill.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, I confess that from the beginning I have had some doubt in our freedom to exempt our vessels from the payment of tolls under the treaty. I was inclined, therefore, to support the President's request for repeal of the exemption law. While I have long been an advocate of our duty to build our merchant marine, I have serious doubts that the discrimination in favor of our coastwise trade as against our merchantmen carrying foreign trade is a step in the right direction.

If our way is clear under the treaty, I would be in favor of discriminating in favor of our American merchant who is carrying foreign trade as against the foreign countries which subsidize their merchantmen. It is difficult to justify giving the coastwise trade exemption and denying it to our citizens engaged in competition with the foreign trade. The coastwise trade is not in competition with the foreign trade simply because our laws will not permit foreign vessels to engage in purely coastwise trade. These vessels therefore have a monopoly of this specific trade, and it is a question whether we can justify ourselves in giving them a subsidy and not allow such favor granted to the American merchantmen who are in competition with the trade of foreign countries which subsidize their ships. For this reason I am inclined to question the wisdom of this discrimination. The United States has built the canal at an expense of $400,000,000. The cost of operation, including the cost of its protection, the annuity to Panama of $250,000, and the interest on the money invested will amount to something like $15,000,000 to $20,000,000 annually. This must be paid. If it is not paid in tolls, it must be paid out of the Federal Treasury, because it is a debt attached to the Nation. It appears to me doubtful wisdom to exempt the trade that has no foreign competition by force of our laws from any part of this stupendous burden. This exemption will cost the people of the country in taxes the first year at least $1,000,000. If we subsidize our merchant marine, it ought to be done openly, and it ought to extend to that part of it which will not grow unless we do give assistance. Our once proud merchant marine that displayed our country's flag in every port of the civilized world has been swept from the seas by our competitors through a system of subsidies that our men could not meet. We are to-day facing the pitiful and shameful situation of total destruction of sea power in the commerce of the world. If we grant favors in the canal, they should be granted so as to accrue the largest assistance to the Nation's welfare.

Mr. Speaker, I confess that from the beginning I was also inclined to support the proposition of repeal, not upon the basis that it ought to be done, whether right or wrong, in order to assist the President in his foreign policy, but rather upon the grounds that the Nation could do no greater thing than to show the world not only our willingness but our determination to sacredly regard our national honor in all matters of international as well as national obligations. But to support the President upon the basis he requests, without giving reasons for such basis, we would be at once abandoning a contention which has been a matter of negotiations for 50 years, and do it without a hearing. To comply with his request upon the basis he asks would be closing for all time the point against us, and in a manner where many men of eminent international renown are divided in their opinions. In this country our most eminent lawyers are divided in their opinions. In England the same situation is apparent, as is suggested by Mr. Innes in his note on the subject officially submitted at the time the negotiations were on. A vote for the repeal means to close the contention against us in favor of England; a vote against repeal means an opportunity to submit the matter to an impartial tribunal for adjustment. If the exemption stands, England, when the canal opens and tolls are exacted, can ask for an arbitration of the question in an impartial court. This can not be done before an overt act is committed, as for example the actual collection of toll, when the case for arbitration can arise. Our well-known reputation on the matter of arbitration where our vital interests, national defense, or honor are not at stake, as is recently emphasized by the various treaties for arbitration into which we have entered, should quiet all fears that this country does not wish to act honorably in the matter. In case this dispute involves our vital interests the 1908 law does not bind us even to submit it. That is a question for future adjustment.

Mr. Speaker, the history of the events which led to the unfortunate Clayton-Bulwer treaty, and the history of 50 years of negotiations, from 1850 to 1901, show clearly our interests in the union of the two oceans for the sake of defense and trade. It will show why we entered upon the treaty, and also why we wished to supersede it, and the many attempts to do so. This will throw some light upon our present contention.

In 1823 Monroe announced the famous doctrine that bears his name. It was reaffirmed in 1826 by the Panama mission. It was again affirmed in 1846 in the treaty of New Grenada, when we secured the right to construct a line of communication across the Isthmus and was guaranteed a sort of suzerainty over the strip across the barrier between the two oceans.

It was again reaffirmed in 1847 in the famous Yucatan episode, when we not only declined to join two European countries upon the appeal of Yucatan to effect a joint protectorate, but we declared such a plan would not be permitted because it would be in violation of the Monroe doctrine.

In the early forties our country became alarmed over England's activities on the Mosquito coast. Back in 1783 by the treaty of Paris, England claimed certain indefinite rights on the east coast of Central America, affecting Honduras and Nicaragua. Nothing was done to establish any claim that endangered the Monroe doctrine until about 1842. The United States sought to ascertain England's purposes in establishing an English protectorate on this coast. The fear that a proposed canal which had been interesting our Nation since the twenties when Clay called attention to the possibilities of such a waterway led our Government to seek a treaty by which we would be insured against England securing such dominance on this continent as that canal would give her.

We took the initiative. The Clayton-Bulwer treaty is the result.

Let Secretary Olney state what it decided. As late as 1896, the great Secretary names the following items. I quote:

> The United States in entering upon the negotiations aimed to accomplish two specific things—the renunciation of Great Britain to the claim on the Mosquito Coast and such a protectorate over the canal by Great Britain jointly with the United States, as might be expected to attract to the canal British capital. As a result it secured not only two things but a third, Great Britain's express agreement, so far as Central America is concerned, to give effect to the Monroe doctrine.

However, we soon discovered we had, as usual, lost in the game of diplomacy, and we set about an attempt to undo what we had done.

England not having relinquished formally the protectorate over the coast, we sought to amend, if not to annul, the treaty. The result was the relinquishment of the protectorate over Honduras in 1859 and Nicaragua in 1860, so we exercise our legal right to abrogate the treaty on the grounds of England's failure to carry out its provisions for 10 years. This correspondence was conducted by Marcy in 1853, then by Buchanan in 1854, in the notable correspondence with Clarendon.

In 1858 Cass resumed it with the before-mentioned results, namely, England's abandoning the protectorate. When we discovered England's decision to hold the whip hand on the canal proposition, Seward in 1863 opened negotiations. He declared it to be the policy of the United States Government to help to construct the Nicaraguan transit, open to the commerce of the world, and to discourage its interruptions by visionary schemes. He sought a treaty with Nicaragua without success. He continued his efforts until 1867. In 1876 Mr. Fish resumed the negotiations. He referred to the great expense the Government had suffered in making surveys, and so forth, and repeated again the assurance that our purpose was a speedy completion of an interoceanic waterway—

Which shall be guaranteed in its perpetual neutralization and dedication to the commerce of all nations without advantages to one over another of those who guarantee its assured neutrality.

Every power becoming a party to its stipulations and guaranties was at all times, whether in peace or war, to have the right of transit through the canal when constructed, as well as the benefit of the neutral waters at the ends thereof for all classes of vessels entitled to fly their respective flags with the cargoes on board on equal terms in every respect as between each other.

This negotiation also failed, or at least did not succeed.

It was at this time that President Hayes announced his famous dictum of international law, which is supposed to have been defined by William M. Evarts. A canal connecting two navigable seas is declared to be a part of the coast line. The dominant power of the continent is given the right to patrol that coast line.

The evident conclusion was that we could ignore the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, if we desired, construct the canal, exercise control over it, and by so doing not be guilty of violating international law. But England's dissenting reply was to the effect that such a conclusion could not be lawfuly reached, as it would deny the independence of the countries lying between the canal and the dominating nation. We therefore did not press further that proposition. Two years later, Blaine took up the same problem, to untie our hands from the obligation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, which England seemed determined not to give up.

Blaine announced a new interpretation of international law, and declared that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was no longer binding upon either party to it, because the conditions under which it was made no longer continue. He declared it was both reasonable and legal under the principles of international law that the force of a treaty ceased when conditions under which it was made ceased. He cited reasons in proof that the conditions had changed. He held that we could not bind England to respect the treaty longer than she wished to be held by it, and England could not bind us for the same reason if we cared to ignore it. His instructions were to proceed to the construction of the canal in spite of the inhibitive treaty, or at least we had such authority if we wished to exercise it.

Upon the death of Garfield, Frelinghuysen continued negotiations on the matter with Lord Granville. He made the point that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was made at a time when the United States, single-handed, was not able to enter upon such a gigantic work. But he asserted the Nation was now (1882) able to do it without any assistance from Europe. He declared that the United States held itself free to protect any canal with which the Government might be interested. He also assured Lord Granville that the United States still stood ready to maintain the freedom of passage of England's vessels. He also reminded England that she had not respected the treaty's requirements to release a protectorate over the Mosquito coast for 10 years after it was made, between 1850 and 1860, and that we could lawfully regard it as a voidable contract. Soon after this, in line with his statement, the President made a treaty with Nicaragua and sent it to the Senate. But upon the inauguration of President Cleveland he withdrew it. In his message he said:

These suggestions may serve to emphasize the necessity of the neutralization of any interoceanic transit, and this can only be accomplished by making the uses of the route open to all nations.

President Harrison made the canal the subject of a luminous message in 1889, and again in 1891, but no specific proposition was acted upon. In 1896 Secretary Olney reviewed the history of the negotiations, conducted in the interest of reaching our right to unite the two oceans, in a very notable memorandum. No definite plan was reached under Cleveland. Finally President McKinley opened the negotiations, with the result of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, which is now in dispute.

Now, Mr. Speaker, may I ask what there was in this obligation known as the Clayton-Bulwer treaty to which England so tenaciously held us, and why did she so persistently cling to it?

It appears to me that it was our relinquishment of the right to build the canal without her consent, and in case she consented it must be built as a joint canal under certain rules specifically enumerated. The one feature to which she clung is found in article 8:

The Governments of the United States and Great Britain having not only desired in entering into this convention to accomplish a particular object, but also to establish a general principle, they hereby agree to extend their protection, by treaty stipulations, to any other practicable communications, whether by canal or railway, across the Isthmus which connects North and South America, and especially to the interoceanic communications, should the same prove to be practicable, whether by canal or railway, which are now proposed to be established by the way of Tehuantepec or Panama. In granting, however, their joint protection to any such canals or railways as are by this article specified it is always understood by the United States and Great Britain that the parties constructing or owning the same shall impose no other charges or conditions of traffic thereupon than the aforesaid Governments shall approve of as just and equitable; and that the same canals or railways, being open to the citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain on equal terms, shall also be open on like terms to the citizens and subjects of every other State which is willing to grant thereto such protection as the United States and Great Britain engage to afford.

This article is incorporated in the preamble of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty as defining the purpose of the contracting parties, and may be therefore regarded as a part of the contract.

BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

A PROCLAMATION.

Whereas a convention between the United States of America and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland to facilitate the construction of a ship canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, by whatever route may be considered expedient, and to that end to remove any objection which may arise out of the convention of the 19th April, 1850, commonly called the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, to the construction of such canal under the auspices of the Government of the United States, without impairing the "general principle" of neutralization established in article 8 of that convention, was concluded and signed by their respective plenipotentiaries at the city of Washington on the 18th day of November, 1901, the original of which convention is word for word as follows:

The United States of America and His Majesty Edward VII of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and of the British Dominions beyond the Seas, King, and Emperor of India, being desirous to facilitate the construction of a ship canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, by whatever route may be considered expedient, and to that end to remove any objection which may arise out of the convention of the 19th April, 1850, commonly called the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, to the construction of such canal under the auspices of the Government of the United States, without impairing the "general principle" of neutralization established in article 8 of that convention, have for that purpose appointed as their plenipotentiaries.

It will be noted that two purposes are specified: First, to "accomplish a particular thing," and, secondly, to "establish a general principle." In other words, to build a canal, and to make it open to all the world obeying the conditions under which it is to be kept open. Of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, article 3 stipulates the rules to be observed, as follows:

ARTICLE 3.

The United States adopts, as the basis of the neutralization of such ship canal, the following rules, substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople, signed the 28th October, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Canal, that is to say:

1. The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic, or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

2. The canal shall never be blockaded, nor shall any right of war be exercised nor any act of hostility be committed within it. The United States, however, shall be at liberty to maintain such military police along the canal as may be necessary to protect it against lawlessness and disorder.

3. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not revictual nor take any stores in the canal except so far as may be strictly necessary; and the transit of such vessels through the canal shall be effected with the least possible delay in accordance with the regulations in force and with only such intermission as may result from the necessities of the service.

Prizes shall be in all respects subject to the same rules as vessels of war of the belligerents.

4. No belligerent shall embark or disembark troops, munitions of war, or warlike materials in the canal except in case of accidental hindrance of the transit, and in such case the transit shall be resumed with all possible dispatch.

5. The provisions of this article shall apply to waters adjacent to the canal, within 3 marine miles of either end. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not remain in such waters longer than 24 hours at any one time, except in case of distress, and in such case shall depart as soon as possible; but a vessel of war of one belligerent shall not depart within 24 hours from the departure of a vessel of war of the other belligerent.

6. The plant, establishments, buildings, and all works necessary to the construction, maintenance, and operation of the canal shall be deemed to be part thereof, for the purposes of this treaty, and in time of war, as in time of peace, shall enjoy complete immunity from attack or injury by belligerents and from acts calculated to impair their usefulness as part of the canal.

It is ably contended not only on this floor but by international thinkers that these rules apply to times of war only, and therefore the phrase "all nations" does not include the United States. It is asserted, if it does include our own country, then in times of war with another country we could not revictual our own war vessels in the canal; we could not take on within the canal munitions of war; we could not remain more than 24 hours in the canal; we could not allow our own vessels to come nearer than 3 miles to the entrance; and we could not pursue a fleeing war vessel short of 24 hours after it had left the canal. Of course, no person would seriously hold that such regulations are meant to apply to us when we are in war with a foreign country. If, for example, Germany and England should be at war, they would be belligerents, and we would see that these rules are respected by these two countries as belligerents. However, if we were at war with either country, or with any country, no one would seriously claim that we would be compelled to allow an enemy's vessel to enter the canal. Our fortifications, which England conceded our right to erect under the treaty, are the complete answer to whether a vessel should be allowed to revictual, to remain in the canal so long, to come within certain limits, and to be pursued short of a certain time. Nobody contends for such a position.

If there were any doubt, Sir Edward Grey, the secretary of state for foreign affairs for Great Britain, whose utterances are official, would set it at rest. In his representations to our country through Ambassador Bryce he said at the date of the signature of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty the territory on which the canal was to be constructed did not belong to the United States, consequently there was no necessity to insert provisions to preserve sovereign rights and to stipulate that local sovereignty should not be affected by the articles regulating vessels of the sovereign owner of the Canal Zone in times of war. I quote:

> Now that the United States has become the practical sovereign of the canal His Majesty's Government do not question its title to exercise belligerent rights for its protection.

If England concedes this much, does she concede our contention?

It is contended that if we here exclude the United States from the obligation to observe these rules, we must exclude it from the "all nations" clause of article 3, because vessels of commerce and vessels of war are named in the same class. If one class is excluded, neither is included.

Can this contention be sustained? England asks if she was not given equal rights to be exempt from discrimination in our favor, what did she secure? The history of this contention, from 1850 to 1901, during which time almost every President exhausted his resources of diplomacy to induce England to relinquish her rights in the construction of the canal, it is conceded clearly reveals a substantial interest in the project. What was it she wanted? What did she secure? What is the plain reading of the treaty? What does the treaty mean? Is there any interpretation that is not strained? What did John Hay, a master of English, mean? Did he intend to include the United States? If not, would he have said all countries, not including the United States? If he meant only foreign countries, would he have employed the phrase "all countries," or would he have said "all foreign" or "all other countries"? Choate, who was a party to the treaty, interprets it to include ourselves, and states it as his memory that that was the understanding of the two men whose names are affixed to the treaty. Root also gives it that meaning. But Knox, Taft, and Roosevelt all give it a different meaning. This alone makes it a subject of deep concern as to our action now.

One school of thinkers claims that the term "all nations" as used in the treaty refers to the general principle as mentioned in article 8 of the treaty of 1850 and article 3 of the treaty of 1901. This "general principle," they claim, has no significance except for the rules of neutralization of the canal. That is, it can apply only in times of war. If our own Nation is included in the phrase "all nations" in article 3, then we must be bound by the article in all its details. This, according to this school, can not be rationally held. Even the English Government does not so hold. Then, says this school, if our Nation is not included here it is excluded also in the same article, which declares that the canal must be open to all nations observing these rules upon equal terms. If we are not bound by the one clause of article 3, we are neither bound by the other clause of the same article. If we are not bound by either clause of this same article, then we are exempt from placing the same requirements upon our own vessels going through the canal that we place upon vessels of foreign countries. This interpretation would permit us to exempt not only our coastwise vessels, but also our vessels engaged in foreign trade. It would appear that such permission is a valuable right if we can employ it.

The other school of thinkers agrees with England's contention that such discrimination is an open violation of the plain reading of the treaty. This school points to the historic evidence from 1850 to 1901, which indicates England's determination not to revoke the Clayton-Bulwer treaty without securing that consideration—equal treatment for her ships of commerce. Whether this contention is well founded is in doubt, since no specific action was taken. It becomes the kernel of the contention.

To support this claim these advocates cite the universal agreement that the canal was to be an open canal. However, an open canal does not mean free of tolls. They repeat the international dictum that "navigable waters in times of peace become international waters, and not subject to exclusive national control." From this may be deduced another principle, that since "all navigable water is in times of peace open to the innocent commerce of the world," navigable waters connecting two open bodies of water, as two seas, must itself be open.

To this proposition the United States is historically committed. The question is here raised whether the Panama Canal, not being a natural waterway but a passage made possible by millions of outlay of treasure, directed by rare national skill, whether such a waterway becomes an international channel for commerce. It would appear that such a doctrine would be justified. It is like the dual character of our railroads. They are private in their ownership and profit, but at least quasi public in their operation, and quite public in their general effect.

Hence, the public exercises some authority, sometimes in contravention of the rights of the real owners. They are common carriers and must obey such laws not made by them but by the public. So it is in the case of the laws regulating canals, hotels, and so forth. It is likewise claimed such an enterprise as connecting the two oceans at Panama, although it was done by our own Government, at its own expense, must be subject to the larger international rights. In other words, the world's rights in such a thoroughfare are superior to the rights of any one nation, including the owner, because these waters which may be called private are affected by international use.

Another form of expressing this principle is the application of the doctrine of eminent domain, the appropriating private property for public use. So, in this case, it is quite probable that even at the refusal of the sovereign owner the international interest would justify the authority necessary to construct the waterway by international domain. When Colombia rejected the Hay-Herran treaty and Panama seceded from Colombia, President Roosevelt recognized Panama, which gave us the authority to make the Hay-Varilla treaty. The President put it upon the basis that no country like, for example, Colombia could prevent the undertaking and completion of such an important international waterway as the Panama Canal. This was an application of the principle of eminent domain for international purposes. All these observations argue the open canal between the seas, even though it is constructed by a single nation at its own expense. In proof of this contention, the many attempts to affect the agreement to build the proposed canal referred to it as an open canal for the use of all nations. These observations would seem to favor England's contention in the dispute against our right to exempt our own vessels from the payment of tolls while we charge a toll to hers. On the other hand, it is held that we grant to England all the favors we allow any other nation save our own. We will permit no discrimination against her, nor none in another nation's favor, which makes it an open canal.

We assumed the entire expense, built the stupendous piece of work, at a cost of $400,000,000. We assume its operations, which will cost almost $20,000,000 per year. To operate we charge all nations the same tolls, with the right reserved to allow our own vessels to go through free if we see fit. That it is insisted is matter which must be entirely left with the owner. The only expression of control we have is the treaty. It seems to admit of double interpretation. In that case what is the duty of the Congress? What should be the position of a Member of this body?

If the wording was such that its meaning was clear, the duty of every Member is to hold strictly to the meaning no matter whether it is for or against us. If the law of 1912 is not warranted by the plain interpretation of the treaty, the law should be repealed. It matters not what a political platform declares. No student of history can fail to see how all parties as well as most party leaders face about frequently upon public issues. These are too common even to be specified. If we have not the clear right to exempt our ships, we ought not to do it, even though the President from the campaign platform proclaimed the right. I do not only honor him for changing his position if done because he sees a former error, but I am sure the country would be glad to see him change his unfortunate policy of "watchful waiting," which, to say the least, is no policy at all. If our right is not specific, we ought not to exercise it, even if we invoke the charge of "surrender" to England. The only thing we must fear is a dishonorable attitude by refusing to respect our treaty obligations. Such clamor, which often serves as a substitute for argument, is not to deter an honest lawmaker no matter how loud it becomes. The one supreme duty is to find our rights in the premises. The law exempting our coastwise ships is on the statute books. England protests against our right to enact it. Her contention is supported by such men as Root and Choate and Wilson in this country. On the other hand, our Government, in 1912, decided we had the right. It was supported by two great parties in convention assembled the same year it was enacted. This contention is supported by Olney, Knox, Roosevelt, and Taft. Measuring the weight of this evidence, it is quite well balanced. The legal battle might well be called a stand-off.

To let the law remain is our announcement that we will stand by our contention for the time at least, to reopen it in case we choose to do so when such a request is properly lodged by the party protesting. The time for such a protest is when the canal opens and the tolls are ordered collected. Before I vote to close the contention against us I would wish to be convinced that our granting this concession does not of necessity subject us to renewals of other demands on matters of sovereign powers. In such matters of international import, which looks to the question of who is supreme in the Canal Zone, our rights should be well understood. The future of the Pacific must not be lost sight of. The nascent power of the Orient must be kept within our consideration. If, aside from international interest, we were justified in the enormous expenditure of money to build the canal, our national defense, our commercial position with reference to China and Japan and the Far East, our strategic situation entailed by the Spanish-American War, with all the possessions that have fallen to us, must be given ample consideration. Here is our field for future operations. Here are to be found our greatest problems of national concern. The possibilities of the problems to grow out of the coming renaissance of the Orient, when there will be, as there surely will be, a Chinese as well as a Japanese adjustment, which is fast complicating, will argue powerfully the imperative necessity for us to leave in the minds of the nations of the world, in no uncertain way, what we consider to be our rights in this great route of commerce, which might mean a channel for national defense. If we abandon what many eminent thinkers claim to be our rights upon the demand of another power, it impresses the world that we are not in full control. If we are not in full control, what will be the next demand? If we refuse to abandon, and leave it open for fair adjustment, our rights will be defined and published to the world. To do what the President asks is to do more than England requests, for she is willing to leave it for arbitration, as requested by Sir Edward Grey. It would seem unnecessary for us to go farther than England requests. If our international situation growing out of the unfortunate conditions in Mexico induces the President to make the request, we ought to make sure that it is necessary to pay such a price for the good will he seeks before we submit.

I confess, every man must confess, that the situation in Mexico would raise a question over Europe's right to say to us, "If you do not intend to protect our citizens and property in Mexico, you must not dispute our right to do so." If England, Germany, and other nations enter Mexico for that purpose, who shall say when they shall leave? If once in, when will they go out? If Mexico can not pay the heavy indemnity demanded, as it surely will be demanded when settlement is ordered in that unhappy country, who can say that these countries can not demand territory, coaling stations, and so forth, in lieu of an indemnity which unhappy Mexico can not pay? Are we ready thus to calmly surrender the Monroe doctrine and admit at our front door a European and an Asiatic complication?

On the other hand, if we hold to the Monroe doctrine, must we, in order to maintain it, pay the price of abandoning our sovereign control in this strategic zone.

If we abandon this control, we may well ask what becomes of the doctrine. Is it not a virtual abandonment of the Monroe doctrine when we confess our inability to control a zone on the American Continent for which we paid a consideration to the owner which conveyed the sovereignty to us? If the Mexican situation is endangering the Monroe doctrine, are we sure that by this very act requested by the President we are not abandoning that American doctrine? If so, are we ready to do it?

I submit that while I will not allow expediency or partisan interest to influence me in international affairs, I can not for the sake of maintaining the Monroe doctrine do that which seems to me to be a virtual abandonment of it without a hearing. In my refusing to vote for the repeal I do it on the grounds that our interests nationally and internationally compel me to refuse an abandonment of control in the Canal Zone. At least I am not willing to go further than England requests, namely, to leave the matter open for arbitration. This much I am willing to do. Our treaty of 1908 obligates us to submit to arbitration questions arising out of the interpretation of a treaty, except where vital interests, national honor, and rights of third parties are at stake. I would be glad to prove to the world our sincerity in our professions for arbitration by reaching an adjustment of this dispute in that way. But to do this does not mean to go as far as the President requests, to abandon further right and leave the matter open for challenge from interested foreign countries every time we desire to exercise any element of control which grows out of our sovereignty over the canal, which came to us by right of contract in 1903 without a protest then from the now protesting country.

Mr. Speaker, as I said in the beginning, if this were a matter of policy whether we should grant free tolls to the coastwise trade to the exclusion of all other American ships, I would not favor such discrimination; but that is not the question we are called upon here to decide. To vote here against a policy of free tolls upon the demand made upon us on the ground that we have not the right to exercise control, and that demand lodged by a foreign country, the question involves the sovereignty of this American Nation over an enterprise of our own handiwork. This sovereign control was not disputed in the many negotiations from 1901 to 1912, during which period the interpretation of the treaty of 1901 by Hay, Knox, Root, the Senate, and the House indicated our right, which was asserted at least by implication and which was not disputed by England. Because of this, and the likelihood that this demand may be followed by others, I am compelled to vote against the repeal.

Mr. HAMILTON of New York. Mr. Speaker, at the time the proposition for the repeal of the free-tolls clause was first presented to us I was very much inclined to support the bill when it came before the House principally upon the ground that in matters of this description I prefer, as far as possible, to support the President because he is the President, regardless of his political faith. I became deeply interested in the subject and have gone into the matter as far and as deeply as the time and the information available would allow. The result of this study has been to cause an absolute change in my opinion. Although the Hay-Pauncefote treaty has been read and reread to the House as a whole and in part, still, as on the interpretation of this document rests the whole of the contention, I shall take the liberty of incorporating it in my remarks.

HAY-PAUNCEFOTE TREATY.

The United States of America and His Majesty, Edward the Seventh, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and of the British Dominions Beyond the Seas, King, and Emperor of India, being desirous to facilitate the construction of a ship canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans by whatever route may be considered expedient and to that end to remove any objection which may arise out of the convention of the 19th of April, 1850, commonly called the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, to the construction of such canal under the auspices of the Government of the United States, without impairing the "general principle" of neutralization established in article 8 of that convention, have for that purpose appointed as their plenipotentiaries:

The President of the United States, John Hay, Secretary of State of the United States of America;

And His Majesty, Edward VII, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and of the British Dominions Beyond the Seas, King, and Emperor of India, the Right Hon. Lord Pauncefote, G. C. B., G. C. M. G., His Majesty's ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary to the United States;

Who, having communicated with each other their full powers, which were found to be in due and proper form, have agreed upon the following articles:

"ARTICLE 1.

"The high contracting parties agree that the present treaty shall supersede the aforementioned convention of the 19th of April, 1850.

"ARTICLE 2.

"It is agreed that the canal may be constructed under the auspices of the Government of the United States, either directly at its own cost or by gift or loan of money to individuals or corporations or through subscription to or purchase of stock or shares, and that, subject to the provisions of the present treaty, the said Government shall have and enjoy all the rights incident to such construction, as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal.

"ARTICLE 3.

"The United States adopts as the basis of the neutralization of such ship canal the following rules, substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople, signed the 28th day of October, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Canal; that is to say:

"1. The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of the condition or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such condition and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

"2. The canal shall never be blockaded, nor shall any right of war be exercised nor any act of hostility be committed within it. The United States, however, shall be at liberty to maintain such military police along the canal as may be necessary to protect it against lawlessness and disorder.

"3. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not revictual nor take any stores in the canal except so far as may be strictly necessary, and the transit of such vessels through the canal shall be effected with the least possible delay, in accordance with the regulations in force, and with only such intermission as may result from the necessities of the service.

"Prizes shall be in all respects subject to the same rules as vessels of war of the belligerents.

"4. No belligerent shall embark or disembark troops, munitions of war, or warlike materials in the canal, except in the case of accidental hindrance of the transit, and in such case the transit shall be resumed with all possible dispatch.

"5. The provisions of this article shall apply to waters adjacent to the canal, within 3 marine miles of either end. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not remain in such waters longer than 24 hours at any one time, except in case of distress, and in such case shall depart as soon as possible; but a vessel of war of one belligerent shall not depart within 24 hours from the departure of a vessel of war of the other belligerent.

"6. The plant, establishments, buildings, and all works necessary to the construction, maintenance, and operation of the canal shall be deemed to be part thereof, for the purpose of this treaty, and in time of war, as in time of peace, shall enjoy complete immunity from attack or injury by belligerents, and from acts calculated to impair their usefulness as part of the canal.

"ARTICLE 4.

"It is agreed that no change of territorial sovereignty or of the international relations of the country or countries traversed by the before-mentioned canal shall affect the general principle of neutralization or the obligation of the high contracting parties under the present treaty.

"ARTICLE 5.

"The present treaty shall be ratified by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof, and by His Britannic Majesty, and the ratifications shall be exchanged at Washington or at London at the earliest possible time within six months from the date hereof.

"In faith whereof the respective plenipotentiaries have signed this treaty and thereunto affixed their seals.

"Done in duplicate at Washington, the 18th day of November, in the year of our Lord 1901.

"JOHN HAY. [SEAL.]
"PAUNCEFOTE. [SEAL.]"

In this discussion I wish, first, to present my reasons for the belief that we are absolutely within our rights and perfectly justified in interpreting the treaty as we did when we granted free tolls to American coastwise vessels. The treaty of 1815 with Great Britain, using practically the same language, provided:

No higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed in the ports of any of His Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe on the vessels of the United States than shall be payable in the same ports on British vessels.

For nearly a hundred years that treaty has been practically construed by the two nations—and it is so, that American over-seas vessels have been charged and are charged high rates, while English coastwise vessels have been charged and are charged low rates while England has continued its monopoly of coastwise trade.

For example, in the English port of Bristol the charge per ton for American over-seas vessels is 1s. 1½d. per ton, while the charge on English coasting vessels is 5d. a ton. In the port of Liverpool the charge for American vessels is 1s. 4d. per ton and for English coasting vessels is 4½d. to 6d. per ton.

And America has not complained.

Indeed, the situation with respect to that treaty has been recognized in American jurisprudence. In the case of Olsen against Smith, reported in One hundred and ninety-fifth United States Reports, it was decided that under the treaty of 1815 a British vessel engaged in over-seas trade was not entitled to exemption accorded to the American coasting trade.

England has never questioned the decision.

From this it would seem that Great Britain has never before considered that language of this description in her treaties applied to coastwise shipping—domestic commerce. Again, it seems to me that in the treaty between the United States and the Republic of Panama, which was signed at Washington on November 8, 1903, about two years after the signing of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, and which treaty was drawn by John Hay, the same Secretary of State that drew the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, that this Government decided absolutely that we possess the right to free tolls, as in that treaty we granted to Panama free tolls on her vessels, and I have yet to hear anyone explain how we could possibly grant to another nation a privilege or right which we did not ourselves possess. The interest manifested by Great Britain toward the abolishment of free tolls for American vessels is not surprising. It is not wonderful that they should desire to transport from the Canadian northwest and the terminal of the Canadian Pacific Railway to the great ports of this country on the Atlantic in even competition, so far as tolls are concerned, with American ships. I do not wonder that our transcontinental railroads prefer to oblige their competitors by water route to pay tolls, because the free-tolls bill provides that coasting vessels owned by a railroad corporation should not be allowed the benefit of free tolls; but if I know anything at all of the sentiment and the temper of the American people, and if they have at this day, and I believe they have, the same spirit that was manifest in their forefathers in seventy-six, when they fully understand this question, as they will in a short time, they will ask Congress why we gave up the rights and titles for all time which were absolutely ours on a canal built, on land which we bought and paid for, by American people at an expense of $400,000,000. I shall not at this time touch upon President Wilson's advocacy of the Democratic platform and this particular plank before election and of his change of views since. The people will know how to ask him about that if they so desire.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Mr. Speaker, there are two or three points in this controversy to which I desire to call the attention of the House. I speak from the standpoint of a business man who has had extensive business experience in foreign countries. I have been particularly impressed by those who are supporting the contention of the President, by the claim that this repeal should be passed because of possible danger of foreign complications. These utterances come largely from men who always oppose battleships, fortifications, and armament, and yet who shake in their shoes at the slightest prospect of foreign complications and then lament our "unpreparedness for war." All this talk about national honor in the consideration of this the greatest question that has come before Congress in a quarter of a century is the merest quibble. What is needed in this House to-day is national pluck. What is needed is a little of the old-time American spirit, such as our forefathers displayed—enough at least to insure an American in a foreign country the same protection that is given to citizens of other great countries.

The crux of this whole situation is that President Wilson's Mexican policy—ridiculed by diplomats the world over—has put him into a hole, and, frightened at the shadow of Japan, his followers are now willing to make a tremendous sacrifice of American dignity and American interests to help him out. They are willing to sell our birthright for a mess of pottage—and then, after glancing timidly at the White House cudgel, they unctuously prate about "this great question of national honor."

But for the inefficiency, the inexperience, and the absolute incompetence of the man who has recently been pronounced on the floor of this House as the greatest Secretary of State the Nation has ever seen—and he could not have carried out his milk-and-water policies without the sanction of the autocrat of the White House—this country never would have been in the predicament it is in to-day—and we should not be called upon to tremble at the mere inuendo of "more important things yet to come," and then turn over to foreign nations, who are competitors of ours, the country's most notable asset, the Panama Canal—and one that speaks more loudly than the cannon's roar of American courage, American genius, and American ability to do things.

Gentlemen, to-day among nations it is not the strategy of war; it is the strategy of trade. There is a great international commercial struggle on. Europe has the advantage, because her labor costs only half what we pay. She has subsidized ships. We have not. She can build them and operate them at half the American cost. If we are to have no direct benefit by reason of having built the Panama Canal, if we pass this act of repeal, we are turning the canal over to the trade of foreign nations, and it becomes at once a perpetual commercial handicap instead of a great commercial advantage.

If this bill is passed, all hope of the development of our merchant marine is gone. The Wilson policies have already paralyzed the business of this country. Hundreds of thousands of workingmen are street ramblers to-day who had regular work a year ago. The farmer, the artisan, and the laborer are disheartened, and well they may be. The culmination of blunders will come when our canal is given without restriction to nations with subsidized ships who are flooding our markets to-day with goods that we can not make because our labor cost is greater.

[Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska addressed the House. See Appendix.]

[Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Speaker, I firmly believe that few more important questions have ever been submitted to the Congress of the United States than the one which is now before us. We are asked to pass a bill repealing the law exempting our coastwise vessels from the payment of tolls for passage through the Panama Canal. The President in his message has asked for the repeal of this provision because, in his judgment, it constitutes—a mistaken economic policy from every point of view, and is, moreover, in plain contravention of the treaty with Great Britain concerning the canal, concluded on November 18, 1911.

In the consideration of the economic side of the question we are met with two propositions: First, that the exemption is a subsidy; second, that it benefits only a Shipping Trust that is controlled by the railroads.

I can not agree that the exemption is a subsidy. Tolls imposed upon vessels going through the canal will undoubtedly be added to the freight rate and saddled upon the consumer. The remission of these tolls will not be a grant to the owners of the vessels, but will be a benefit that will inure in the end to the consumer. It is to my mind far less objectionable than the 5 per cent rebate for American vessels carried in the Underwood tariff bill. The canal, it is true, has cost approximately $400,000,000, and the expense of maintenance, including interest charges and other expenses, will reach a total of approximately $15,000,000 annually. It is estimated that for the first few years the total annual income from tolls from foreign vessels will be about $10,000,000, and that the amount of the exemption to the coastwise vessels will be between $1,000,000 and $2,000,000. The tolls for foreign vessels have not been fixed at a sum that will pay all the annual expenses of the canal, and to a certain extent we tax ourselves for the benefit of foreign vessels. As they will have about ten times the tonnage of the coastwise vessels, even if we charged tolls to our coastwise vessels the foreign ships would still be the beneficiaries of a sum in the aggregate many times larger than received by our vessels. But it seems to me, and I have always so regarded it, that the canal is a part of our coast line—that it is just as much a part of our territory as one of the States—and I can see no difference between permitting vessels to use the inland rivers and canals free of charge and permitting our vessels to use the canal free of tolls. We have expended vast sums on our inland waterways to promote navigation. The Mississippi has received almost $150,000,000 from the Government, and the river and harbor bill of 1915 carries a $7,000,000 appropriation for that river. The Ohio, Missouri, and other rivers have received vast sums, and for all these streams still greater expenditures will be made each year. We have spent vast sums in improving our harbors and have in contemplation the intracoastal canal from Maine to Texas, which will cost a vast sum and which will be an expense to the entire people, with not a cent of tolls to be paid by the vessels using it. If the grant of free tolls to our vessels at the Panama Canal is a mistaken economic policy, then it seems to me that we have long been in error in not charging for the use of our inland rivers and canals.

In 1884, in the rivers and harbors act, it was provided:

No tolls or operating charges whatever shall be levied upon or collected from any vessel, dredge, or other water craft for passing through any lock, canal, canalized river, or other work for the use and benefit of navigation now belonging to the United States or that may be hereafter acquired or constructed.

We have never departed from this policy, and gentlemen who claim the Panama exemption is a subsidy ought to reverse our policy and repeal this law of 1884. The people of the Mississippi Valley are now and have been for many years deeply interested in the development of the Mississippi River so that we may have water transportation not only from New Orleans but through transportation through the canal to points on the western coast of the United States. Such improvement of the Mississippi River will undoubtedly result in making of the city of St. Louis, which I have the honor to represent in part, a commercial center of much greater importance than it is now. The remission of tolls will encourage the building of new vessels to run between New Orleans and points on the Pacific coast and stimulate the movement for the improvement of the Mississippi River. It has been demonstrated conclusively that water competition is the most effective regulator of freight rates. For this reason we have expended over $700,000,000 in developing our inland waterways, deepening our harbors, and constructing locks and canals. We have never charged vessels a single penny for the use of these immense inland waterway facilities constructed and improved at such a great cost. We have been well satisfied with the competition that has resulted between transportation by water and rail and the consequent great saving in freight rates to the people of the Nation. The same considerations that have induced us to pursue this policy of improvement of our inland waterways and bring about cheaper transportation should now apply in the use of the Panama Canal, which will bring about cheap and free communication between the Atlantic, Gulf, and Pacific points in our country.

We are told that the coastwise vessels are a railroad-owned and trust-owned monopoly.

In the first place, the coastwise trade is reserved for our own vessels, something that is done by practically every nation on earth. The law reads:

No merchandise shall be transported by water, under penalty of forfeiture thereof, from one port of the United States to another port of the United States, either directly or via a foreign port, or for any part of the voyage, in any other vessel than a vessel of the United States. But this section shall not be construed to prohibit the sailing of any foreign vessel from one port to another port of the United States: Provided, That no merchandise other than that imported in such vessel from some foreign port which shall not have been unladen shall be carried from one port or place in the United States to another. No foreign vessel shall transport passengers between ports or places in the United States, either directly or by way of a foreign port, under a penalty of $200 for each passenger so transported and landed.

The purpose of the law was to build up and preserve our merchant marine. As a result, we have the greatest coastwise fleet in the world. If this law is what is objected to, then the advocates of repeal ought to go to the heart of the subject and repeal this law. It must be plain to all that the repeal of the toll exemption will not abolish the monopoly.

In the second place, if the vessels are owned by a trust, they can not use the canal under any circumstances. The Panama Canal act says:

No vessel permitted to engage in the coastwise or foreign trade of the United States shall be permitted to enter or pass through said canal if such ship is owned, chartered, operated, or controlled by any person or company which is doing business in violation of the provisions of the act of Congress approved July 2, 1890, entitled "An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies," or the provisions of sections 73 to 77, both inclusive, of an act approved August 27, 1894, entitled "An act to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes," or the provisions of any other act of Congress amending or supplementing the said act of July 2, 1890, commonly known as the Sherman Antitrust Act, and amendments thereto, or said sections of the act of August 27, 1894. The question of fact may be determined by the judgment of any court of the United States of competent jurisdiction in any cause pending before it to which the owners or operators of such ship are parties. Suit may be brought by any shipper or by the Attorney General of the United States.

It is plain that if these coastwise ships are owned or controlled by a combination which exists in violation of the Sherman Act they will not be permitted to use the canal, with or without tolls, and, furthermore, the proceedings against those who own or control the ships may be instituted by any individual.

In the third place, if the vessels in the coastwise trade are owned by a railroad for the purpose of destroying competition, they can not use the canal. The Panama Canal act provides:

From and after the 1st day of July, 1914, it shall be unlawful for any railroad company or other common carrier subject to the act to regulate commerce to own, lease, operate, control, or have any interest whatsoever (by stock ownership or otherwise, either directly, indirectly, through any holding company, or by stockholders or directors in common, or in any other manner) in any common carrier by water operated through the Panama Canal or elsewhere with which said railroad or other carrier aforesaid does or may compete for traffic or any vessel carrying freight or passengers upon said water route or elsewhere with which said railroad or other carrier aforesaid does or may compete for traffic; and in case of the violation of this provision each day in which such violation continues shall be deemed a separate offense.

Jurisdiction is hereby conferred on the Interstate Commerce Commission to determine questions of fact as to the competition or possibility of competition, after full hearing, on the application of any railroad company or other carrier. Such application may be filed for the purpose of determining whether any existing service is in violation of this section and pray for an order permitting the continuance of any vessel or vessels already in operation, or for the purpose of asking an order to install new service not in conflict with the provisions of this paragraph. The commission may on its own motion or the application of any shipper institute proceedings to inquire into the operation of any vessel in use by any railroad or other carrier which has not applied to the commission and had the question of competition or the possibility of competition determined as herein provided. In all such cases the order of said commission shall be final.

If the Interstate Commerce Commission shall be of the opinion that any such existing specified service by water other than through the Panama Canal is being operated in the interest of the public and is of advantage to the convenience and commerce of the people, and that such extension will neither exclude, prevent, nor reduce competition on the route by water under consideration, the Interstate Commerce Commission may, by order, extend the time during which such service by water may continue to be operated beyond July 1, 1914. In every case of such extension the rates, schedules, and practices of such water carrier shall be filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission and shall be subject to the act to regulate commerce and all amendments thereto in the same manner and to the same extent as is the railroad or other common carrier controlling such water carrier or interested in any manner in its operation: Provided, Any application for extension under the terms of this provision filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission prior to July 1, 1914, but for any reason not heard and disposed of before said date, may be considered and granted thereafter.

It is evident that under the provisions of the Panama Canal act the Interstate Commerce Commission has full, complete, and absolute power to compel through rates, to regulate the traffic; and, further, that no railroad-owned ship can pass through the canal, tolls or no tolls, unless the ownership is a legitimate and proper one within the meaning of the law.

While I do not agree that the exemption is a subsidy, yet if this exemption is too great a burden upon the Treasury, I would not hesitate to vote for repeal any more than I would hesitate to increase the income tax or internal-revenue tax or reduce an appropriation of any kind, if such action was necessary for the wise and careful management of our fiscal affairs.

But the repeal is not sought on this ground. We are told that we must repeal, because exemption is in violation of our treaty obligations. The repeal therefore, if it passes, will be the construction of a treaty and an admission to the world that we did not have the right to exempt our own vessels from toll, and that we are not in absolute control of our canal, built with our money, in our territory. If I thought we had violated a treaty obligation I would not hesitate a moment to vote for repeal. I concede to every man the right to follow his own conviction, and upon this question I reserve the right to form my own conclusions, to make my own investigations, and to cast my vote for what I consider to be the right.

Because of the importance of the question thus raised, I have studied the matter carefully and have listened to the many able and eloquent addresses made in this House. I feel that the decision of the Congress upon this bill is of vital importance to the future of the country. The passage of this bill will not be like the passage of others, that may be repealed in a few years and again reenacted, but it is a declaration to the world of a new principle, from which we may not easily recede and which will hamper and cripple for all time the officials who have charge of our foreign affairs.

The Clayton-Bulwer treaty was entered into between the United States and Great Britain in 1850 to promote the building of a canal over the Nicaraguan route, to be jointly protected by both Governments, and prohibited any discrimination in favor of either contracting party as against the other.

Article 1 of that treaty reads:

The Governments of the United States and Great Britain hereby declare that neither the one nor the other will ever obtain or maintain for itself any exclusive control over the said ship canal; agreeing that neither will ever erect or maintain any fortifications commanding the same, or in the vicinity thereof, or occupy, or fortify, or colonize, or assume or exercise any dominion over Nicaragua, Costa Rica, the Mosquito Coast, or any part of Central America; nor will either make use of any protection which either affords or may afford, or any alliance which either has or may have, to or with any State or people for the purpose of erecting or maintaining any such fortifications, or of occupying, fortifying, or colonizing Nicaragua, Costa Rica, the Mosquito Coast, or any part of Central America, or of assuming or exercising dominion over the same; nor will the United States or Great Britain take advantage of any intimacy, or use any alliance, connection, or influence that either may possess with any State or Government through whose territory the said canal may pass, for the purpose of acquiring or holding, directly or indirectly, for the citizens or subjects of the one any rights or advantages in regard to commerce or navigation through the said canal which shall not be offered on the same terms to the citizens or subjects of the other.

Under the provisions of article 8, afterwards referred to, in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty the parties agreed to extend their "protection" by treaty stipulation to the Panama route, which was not covered by the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. No such treaty had been negotiated between the parties under this article, which contains the only provisions applicable to the Panama route. Article 8 reads:

The Governments of the United States and Great Britain having not only desired, in entering into this convention, to accomplish a particular object, but also to establish a general principle, they hereby agree to extend their protection, by treaty stipulations, to any other practicable communications, whether by canal or railway, across the isthmus which connects North and South America; and especially to the interoceanic communications—should the same prove to be practicable, whether by canal or railway—which are now proposed to be established by the way of Tehuantepec or Panama. In granting, however, their joint protection to any such canals or railways as are by this article specified, it is always understood by the United States and Great Britain that the parties constructing or owning the same shall impose no other charges or conditions of traffic thereupon than the aforesaid Governments shall approve of as just and equitable; and that the same canals or railways, being open to the citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain on equal terms, shall also be open on like terms to the citizens and subjects of every other State which is willing to grant thereto such protection as the United States and Great Britain engage to afford.

The Clayton-Bulwer treaty remained in force until 1902, when it was superseded by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. The Hay-Pauncefote treaty as finally ratified and adopted is as follows:

Whereas a convention between the United States of America and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, to facilitate the construction of a ship canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, by whatever route may be considered expedient, and to that end to remove any objection which may arise out of the convention of the 19th April, 1850, commonly called the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, to the construction of such canal under the auspices of the Government of the United States, without impairing the "general principle" of neutralization established in article 8 of that convention, was concluded and signed by their respective plenipotentiaries at the city of Washington on the 18th day of November, 1901, the original of which convention is word for word as follows:

The United States of America and His Majesty Edward VII, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and of the British Dominions beyond the Seas, King, and Emperor of India, being desirous to facilitate the construction of a ship canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, by whatever route may be considered expedient, and to that end to remove any objection which may arise out of the convention of the 19th April, 1850, commonly called the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, to the construction of such canal under the auspices of the Government of the United States, without impairing the "general principle" of neutralization established in article 8 of that convention, have for that purpose appointed as their plenipotentiaries:

The President of the United States, John Hay, Secretary of State of the United States of America;

And His Majesty Edward VII, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and of the British Dominions beyond the Seas, King, and Emperor of India, the Right Hon. Lord Pauncefote, G. C. B., G. C. M. G., His Majesty's Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary to the United States;

Who, having communicated to each other their full powers which were found to be in due and proper form, have agreed upon the following articles:

ARTICLE 1.

The high contracting parties agree that the present treaty shall supersede the aforementioned convention of the 19th April, 1850.

ARTICLE 2.

It is agreed that the canal may be constructed under the auspices of the Government of the United States, either directly at its own cost, or by gift or loan of money to individuals or corporations, or through subscription to or purchase of stock or shares, and that, subject to the provisions of the present treaty, the said Government shall have and enjoy all the rights incident to such construction, as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal.

ARTICLE 3.

The United States adopts, as the basis of the neutralization of such ship canal, the following rules, substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople, signed the 28th October, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Canal; that is to say:

1. The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic, or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

2. The canal shall never be blockaded, nor shall any right of war be exercised nor any act of hostility be committed within it. The United States, however, shall be at liberty to maintain such military police along the canal as may be necessary to protect it against lawlessness and disorder.

3. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not revictual nor take any stores in the canal except so far as may be strictly necessary; and the transit of such vessels through the canal shall be effected with the least possible delay in accordance with the regulations in force, and with only such intermission as may result from the necessities of the service.

Prizes shall be in all respects subject to the same rules as vessels of war of the belligerents.

4. No belligerent shall embark or disembark troops, munitions of war, or warlike materials in the canal, except in case of accidental hindrance of the transit, and in such case the transit shall be required with all possible dispatch.

5. The provisions of this article shall apply to waters adjacent to the canal, within 3 marine miles of either end. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not remain in such waters longer than 24 hours at any one time, except in case of distress, and in such case shall depart as soon as possible, but a vessel of war of one belligerent shall not depart within 24 hours from the departure of a vessel of war of the other belligerent.

6. The plant, establishments, buildings, and all works necessary to the construction, maintenance, and operation of the canal shall be deemed to be part thereof, for the purposes of this treaty, and in time of war, as in time of peace, shall enjoy complete immunity from attack or injury by belligerents and from acts calculated to impair their usefulness as part of the canal.

ARTICLE 4.

It is agreed that no change of territorial sovereignty or of the international relations of the country or countries traversed by the before-mentioned canal shall affect the general principle of neutralization or the obligation of the high contracting parties under the present treaty.

ARTICLE 5.

The present treaty shall be ratified by the President of the United States by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof, and by His Britannic Majesty; and the ratifications shall be exchanged at Washington or at London at the earliest possible time within six months from the date hereof.

In faith whereof the respective plenipotentiaries have signed this treaty and thereunto affixed their seals.

Done in duplicate at Washington the 18th day of November, A. D. 1901.

JOHN HAY. [SEAL.]
PAUNCEFOTE. [SEAL.]

I have set forth this final treaty in full because there has been much confusion and misunderstanding due to the fact that there is difference between this treaty and the original Hay-Pauncefote treaty, which was rejected by Great Britain after it had been amended in the Senate.

After the Hay-Pauncefote treaty had been concluded the United States negotiated a treaty with Colombia for the use of a strip through Panama, the latter at that time being a part of Colombia. The treaty was not ratified by Colombia, and therefore failed. Subsequently Panama secured her independence, and we then negotiated the treaty which gave us the Canal Zone. This treaty with Panama contains the following provisions:

The Republic of Panama grants to the United States all the rights, power, and authority within the zone mentioned and described in article 2 of this agreement and within the limits of all auxiliary lands and waters mentioned and described in said article 2 which the United States would possess and exercise if it were the sovereign of the territory within which said lands and waters are located, to the entire exclusion of the exercise by the Republic of Panama of any such sovereign rights, power, or authority.

The grant is full and complete and vests the sovereignty of the Canal Zone in the United States, "to the entire exclusion of the exercise by the Republic of Panama of any such sovereign rights, power, or authority." The Panama Canal is therefore built on territory over which the United States is sovereign, and we should be slow, indeed, to yield to the claims of any foreign nation of a right to say what policy we shall pursue in the regulation of our internal affairs. The contention of Great Britain, if upheld, imposes a restriction upon our sovereignty and recognizes the right of a foreign power to a voice in the regulation of our domestic policies.

The provision of the Panama Canal act which is said to violate our treaty with Great Britain is as follows:

No toll shall be levied upon vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States.

Great Britain contends that this exemption is a violation of rule 1 of article 3, and construes that rule to give to all nations the right to equal treatment with the vessels of the United States; that if we exempt our coastwise ships from tolls, then we must exempt the vessels of all nations from tolls; that the words "all nations" include the United States.

I can not subscribe to any such interpretation of the treaty, and my study of the subject convinces me that rule 1 and the other rules of article 3 must be taken together and that they can not and do not include the United States as one of the nations to be bound by these rules. It seems absurd to me to say that the United States adopted rules for the government of itself and which rules give the United States no greater rights or privileges than any other nation. My opinion is further strengthened when I recall that the rejected Hay-Pauncefote treaty provided rules that were adopted by the "high contracting parties"—that is, Great Britain and the United States—while the treaty finally agreed upon provided that the "United States adopts" the rules.

When we examine these rules it becomes apparent that it was never intended that they should be construed as applicable to the United States in common with "all nations." The first rule links vessels of commerce and of war. If the United States is included in the terms "all nations," then we can not pass our war vessels through the canal without paying toll unless we exempt the war vessels of all nations from paying tolls. If the British view is correct the canal will be of no use to us in time of war, since the rules provide that vessels of war of a belligerent shall not revictual nor take stores in the canal unless strictly necessary, nor can we do any of the other things forbidden by rules 2 to 6. I realize it will be said that these latter rules do not apply to the United States, but if we admit that the rules apply to the United States only as far as vessels of commerce are concerned, we will be compelled some day to admit that all of the rules apply. Great Britain makes a protest to-day, another nation may make one to-morrow, and our troubles will never cease. I can come to no other conclusion but that these rules, all of them, were adopted by the United States and guaranteed to all other nations the use of the canal as long as they observed the rules so prescribed. The United States owns the canal and uses it by reason of such ownership, and not by reason of rules which it adopted for the guidance of other nations.

The questions involved were ably discussed by Hon. Richard Olney at the annual meeting of the American Society of International Law on April 25, 1913, and I give the following extract from his paper:

To sum up the conclusions resulting from the foregoing considerations it is submitted that—

1. The United States, as builder and owner of an artifical waterway within its own territory, is entitled to dictate the conditions of its use unless and only so far as it has contracted the right of way.

2. It has made no such contract, except with Great Britain and by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty and by the clause of that treaty which stipulate for the use of the canal by "all nations" on equal terms and for reasonable and equitable tolls.

3. As the term "all nations" comprehends not only States, but their nationals, the crucial question is: Are the words "all nations" inclusive or exclusive of the United States and its nationals?

4. The principle is well settled that a State conveys away its rights of sovereignty or property only by terms which are clear and express and are not susceptible of any other reasonable construction. If the terms are vague and of doubtful import, the presumption is against the State's intention to part with or abridge its jurisdictional or property rights.

5. Hence, as the term "all nations" as used in the treaty may be taken to mean either all without exception or all except the United States, the latter meaning is to be accepted as the true one, because the least restrictive of the normal rights and powers of the United States.

6. But it is unnecessary to rely upon presumption. The treaty assumes the United States to be the owner of a canal to be built by it on its own territory, and must be taken to have had as its natural and legitimate aim the fixing of the terms upon which other nations might use it. Except as necessarily abridged by such terms, nothing in the treaty indicates any purpose to further abridge the rights of the United States as canal builder and owner.

7. In short, the treaty is an instrument by which the proprietor of a canal fixes and states the terms of use to its customers.

There is an utter absence of evidence that the United States regarded itself as one of its customers.

8. The neutralization proposed by the Clayton-Bulwer treaty resembles that proposed by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty only in the idea that the operating charges and rules for use of the canal shall be the same for all nations. It differs, of course, in the vital feature of conditioning such equality of terms upon protection being afforded to the canal.

9. When five out of six of the treaty rules for the use of the canal do not apply to the United States it is a reasonable conclusion that the sixth also was not meant so to apply.

10. The different phases of American public and official sentiment respecting the canal are noteworthy and not to be overlooked in construing the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

When the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty was under discussion in the Senate this very question of our right to exempt our coastwise vessels from the payment of tolls was discussed. This discussion was in executive session, and there is no official record of what was said, but from the statements since made in the Senate and elsewhere by those who took part in the discussion of that treaty it has been conclusively shown that it was the understanding at that time that we undoubtedly did have the right under the treaty to make the exemption. An amendment was offered by Senator Bard in executive session specifically reserving the right to exempt coastwise vessels from tolls, but this amendment was voted down because it was believed that we had that right under the terms of the proposed treaty. Senator Bard has also so stated in a letter which has been many times published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I quote from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of July 20, 1912, a statement made by Senator LODGE, now one of the advocates of repeal:

Mr. LODGE. While I am on my feet, if the Senator will allow me, there is one other thing I should like to say. I said in my remarks a few days ago that my personal view was that we had the right to exempt American vessels from tolls. I did not go into the matter. I took a somewhat active part in the two Hay-Pauncefote treaties, as they are called. I voted against the Bard amendment. I voted against it in the belief that it was unnecessary; that the right to fix tolls, if we built the canal or it was built under our auspices, was undoubted. I know that was the view taken by the then Senator from Minnesota, Mr. Davis, who was at that time chairman of the committee. I certainly so stated on the floor. * * * I had that same view in regard to this treaty. I was familiar with the work that was done upon it in London at the time when it was concluded there and finally agreed to, and I was very familiar with it here. Although, as the Senator from Georgia correctly said, the question was not raised at that time, I personally have never had any doubt that the matter of fixing the tolls must necessarily be within our jurisdiction; and when I referred to our going to The Hague as useless I did not mean because our case was not a good one. I meant because, in the nature of things, we could by no possibility have a disinterested tribunal at The Hague. It would be for the interest of every other nation involved to prevent our fixing the tolls according to our own wishes.

When the second treaty was submitted to the Senate, Secretary of State Hay said:

The United States alone, as the sole owner of the canal, as a purely American enterprise, adopts and prescribes the rules by which the use of the canal shall be regulated and assumes the entire responsibility and burden of enforcing, without the assistance of Great Britain or of any other nation, its absolute neutrality.

It seems strange that gentlemen should argue that we are alone in holding that the Hay-Pauncefote treaty prevents us from discriminating in favor of our coastwise vessels when a number of international authorities uphold our rights.

In the London Law Magazine and Review Mr. Cox-Sinclair, an English authority, says:

The United States can support its action on the precise words of the material articles of the treaty; its case is strengthened by reference to the preamble and context, and its case is difficult to challenge on the grounds of natural justice.

Another English authority, Mr. C. A. Hereshoff-Bartlett, says:

The treaty could never have been intended to prevent the Federal Government from arranging and regulating its domestic or coastwise commerce and in the use and enjoyment of its own property as it saw fit. No such restriction could have been in view in adopting "as the basis for neutralization" a rule that the canal should be free and open to vessels of commerce and of war of all nations on terms of entire equality. It would be absurd for the United States to solemnly declare that its own vessels of war might openly and freely navigate its own landlocked waterways and enjoy the privileges that belong to the nation as a sovereign power in the use of its own territory. The use of the words "vessels of war" shows plainly that the word "vessels" as used refers only and exclusively to those of all nations other than those of the United States, and that the word "nations" was restricted to foreign nations; that is to say, nations foreign to the United States.

It will also be noted that after the passage of the Panama Canal bill by the House and while it was pending in the Senate the British protest was filed with the State Department. In his note of July 8, 1912, Mr. Innes, representing the British Government, said:

If the trade should be so regulated as to make it certain that only coastwise traffic, which is reserved for United States vessels, would be benefited by this exemption, it may be that no objection could be taken.

This statement from the British protest indicates that our claims are regarded as well founded even by that Government.

In the exemption of our coastwise ships we have followed our traditional policy, and since foreign vessels are not permitted to enter this trade, it is difficult to see how they are discriminated against. Great Britain to-day in her own ports discriminates in favor of her own coastwise trade, notwithstanding the provisions of the treaty of 1815. That treaty provides:

No higher or other duties or charge shall be imposed in any of the ports of the United States on British vessels than those payable in the same ports by vessels of the United States, nor in the ports of any of His Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe on the vessels of the United States than shall be payable in the same port on British vessels.

The same policy is pursued by the United States which makes certain charges against foreign vessels, but exempts vessels engaged in the coastwise trade. Pilotage charges are made in certain States, and in the case of Olsen v. Smith (195 U. S., 344), the Supreme Court of the United States passed upon the application of the foregoing treaty provision.

The laws of Texas provided a rate to be paid for licensed pilotage by vessels engaged in the foreign trade, but exempted vessels engaged in the coastwise trade. The Statutes of the United States also exempted coastwise vessels from State charges. The licensed pilots brought an action against unlicensed pilots for piloting a British vessel coming from a foreign port. The defendants contended that as the vessel was a British vessel coming from a foreign port, the State laws were in conflict with the treaty of 1815, which expressly provided that:

No higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed in any of the ports of the United States on British vessels than those payable in the same port by vessels of the United States.

The State laws did impose a higher charge on British vessels than was imposed upon coastwise vessels, but the Supreme Court held that there was no discrimination in violation of the treaty. The Supreme Court said:

"Neither the exemption of coastwise steam vessels from pilotage, resulting from the law of the United States, nor any lawful exemption of coastwise vessels created by the State law concerns vessels in the foreign trade, and therefore any such exemption does not operate to produce a discrimination against British vessels engaged in the foreign trade and in favor of vessels of the United States in such trade."

The language of the treaty of 1815 is stronger perhaps than the language of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, since it expressly provided that the charges should not be higher in our ports for British vessels than for our own.

Mr. Speaker, I believe the right of the United States to regulate and control the canal is of such vital importance that we should not surrender that right unless we are certain that we have violated our treaty obligation. I believe in living up to contracts and agreements between nations as I do between individuals. A careful study of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty convinces me that the British claims are untenable. I believe that it is the duty of every Member of this House to weigh this great and important question most carefully, and having reached a decision to vote according to his convictions.

I have the greatest respect and admiration for the President, and in every measure that he has advocated that has so far been before the House I have supported him by my vote. The American people have great confidence in him, and no one will question his honesty, sincerity, and patriotism. I regret to have to differ with him, but after a careful consideration of the questions involved I am firmly convinced that he is in error, and I shall therefore vote against this bill.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, the President has asked the Congress to reverse its action of August 24, 1912, exempting American coastwise vessels from payment of tolls at Panama. We are asked to reverse the policy of this country not only as regards the canal, but also as regards its long-established policy of allowing no foreign interference with the regulation of its internal affairs. In a matter of such great moment it is well to consider carefully the necessity for such action. The only argument of importance advanced by the advocates of the repeal measure is that the President has requested it. His request is embodied in his address to the Congress on March 5, 1914, which is as follows:

Mr. Speaker, Mr. President, gentlemen of the Congress, I have come to you upon an errand which can be very briefly performed, but I beg that you will not measure its importance by the number of sentences in which I state it. No communication I have addressed to the Congress carried with it graver or more far-reaching implications as to the interest of the country, and I come now to speak upon a matter with regard to which I am charged in a peculiar degree, by the Constitution itself, with personal responsibility.

I have come to ask you for the repeal of that provision of the Panama Canal act of August 24, 1912, which exempts vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States from payment of tolls, and to urge upon you the justice, the wisdom, and the large policy of such a repeal with the utmost earnestness of which I am capable.

In my own judgment, very fully considered and maturely formed, that exemption constitutes a mistaken economic policy from every point of view, and is, moreover, in plain contravention of the treaty with Great Britain concerning the canal concluded on November 18, 1901. But I have not come to urge upon you my personal views. I have come to state to you a fact and a situation. Whatever may be our own differences of opinion concerning this much-debated measure, its meaning is not debated outside the United States. Everywhere else the language of the treaty is given but one interpretation, and that interpretation precludes the exemption I am asking you to repeal. We consented to the treaty; its language we accepted, if we did not originate; and we are too big, too powerful, too self-respecting a Nation to interpret with too strained or refined a reading the words of our own promises just because we have power enough to give us leave to read them as we please. The large thing to do is the only thing that we can afford to do, a voluntary withdrawal from a position everywhere questioned and misunderstood. We ought to reverse our action without raising the question whether we were right or wrong, and so once more deserve our reputation for generosity and for the redemption of every obligation without quibble or hesitation.

I ask this of you in support of the foreign policy of the administration. I shall not know how to deal with other matters of even greater delicacy and nearer consequence if you do not grant it to me in ungrudging measure.

The message of the President is short, and in it he gives no reason which may be considered tangible and of sufficient importance to outweigh the declaration of party principles as enunciated in the platform of 1912 by the Democratic national convention at Baltimore. That platform contains this provision:

We favor the exemption from tolls of American ships engaged in coastwise trade passing through the Panama Canal. We also favor legislation forbidding the use of the Panama Canal by ships owned or controlled by railroad carriers engaged in transportation competitive with the canal.

Such a statement is a promise on which the people elected us to power, and I, for one, consider myself bound by it. I am and always have been a platform Democrat. In South Carolina, in offering for office, we announce no platform of policies, but agree merely to abide by the platform of the Democratic Party. Particularly do I consider that promise binding when the party has gone before the country on that platform and been elected to power in order to carry out its promises. This plank favoring exemption of tolls on coastwise vessels was indorsed not only by the general electorate, but by a Democratic House of Representatives. It had the support, as it has in the present instance, of the Democratic floor leader, Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is also supported by the Hon. CHAMP CLARK, Speaker of the House. Prior to the election the tolls-exemption plank had the indorsement of President Wilson, who, in speaking to a meeting at Washington Park, N. J., on August 15, 1912, approved of the exemption in no uncertain terms. What the President's reasons are for changing his views, I do not know, though I am sure that he is entirely honest in his present belief and is actuated by patriotic motives. Not only was approval given to this plank prior to the election by the President, but stress was laid upon it by other Democratic speakers, particularly those who were campaigning in the far West. Consequently the argument first advanced by some of the overzealous proponents of the repeal that the tolls-exemption plank was carelessly incorporated in the platform must be abandoned in the light of the facts. The matter was fully considered in the subcommittee of the platform committee at Baltimore. Of this subcommittee, Hon. William Jennings Bryan was chairman, and I am informed that the credit for placing this plank in the platform was due to Mr. Bryan.

It is, of course, unnecessary to state that the Democratic national convention does not make principles for the Democratic Party. On the contrary, the convention only declares what those principles are, and is, in effect, the high court of appeal in the party for the enunciation of its principles. Some of my friends favoring tolls claim that free tolls for American coastwise vessels passing through the canal constitute a subsidy, and that the Democratic Party is opposed to subsidies. It is true that the Democratic Party is opposed to subsidies. In the 1912 platform this plank was inserted:

We believe in fostering, by constitutional regulation of commerce, the growth of a merchant marine, which shall develop and strengthen the commercial ties which bind us to our sister Republics of the south, but without imposing additional burdens upon the people and without bounties or subsidies from the Public Treasury.

It will be disputed nowhere that the Democratic Party—and very properly, in my opinion—is opposed to subsidies, but is it to be supposed that Mr. Bryan and his subcommittee, as well as the national convention at Baltimore which adopted the platform with these two separate and distinct planks in it, embraced in the same subdivision headed "Merchant Marine," did not know the difference between a subsidy and the policy which has been maintained by the United States for more than a hundred years of giving a monopoly to American ships of the coastwise trade?

No ship flying a foreign flag can take on goods at one American port, such as New York, and carry them to another port, such as Charleston or San Francisco, and there unload. A ship flying a foreign flag can carry goods between an American and a foreign port, but our coastwise trade is reserved exclusively for American ships flying the United States flag. No party in this country for more than a century has declared itself in opposition to giving a monopoly to American ships engaged in the coastwise trade.

No party will ever do this, for to do so would be to invite political destruction. This preference given to American vessels in order to build up the merchant marine of this country may be termed a privilege, but it is patriotic in its object and its advocacy by any political party needs no explanation. A subsidy, on the other hand, is a bonus paid directly out of the Treasury to shipowners. This course was followed with no great success by France for many years, and is to-day practiced by some other countries, notably Japan. The payment of such a bonus out of the Treasury is a very different matter from the omission to make charges of American vessels for use of a waterway through American territory on their journey between two American ports.

To say, therefore, that Mr. Bryan and his subcommittee at the Baltimore convention placed in the platform the free-tolls plank without realizing what they were doing, or without knowing that it was not in violation of the plank in the same platform against ship subsidies, is to impugn the intelligence of the committee in a manner that is entirely unwarranted. I am sure that none of these gentlemen can read such charges without a feeling of pity for the man or newspaper so reckless as to make them.

We own and control the land through which the canal is built at Panama, so that in passing our coastwise vessels through it free of charge we are no more giving them a subsidy than we are doing in allowing them free use of the hundred or more canals we have built at different times through other sections and territory of the United States. One is no more a subsidy than the other; and neither can with show of reason be classed under the head of subsidies. If it is a subsidy to aid in any way the upbuilding of American commerce, why are the rivers and harbors of this country improved? Why are canals cut at various places by the United States Government in order to give water transportation between certain points? It is because a city having water transportation receives at the hands of the railroads what is known as "water rates."

New York has such low railroad rates from Buffalo, and it is because of the Erie Canal giving it competing water-transportation rates. Where there are no competing railroads or canals the freight rates are always as high as the traffic will bear. It is for this reason that the transcontinental railroads have opposed the building of the canal. It is for this reason that the Canadian Pacific, the Southern Pacific, the Northern Pacific, the Union Pacific, and the Tehuantepec Railroad across the lower neck of Mexico, owned, so I am informed, by British capitalists, are all opposed to exemption of tolls on American coastwise vessels. The building of the canal will break up the railroad monopoly on transportation between the Atlantic and Pacific seaboards, and should tolls on American coastwise vessels be exempted at the canal, transportation rates on the railroads must be that much lower in consequence. On the shipments of all goods of low value or of heavy weight from the Pacific coast to places east of Colorado the transportation rates will be lowered probably as much as 25 per cent to 33 per cent. Some of my friends have let the cat out of the bag when they state that freight rates are too low at present. The railroads not only think this, but are most positive that no competition should be permitted which would force a reduction in rates. If tolls at the canal are so regulated that freight rates are lowered, the saving to the American people will amount to millions of dollars each year, and to many times the amount that would be collected from tolls on coastwise vessels at Panama. Not only will the people benefit by lower freight rates, but advantages will also accrue to the United States Government in the way of increased competition. We are now committed to the building of a great railroad in Alaska 700 miles in length, and if tolls are remitted on the millions of tons of material to be carried from eastern ports through the canal to Alaska the saving to the Government in the lower prices at which material will be delivered will be very great. Of course if tolls are charged, as the United States Government is the buyer in this instance, it would be reimbursed by the amount of tolls collected, but we would have the absurd spectacle of seeing the Government take money out of the Treasury with one hand in order to pay prices made higher by tolls imposed by itself to please England, and with the other hand put back in the Treasury the amount of tolls collected. This would help to keep down competition for the railroads, however.

Taking up the treaty of which it is claimed that the act of August 24, 1912, exempting American coastwise vessels from payment of tolls at Panama is a violation, we find that almost the entire contention of the Members of the House seeking to bring about a repeal of that act seems to be based on the somewhat specious argument that the honor of the country is involved. They exclaim with great insistance that unless such a repeal is granted America will be discredited in the eyes of the world as a Nation who refuses to live up to her treaty obligations. They would convict the American Congress of a violation of our treaty agreements and confess to a national dishonor, when the Congress passed the exemption act of August 24, 1912, an act later indorsed by a majority of the people of this country. It is no slight charge that they bring, and on what may I ask is it based? It rests solely on the interpretation given by England to a clause in the Hay-Pauncefote Treaty, a clause which, to say the least, is capable of more than one construction. England chooses to construe it in a way favorable to her own interests, or perhaps it would be more correct to say, unfavorable to our interests, for the payment of tolls by American coastwise vessels will not so much advantage England as it will hurt the United States.

Under such circumstances I can not help but think that England's motives are more subject to impeachment than are our own. The position of America in upholding her rights of sovereignty over her own domestic affairs is not so open to question as that of England in endeavoring to force on us a selfish construction of the treaty, working little advantage to herself, but much detriment to the United States.

I yield to no one in my desire to uphold the honor of this country, but the mere charge on the part of England or anyone else that our honor is involved does not make that charge true. The language of treaties is often open to dispute. Indeed, the history of our negotiations with England for the past 100 years presents a spectacle of persistent and, for the most part, selfish aggression on her part. During the Welland Canal controversy, when the United States and Great Britain differed in their construction of treaty rights, the British ambassador used these words:

> The difference of opinion which exists as to treaty rights of the two countries is to be regretted, but it forms no ground for a charge that either country, in maintaining its own views, proceeds with a disregard of solemn obligations.

In the light of such words we have certainly a right to an honest difference of opinion in the present instance.

In construing into a treaty such a far-reaching abrogation of our rights as the regulation by international treaty of our coastwise trade, a purely domestic concern, the language should at least be too clear to admit of any doubt. It is precisely on this point that the difference of opinion arises. A glance at the wording of the treaty itself shows how little ground there is for the British interpretation. In article 3, the part in dispute reads as follows:

> The United States adopts, as the basis of the neutralization of such ship canal, the following rules, substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople, signed the 28th October, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Canal, that is to say:
> 1. The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic, or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

It is agreed that "the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations," upon the observance of certain rules, shall use the canal on terms of entire equality. The questions arising are: First, does the term "vessels of commerce and of war of all nations" include those of the United States? and, second, if so, does the term "vessels of commerce" include the United States coastwise trade as well as its foreign trade? This phrase must be construed in its entirety; one construction can not be given to the first half and another to the last half of the phrase.

Taking up the first question in dispute, the majority report of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, on page 4, states that England does not contend for the payment of tolls by American war vessels. They know that any such contention would be futile and would materially weaken their side of the case in the eyes of the American people. One object in building the canal was to avoid the necessity for the United States to maintain two fleets, one to guard her interests in the Pacific and the other in the Atlantic. By going through the Panama Canal the American fleet can make the trip from Norfolk to San Francisco in less than half the time required at present. In addition millions of dollars worth of coal are consumed on the Pacific coast, and a large part of this is used by the American Government. Should the Government hire transports to carry coal from Portsmouth, Va., to San Francisco, these vessels, under the proposed bill, would be charged tolls. That the United States, after building the canal in great part for strategic purposes and at a cost of over $400,000,000, should give away the military and naval advantages thus acquired is inconceivable.

It is also provided in the treaty that the canal shall be free and open to the vessels of all nations observing certain rules, which are adopted for the regulation of the canal by the United States as owner. Is the United States to be allowed to use its own property only by virtue of having complied with its own rules in regard to it? Upon violation of such rules by this country is it to be thereby precluded from further use of its own canal?

The conclusion is obvious that the term "all nations" must mean all nations whom the United States allows the use of the canal, upon compliance by them with the stipulated regulations. It is quite clear that, to make the phrase "vessels of commerce and of war of all nations" include those of the United States, it is necessary to break the phrase in two parts and apply the British interpretation only to the first part.

However, it is on the construction of the term "vessels of commerce," as stated in the second question above, that the present dispute hinges. It is claimed by England that, when we exempt our vessels engaged in coastwise trade from payment of tolls, we make it impossible for the vessels of all nations to pass through the canal "on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation." In what, may I ask, does our discrimination consist? England can not enter our coastwise trade. It is confined solely to American vessels owned and operated by American citizens, and sailing between American ports. Foreigners can neither enter their vessels in it nor compete with it. No foreign vessel can load at New York, pass through the Panama Canal, and unload at San Francisco. Hence its prosperity or its adversity can not affect any foreign merchant marine or any foreign nation, except, perhaps, to arouse a feeling of jealousy at its growing prosperity. American coastwise trade is purely a domestic concern, and what we do to increase it is entirely an internal affair. American foreign trade, which is the only trade with which England can compete, is charged tolls equal to those charged England, hence English vessels enjoy the canal on terms of entire equality with vessels of the United States.

As regards the language used to denote the foreign trade, we have a parallel case in the treaty of 1815. That treaty provides that—

> No higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed in any of the ports of the United States on British vessels than those payable in the same ports by vessels of the United States, nor in the ports of any of His Britannic Majesty's Territories in Europe on the vessels of the United States than shall be payable in the same ports on British vessels.

In the above treaty the phrases "British vessels" and "vessels of the United States" are as comprehensive in meaning as "vessels of commerce" in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, yet the construction placed upon the treaty of 1815 for a hundred years and ratified in the case of Olsen v. Smith (195 U. S., 332) by the Supreme Court, is that only vessels engaged in the foreign trade are meant. Both England and America have discriminated in favor of their coastwise traffic, allowing smaller charges than are made on the vessels of the other country entering their ports. It is agreed that the treaty of 1815 does not regulate the domestic trade of either England or America. Yet it is contended that the Hay-Pauncefote treaty of 1901, an international treaty dealing solely with international questions and employing precisely similar language, has force to regulate not only our foreign but our domestic trade as well.

The majority report of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, on page 6, contains the following:

> On the other hand the treaty language touching tolls at the Panama Canal limits our consideration to treatment at the canal, an international waterway, built by authority of three treaties with foreign nations through a foreign country.

Such statements may have been true of conditions at the time the treaty was entered into in 1901, but they have assuredly changed since. The canal may indeed be termed "an international waterway," but not "built by authority of three treaties with foreign nations through a foreign country."

If such construction could ever have been placed on the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, the state of things on which the treaty was based has so changed since its execution that, as regards such changed conditions, the treaty, according to the rule of treaty construction known as rebus sic stantibus, can no longer be said to apply. At the time the treaty was made there was no expectation that the United States would acquire possession of the strip of territory through which the canal was to be built. Such territory may have been "foreign" in 1901, but after our treaty with Panama in 1903 the Canal Zone became as much a part of American territory as the State of New York or the Hawaiian Islands. Great Britain recognizes the sovereignty of the United States in the Canal Zone, and thereby impliedly concedes that some of the provisions of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty are nullified. In his note of protest Sir Edward Grey says, "Now that the United States has become the practical sovereign of the canal, His Majesty's Government do not question its title to exercise belligerent rights for its protection." Such a statement is a complete admission that the United States has acquired sovereignty of the Canal Zone, and that as regards control over the territory through which the canal runs conditions have changed since the treaty was made. Certainly the United States is now owner of the Canal Zone, and as such may properly remit tolls on its coastwise vessels on their passage through its own territory.

As regards the United States and Panama, in the treaty entered into between these countries in 1903, it was agreed that the vessels of the Republic of Panama should have free transportation over the canal. This concession to Panama was made in order to acquire possession of the territory through which the canal was built and, though a discrimination in favor of Panama, was entirely consistent with the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. That treaty provided that all nations observing certain rules should have the right to use the canal on terms of perfect equality. Panama, however, was required not only to observe these rules, but to give a special consideration besides, namely, to surrender the Canal Zone to the United States. By virtue of this special consideration, therefore, she was entitled to the discrimination allowed her vessels. The majority report of the committee says, on page 4:

> Panama, however, paid her tolls for all time in her contribution to the enterprise. There is no objection registered to the Panama deal nor the treatment of the war vessels of the United States Government.

In other words, since Panama gave a special consideration, even under the wording of the "all-nations" clause of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, she is entitled to a special exemption. So, also, admits the majority report, are the United States war vessels. But if Panama is exempted from the "all-nations" clause because of her contribution to the enterprise, is not the United States also entitled on the same ground to the exemption she claims? Surely the furnishing of $400,000,000, as well as the men and labor to build the canal and the continued responsibility for its upkeep, is sufficient contribution on the part of the United States to entitle her also to exemption from the "all-nations" clause of the treaty. Any other argument would produce the startling result of giving to Panama a position more favorable than our own.

One object in building the canal was to lower the rates of transportation between the Atlantic and Pacific coasts by allowing the coastwise traffic through the canal to develop a competition in rates with the railroads wholesome for both parties and of benefit particularly to the people of this country. If we charge a toll on our coastwise vessels much of this benefit will be lost, and the object of the transcontinental railroads in seeking to nullify the advantages accruing from the canal will be accomplished. As regards any abuses in the use of the canal by the shipping trust, this will be reached and corrected by the Sherman anti-trust law. However, leaving out of account all question of whether from an economic point of view exemption of tolls will prove of benefit or not, I am unalterably opposed to committing this country to the policy of allowing any outside interference in the conduct of our domestic affairs, and such the regulation of our coastwise traffic assuredly is. The Hay-Pauncefote treaty is an international treaty, dealing solely with international questions, and can not be construed—especially in the light of later events, to wit, the purchase by the United States of the Panama Canal Zone—to include coastwise traffic passing through our own territory.

Not only on the merits of the question am I opposed to a repeal of the act of Congress of August 24, 1912, but, as stated above, I consider that the Democratic Party is absolutely committed to upholding this policy. I might add that when the canal bill was before the House in May, 1912, and before the Baltimore convention had incorporated the free-tolls plank in its platform on economic grounds. I voted against the free-tolls provision. My recollection is that this provision was not in the bill as reported by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to the House, and that when the bill was before the House for consideration and amendment under the five-minute rule Mr. DOREMUS offered the free-tolls amendment from the floor.

I had not studied the question, my time being taken up in discharging my duties as a member of the Post Office and Printing Committees. Shortly after this, during the following July, the Baltimore convention adopted the free-toll provision in its platform. I accepted the platform declaration and, after studying the question for myself, have come to the conclusion that the action of the convention was right. I have always stood on the platform and voted for the nominees of the Democratic Party in every election since I arrived at the age of 21. On a few occasions in State and county affairs the task was a disagreeable one, but I have never permitted my personal views, likes, and dislikes to swerve me from allegiance to my party, its platform, and its nominees. I surrender my personal views when the party acts on these propositions. If I permit myself to set aside one plank of the platform, why not two or all of the platform and the party's nominees whenever my inclination prompts me to do so? The platform has not changed since its adoption in July, 1912, and not even at the request of the President can I reconcile my conscience to voting in opposition to the platform and my preelection promises. Many of the newspapers, some of them honest and a great many impelled not by fate, as Virgil tells us Æneas was, but by ignorance; others, with utter abandon and disregard of facts, have loudly proclaimed that those of us who do not follow the lead of our President in this matter are fighting him. I shall use no stronger expression than to say that this is nonsense.

We have in the White House a Democratic President, the most scholarly and cultured man who has occupied the President's chair since Jefferson. Without any sort of reservation, I state that in my opinion and in the opinion of those who know him he is honest and sincere, and while I do not agree with him in his present position, I recognize that he is actuated by the highest motives. I regret more than I can express that this bill is before the House at this time, necessitating differences of opinion in the Democratic ranks, but the bill is here and must be disposed of. The President has performed his duty as he views it. I, as a Member of the United States Congress, have my duty to perform, and while it is with great regret that it will not be in support of the President's position and in accord with the views of many of my friends, I must vote according to the dictates of my own conscience. While on account of weaknesses such as the flesh is heir to, I, in the opinion of some, may not have always been able to live up to the standard, yet my admiration is unbounded for the man described in the last clause of the fourth verse of the fifteenth Psalm. The platform on which I was elected to Congress pledges me to vote in accordance with the principles laid down by the Democratic convention at Baltimore, and I consider that only by so doing can I be true to the people who sent me here to carry out their wishes expressed in the platform of the Democratic Party.

[Mr. PATTON of Pennsylvania addressed the House. See Appendix.]

[Mr. RAKER addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. TAGGART. Mr. Speaker, an international dispute has been submitted to the Congress. This is unfortunate in many respects. It arises from the fact that the execution of a treaty, instead of being committed to the discretion of the executive branch of the Government, has been prescribed by act of Congress, leaving no discretion to the Executive, and defining the duties of the officers of the Government with respect to the provisions of the treaty.

I can approach this subject without prejudice or passion. This is not the place to give expression to either. I am not in accord with those who would discuss such a question as this from a historical point of view, or attempt to stir up the feelings of the people by referring to ancient wrongs. The question is too important to be discussed in that humor. We are now sitting as a sort of international tribunal to pass upon the provisions of a treaty between the United States and Great Britain. We are neither hailed by a battleship nor challenged by a sentry. This matter has been placed before us, acting as a court of conscience, to pass upon our own acts at the request of the President of the United States. As I said, I regard it as a question of tremendous importance. It is a question that rises mountain high above any officer of this Government—above the legislative, the executive, and the judicial departments of the Government; above party platforms, or the words or declarations of candidates. The question before us involves the dignity and sovereignty of the United States of America.

This treaty was signed and ratified in the latter part of 1901 and proclaimed on Washington's Birthday, in 1902. The high contracting parties to it had in mind the conditions that existed at the time the treaty was written—conditions that were wholly different from those that exist to-day. In the 12 years that have passed there has been much history and great changes have taken place. Every provision of the treaty that by any reasonable construction can apply to-day should be observed to the letter. Every provision that is obsolete and inapplicable to the conditions that now exist should be disregarded. Every provision that is absurd and can not by any sensible construction be put in operation at this time must be held to be immaterial. Every practice and policy that does no injury to either of the contracting parties to the treaty or to any nation of the world, and every right that is exercised and that works neither prejudice nor injury to any other nation are among the sovereign privileges of the United States under this treaty.

The treaty is so brief that I will insert it here in full; and let me say that in as much as I shall vote against the pending bill I shall state the facts, and, as far as practicable, insert and publish the documents connected with this controversy, and upon this I ask the judgment of my fellow citizens on the course that I have taken:

ARTICLE 1. The high contracting parties agree that the present treaty shall supersede the aforementioned convention of the 19th April, 1850.

ART. 2. It is agreed that the canal may be constructed under the auspices of the Government of the United States, either directly at its own cost or by gift or loan of money to individuals or corporations or through subscription to or purchase of stock or shares, and that, subject to the provisions of the present treaty, the said Government shall have and enjoy all the rights incident to such construction, as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal.

ART. 3. The United States adopts, as the basis of the neutralization of such ship canal, the following rules, substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople, signed the 28th October, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Canal; that is to say:

1. The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

2. The canal shall never be blockaded, nor shall any right of war be exercised nor any act of hostility be committed within it. The United States, however, shall be at liberty to maintain such military police along the canal as may be necessary to protect it against lawlessness and disorder.

3. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not revictual nor take any stores in the canal except so far as may be strictly necessary; and the transit of such vessels through the canal shall be effected with the least possible delay, in accordance with the regulations in force, and with only such intermission as may result from the necessities of the service. Prizes shall be in all respects subject to the same rules as vessels of war of the belligerents.

4. No belligerent shall embark or disembark troops, munitions of war, or warlike materials in the canal, except in case of accidental hindrance of the transit, and in such case the transit shall be resumed with all possible dispatch.

5. The provisions of this article shall apply to waters adjacent to the canal within 3 marine miles of either end. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not remain in such waters longer than 24 hours at any one time, except in case of distress, and in such case shall depart as soon as possible; but a vessel of war of one belligerent shall not depart within 24 hours from the departure of a vessel of war of the other belligerent.

6. The plant, establishment, buildings, and all works necessary to the construction, maintenance, and operation of the canal shall be deemed to be part thereof, for the purposes of this treaty, and in time of war, as in time of peace, shall enjoy complete immunity from attack or injury by belligerents and from acts calculated to impair their usefulness as part of the canal.

ART. 4. It is agreed that no change of territorial sovereignty or of the international relations of the country or countries traversed by the before-mentioned canal shall affect the general principle of neutralization or the obligations of the high contracting parties under the present treaty.

ART. 5. The present treaty shall be ratified by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof, and by His Britannic Majesty, and the ratifications shall be exchanged at Washington or at London at the earliest possible time within six months from the date hereof.

It is very clear from a reading of the treaty that it was contemplated by the contracting parties at that time that the Canal Zone might become a part of the territory of the United States. If this treaty is to be observed literally, it means that we have surrendered the right to protect the canal. Should a foreign enemy see fit to make an attack upon the canal we would have no right, under the second section, to blockade it or prevent the enemy from landing upon it. We would have no right to commit an act of war against an invading force on the soil of the United States. Under this treaty, we have surrendered the right to maneuver our forces upon our own soil. Under the second section of article 3 we are at liberty to maintain such military police along the canal as may be necessary to protect it against lawlessness and disorder, but no other force. But some one says, "In case of war, the treaty would cease to operate; we would be at liberty to defend our own soil." This is simply admitting that the right of preparing for its defense does not exist until actual hostilities have begun, or until war has been declared, if this treaty is literally interpreted. If two other nations were at war, the employees of the United States at the canal would have to render aid to both belligerents. The fighting nations would have the right, under this treaty, to pass their ships freely through the waters of the United States and under its exclusive jurisdiction.

The fourth article of the treaty provides against the eventualities that may occur by a change of territorial sovereignty of the country or countries traversed by the canal. What did the contracting parties have in mind when that was written? Did either of them contemplate that the United States would acquire complete sovereignty over the Canal Zone? It is plainly evident that they did. And if they contemplated that the United States should acquire the territory and extend its sovereignty over it, it is another way of stating that the whole of article 3 is absurd. And this has come to pass. Great Britain has now exactly the same claim upon these Capitol Grounds as it has upon the Canal Zone. A treaty restricting the use of these grounds against the movements of troops or any other public purpose would be quite as logical and reasonable as a treaty that would restrain the use of our military forces upon any part of the soil of the United States.

This treaty was made with Great Britain, and with Great Britain alone. I therefore take it for granted that we are called to account by the British Government for departing from the provisions of the treaty. We have an interpretation and they have an interpretation. If we grant that they are honest in their interpretation, I hope that they admit that we are honest in our interpretation; and in as much as the American people have expended $400,000,000 in the construction of this canal and are now charged with the duty of protecting, operating, and maintaining it, I take this occasion to assert that our interpretation of the treaty is entitled to the respect of the world.

This canal was built as a part of the national defense and as a contribution to the commerce of the world. It never will be a success as an investment. It could not have been built as a private enterprise. The undertaking was so tremendous, the cost so problematical, and the returns so uncertain that no sensible person would have invested in the stock of a private concern that would undertake such a project as the building of the Panama Canal. We built it to facilitate and promote commerce among the States and as a part of the national defense, and we have placed it at the disposal of the world at a nominal cost. The ships of every nation of the earth that approach it will be treated with absolute equality. But under the English interpretation we have violated the treaty, because we have provided by law that vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States and that are not owned by railroad companies shall be permitted to pass through the canal free of toll. They declare that this violates the first section of article 3 of the treaty, and they have contrived to work upon the fine sense of honor of a high-minded President until he has felt it his duty to appear before both Houses of Congress and request that we acknowledge, by an act of Congress, that the English interpretation is right and our interpretation wrong.

Now let us examine this section with a view to answering the question as to whether or not we have committed any infraction of the rights of any nation of the world by allowing free tolls to American vessels engaged in our coastwise trade. Although writers on international law say "there is no place for the refinements of courts in the rough jurisprudence of nations," let us nevertheless apply even the refinements of courts to this section—the principles of the common law which represent the combined wisdom of the judges of England as well as America. Under the common law no one was ever held to offend in an immaterial matter or to respond in damages for an act that did no injury. It is a maxim of the common law that you may make such use of your property as you choose, provided that in the use of your own you do no injury to another. Immaterial testimony has always been ruled out in the trial of a cause. If two parties make a contract and one does an act under the contract that does no material injury to the other, what cause of complaint has the other in any court of justice in the world? I submit that there could be no violation of the contract unless one of the parties to it did some act that caused the other party to lose some benefit that he otherwise might have derived from it. Under a statute enacted in 1817, and still in force, the coastwise commerce of the United States must be carried in vessels owned entirely by American citizens. The main part of this statute is as follows:

No merchandise shall be transported, under penalty of forfeiture thereof, from one port of the United States to another port of the United States in a vessel belonging wholly or in part to a subject of any foreign power; but this section shall not be construed to prohibit the sailing of any foreign vessel from one to another port of the United States, provided no merchandise, other than that imported in such vessel from some foreign port, and which shall not have been unladen, shall be carried from one port or place to another in the United States. (Rev. Stat., 2 ed., p. 839, sec. 4347.)

Take these premises and candidly admit your own conclusion. All the other nations of the earth are forbidden to carry merchandise from one of our ports to another, and therefore can not compete with American ships in that business. Whatever may be charged or omitted to be charged for the use of the canal by American vessels engaged in coastwise trade adds nothing to and takes nothing from either the amount of business transacted or the amount of tolls charged the vessels of any other nation that pass through the canal. Now, is there discrimination against any other nation or its citizens or subjects with respect to the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise? If you conclude that there is such discrimination, what relief from that discrimination will any nation experience, no matter what is charged for the use of the canal by American vessels engaged in coastwise trade? If there is discrimination against any other people, you will have to admit that they will be perfectly satisfied if we tax our own citizens for the use of the canal, and at the same time you must admit that if we did charge toll for coastwise trade it would not add a penny to the income of the owner of any other vessel in the world using the canal and would not add to any privilege enjoyed under this treaty by the citizens and subjects of any foreign nation.

But your answer, "I have read the article just published in the North American Review by Prof. Emory R. Johnson."

Prof. Johnson has become deeply wise in canal wisdom. I would not wish rudely to disturb the circles of this learned Archimedes, who sits so calmly writing articles amid the tumult of this diplomatic siege. The professor starts out with the assumption that the canal is in fact an investment, and that it is our purpose to derive a substantial income from it that will not only pay the interest on the inconceivable sum that was spent, but create a sinking fund that will finally repay the principal. He comes to the rescue of the nations by expressing apprehension that—

* * * if the toll-bearing tonnage is reduced by the exemption of the large volume of shipping owned by the individuals and corporations engaged in the coastwise trade, the rate of charges payable by the owners of American ships in the foreign trade and by the citizens owning vessels under foreign flags must be higher than the rate would be if all vessels using the canal were required to pay tolls.

Prof. Johnson seems to overlook the fact that the charges are now fixed by statute and regulation at $1.20 a ton. His reasoning leads us to this conclusion: That it is his wish that if this $1.20 a ton seems too high a toll for other nations to bear, we should levy toll upon our coastwise ships for the purpose of relieving the other nations of the world from a part of their burden. It seems that the British Government has become the champion of the United States Treasury, and our canal expert is the self-appointed guardian of the commercial welfare of the world.

Prof. Johnson points out that competition might take place between coastwise vessels and vessels doing business between our ports and foreign nations under the provisions of this treaty. He says:

If an American vessel presents itself at the canal with a clearance from New York to San Francisco and has aboard it only goods shipped from New York to other American ports, the vessel would presumably pass through the canal toll free. If the same vessel, together with its cargo, was later dispatched from San Francisco to the Orient, no penalty would be incurred. The Panama Canal act exempting coastwise shipping from the payment of tolls would not have been violated, but it would have been evaded. If the goods taken by the coastwise vessel from New York to San Francisco were unloaded and taken thence to the Orient by another vessel, the Panama Canal act would be neither violated nor evaded, and yet trade between New York and the Orient would have been carried by vessels exempted from the payment of tolls.

Let us examine this objection. The first paragraph of the proclamation of the President prescribing the tolls is as follows:

On merchant vessels carrying passengers or cargo, $1.20 per net vessel ton—each 100 cubic feet—of actual earning capacity.

This 100 cubic feet, with some deductions, represents a ton—not a ton in actual weight, but much more than a ton, for it is well known that 32 cubic feet of water make a ton in weight. If the earning capacity of the ship is filled, an actual ton of merchandise may be carried through the canal for less than 40 cents. Evasions of the law are not favored and can be prohibited by regulation.

If a shipment should take place through the canal from one port to another and then, by collusion, the merchandise was forwarded to some foreign country without being unloaded, it would be such a palpable violation of the law that the amount of the tolls could be recovered and would be recovered by the United States from the offending party. On the other hand, if goods are shipped in good faith and unloaded in any port of the United States they can again be shipped to any foreign port without violating the law, as the professor admits. But is it sensible to assume that this would ever occur? Any person accustomed to transact business or observing the transaction of business on a large scale, would know that it would not pay to send a shipload of goods, perhaps far out of the ship's course, unload it, store it, and again load it upon another ship, or upon the same ship, to escape the payment of even $1.20 a ton, not to mention 40 cents or 50 cents a ton.

Such arguments are all beside the point. The question is not whether it is right or wrong to exempt American vessels engaged in the coastwise trade, but whether the United States actually has the right to exempt such vessels. It may be right and just to charge every user of the canal the same price; but that is not the question we are to decide. The question that we are wrestling with is this: Was the United States acting within its rights when it exercised full power over the question of charging or refusing to charge tolls in the case of American coastwise vessels?

The contention of Great Britain is not that we did not have the right to levy a reasonable toll or refuse to levy toll, or allow any and every ship to pass through the canal free. The position of Great Britain on this question is well stated in an address by Mr. Charles P. Anderson, formerly counsellor for the Department of State, which he read before the American Society of International Law on April 25, 1913. Mr. Anderson says:

There has apparently been considerable confusion in the widespread discussion about canal tolls which has been going on for the past eight months in this country as to the exact contentions of both Governments and the real question at issue between them. A large part of this discussion has been directed to the question of whether the United States is not at liberty under the treaty to do what it pleases in regard to the payment of tolls by its own vessels in its own canal. As a matter of fact, this contention is not made by Great Britain, and there is nothing in the treaty which would justify any such contention. The United States is clearly entitled to exempt its own vessels, either of war or of commerce, whether engaged in the coastwise or foreign trade, from the payment of any tolls, and likewise it is entitled to refund tolls exacted from those vessels. The question at issue is not whether that can be done, but whether the United States, having exempted its own vessels from the payment of tolls, is at liberty under the treaty to exact tolls from British vessels so long as Great Britain observes the rules adopted by the United States in the treaty.

The whole controversy comes, finally, to the simple issue: Under this treaty has the Government of Great Britain a right to claim equal rights with the United States in the use of the canal? In other words, has a stranger the same rights in any land as the sovereign owner of the soil? Can the United States bargain away its sovereignty? If it can extend equal rights to Great Britain or to any other country in the Panama Canal Zone, what is to prevent it from extending the same equal rights to Great Britain or to any other country upon every foot of the soil of the United States? If we can surrender a part of our sovereignty, can we not surrender all of our sovereignty? Has anyone representing the American people the right to make a bargain surrendering the sovereignty of this Government over any part of the United States?

On this question I take the liberty of saying that I stand with the United States of America against all the world. We can not surrender our sovereignty. "The hand of Douglas is his own." That canal is ours; it is upon our soil; our flag is over it. No matter what bargain had been made for the use of it, the moment we obtained the ownership of it and extended the law and the Constitution over the territory we had occupied, that moment all treaties that may have been made with respect to it are modified, and as far as any of them are inconsistent with that sovereignty, to that extent they have ceased to operate.

I am not offering these arguments without reflection or without study. Hon. Richard Olney was Attorney General and later Secretary of State in the second administration of Grover Cleveland. No one ever questioned either the learning, patriotism, or statesmanship of Mr. Olney. He has the confidence and respect of this administration. He declined the appointment, tendered him by President Wilson, of ambassador to Great Britain. In 1913, before this controversy was started by the American people, in the serenity of his retirement and in the quiet of his home, he prepared a learned discourse on the subject of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, which he read before the American Society of International Law in Washington, D. C., on April 25, 1913. I want to say concerning this paper that for varied and profound learning, for stately precision, and for calm and judicial reasoning it should take its place among the American classics. I regret that the length of the paper is such that I can not incorporate it all as a part of my remarks. Fortunately, however, Mr. Olney summarizes his conclusions, which are as follows:

To sum up the conclusions resulting from the foregoing considerations it is submitted that—

1. The United States as builder and owner of an artificial waterway within its own territory is entitled to dictate the conditions of its use unless and only so far as it has contracted the right of way.

2. It has made no such contract, except with Great Britain and by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty and by the clauses of that treaty which stipulate for the use of the canal by "all nations" on equal terms and for reasonable and equitable tolls.

3. As the term "all nations" comprehends not only States, but their nationals, the crucial question is: Are the words "all nations" inclusive or exclusive of the United States and its nationals?

4. The principle is well settled that a State conveys away its rights of sovereignty or property only by terms which are clear and express and are not susceptible of any other reasonable construction. If the terms are vague and of doubtful import, the presumption is against the State's intention to part with or abridge its jurisdictional or property rights.

5. Hence, as the term "all nations" as used in the treaty may be taken to mean either all without exception or all except the United States, the latter meaning is to be accepted as the true one, because the least restrictive of the normal rights and powers of the United States.

6. But it is unnecessary to rely upon presumption. The treaty assumes the United States to be the owner of a canal to be built by it on its own territory, and must be taken to have had as its natural and legitimate aim the fixing of the terms upon which other nations might use it. Except as necessarily abridged by such terms, nothing in the treaty indicates any purpose to further abridge the rights of the United States as canal builder and owner.

7. In short, the treaty is an instrument by which the proprietor of a canal fixes and states the terms of use to its customers.

There is an utter absence of evidence that the United States regarded itself as one of its customers.

8. The neutralization proposed by the Clayton-Bulwer treaty resembles that proposed by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty only in the idea that the operating charges and rules for use of the canal shall be the same for all nations. It differs, of course, in the vital feature of conditioning such equality of terms upon protection being afforded to the canal.

9. When five out of six of the treaty rules for the use of the canal do not apply to the United States it is a reasonable conclusion that the sixth also was not meant so to apply.

10. The different phases of American public and official sentiment respecting the canal are noteworthy and not to be overlooked in construing the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

While the United States was expecting to be merely one of the users of the canal, it strenuously insisted upon equality of rules and charges for the use of the canal and did not concern itself about the rights of the canal owner.

When the rôle of builder and owner of the canal was forced upon it, it as strenuously insisted upon complete ownership and complete control, and complete elimination of all foreign participation or control.

Its purposes and views are completely defeated if the Hay-Pauncefote treaty is to be construed according to the British contention, and the United States has lost the ordinary and normal right of the canal owner to be exempt from the tolls and charges it makes to customers.

On the grounds and in view of the considerations above stated, the United States may contend—and it is believed can rightfully contend—that the Hay-Pauncefote treaty of November, 1901, does not, as justly interpreted, prevent the United States from exempting its coastwise shipping from the payment of tolls for the use of the Panama Canal.

Who will deny the words of Richard Olney, that the presumption is against the State's intention to part with or abridge its jurisdictional or property rights? You might as well presume that one intended to convey his home by vague and uncertain words as to imagine that a sovereign State intended to relinquish its jurisdiction over its own soil by employing ambiguous and uncertain words or words of doubtful meaning.

Who has accused the United States of having acted a dishonorable part in this transaction? The chief beneficiary of our labors, who did not put a single dollar into the enterprise. Who has been dishonorable? Who has not only "looked a gift horse in the mouth," but complained that the owner who gave the horse was guilty of a dishonorable act. In all probability the canal will not pay running expenses. If not, we will have to stand the losses. Who will be discriminated against in the event that it is operated at a loss?

The American Nation has been the greatest blessing that Providence has vouchsafed to the nations of Europe. It has furnished a home for the poor and the oppressed of all lands. There is not a toiler in Europe who is not dreaming of comfort beneath the Stars and Stripes. On the chart of his imagination the United States is marked as a region of hope. We have received into our open arms the surplus population of all Europe—fugitives from the gaunt hunger of immemorial poverty. We have with us a million of people, natives of the island of Great Britain alone. We have 4,000,000 natives of the British Empire—more subjects of Great Britain than live in Australia. We have hordes from every land crowding and crushing their way toward the rich man's table.

This immigration of a million and a half a year has presented to the American people a pitiful and tender problem. Not in wrath nor in prejudice, not without sympathy the American House of Representatives voted to restrict this immigration in the interests of American labor. If the nations of Europe would write the truth about the first great American achievement of the twentieth century would they not have to say that we furnished a highway for their ships and a home for their children? Is it possible that their representatives have come to the gates of our Capital accusing us of dishonor and of shame?

Those Democrats who regard free tolls for independent American ships as ship subsidies are treading on dangerous ground. They advance the theory that the whole expense of delivering merchandise in a port of the United States is borne by the carrier. They are certain that the carrier will make no effort to seek reimbursement at the hands of the consignee or the consumer. Now, there has been a question in this country for 60 years commonly called the protective tariff. This tariff represents a part of expense of delivering foreign goods into the hands of the American consumer. And we all went forth in the full panoply of war as the champions of that consumer and we revised the tariff downward for his particular relief. I submit that if relieving the American shipowner from expense in delivering goods to the American consumer is a subsidy to the owner of the ship, that relieving an importer from the payment of a high tariff as a part of the expense of delivering foreign goods to the American consumer is a subsidy to the importer.

I invite my friends to examine and compare these propositions, and I respectfully ask their judgment. I voted for the free use of the canal to American ships in the interest of the producer as well as the consumer. I saw the producer of the finest fruits and vegetables on the Pacific coast feeding them to hogs for want of a market, and I saw children eating garbage out of trash cans in the streets of the city of New York. When I voted free canal I thought I was doing something to help the farmer on the Pacific coast and the starving child in the metropolis, and every farmer and every consumer between the two coasts. If the consumer does not pay all the expenses of furnishing what he consumes, more words have been wasted, more theories exploded, more professors of political economy have been stultified, and more party platforms have been given the lie by this new discovery than by any other thought that has found expression in the twentieth century. Who has paid the freight in this country? If you have any theory of your own about this I will pin you down to an undisputed fact. Who is it that they have heretofore agreed was obliged to pay the freight? In whose interest has the great battle for freight rates, express rates, and the establishment of the parcel post, been fought in this country? Candidly, have you ever heard a statesman shouting in behalf of anyone except the consumer and the producer? When I voted for free ships I was responding to every argument that I had ever heard on the platform or in the House of Representatives, and to every argument that I had ever read on this subject.

If a California producer ships a ton of oranges through the canal, and 50 cents is charged for toll, there are three people interested in that 50 cents—the consignor, the carrier, and the consignee. Each one of these is equally interested in escaping that item of cost and shifting it upon some one else. Who has the last chance of reimbursing himself for that 50 cents or any part of it? You know who has the last chance and who will make use of it. The one who last handles the oranges and sells them to the consumer. Perish the thought that I should do violence to the memory of all the political economists who have ever instructed the world, by advancing any other theory. We have only two means of carrying merchandise in this country. Goods are carried either by rail or by water. The only competitors that these coastwise ships have or can have are the transcontinental railroads. There is only one complete transcontinental railroad under a single management, and that is the Canadian Pacific. Free tolls either will cheapen transportation or will not cheapen transportation. But will not tolls increase the cost of transportation for somebody? If we make transportation more costly by water, we simply furnish an opportunity to make transportation more costly by land. And who will take advantage of this opportunity? We are simply driven to a conclusion. We can not escape it. What is granted to water transportation is taken away from land transportation, and what is taken away from water transportation is given to railroad transportation. We can not rob Peter without paying Paul. We are between what the earthquake left of Charybdis and Scylla.

The most abused document in the world is a party platform. It is selected by the adverse parties as an object of attack. It is a challenge to intellectual combat on the field of political honor in the presence of a hundred millions of people. A platform is also a contract between a candidate for office and the people who elect him. I do not know of any authority authorized to release a Representative of the United States from the obligations of the platform upon which he is elected. I have never known or even heard of an officer who was criticized for carrying out his party platform, but I have seen a House of Representatives change its personnel for failing to make good its platform promises. I respectfully submit that if some gentlemen who are here had talked in October, 1912, as they are preparing to vote in March, 1914, on this platform promise, we would not have the honor of their presence here to-day. Fortunately, this is one of the minor planks of the Democratic platform. It is so short I insert it:

> We favor the exemption from toll of American ships engaged in coastwise trade passing through the canal.

The American people have not demanded that we ignore this plank of a platform that was made after the House of Representatives, by a nonpartisan vote, passed the free-toll amendment, and while this amendment was pending in the Senate. The House passed it May 13, 1912. The Senate passed it August 8, 1912, six weeks after the platform was adopted, and the vote in the Senate was more than three to one for exemption.

Yet in this same paragraph in which this plank is found is a declaration against direct subsidies from the Public Treasury. If free tolls are a subsidy, I beg leave to submit that subsection 7 of Schedule J of the tariff bill that we passed is also a subsidy. It provides:

> That a discount of 5 per cent on all duties imposed by this act shall be allowed on such goods, wares, and merchandise as shall be imported in vessels admitted to registration under the laws of the United States.

The platform is against direct subsidies; it is not against indirect subsidies. If it is said that the platform forbids any kind of subsidy, it must be admitted that we violated the platform in the tariff bill, and it must be further admitted that we have had no complaint on that account up to date. One of the first acts of the First Congress, which was signed by Washington on the 4th of July, 1789, the first year of his Presidency, was a tariff bill containing a provision almost like the one that I have just quoted. This is the traditional policy of the United States and is what we mean by our platform when we say:

> We believe in fostering by constitutional regulation of commerce the growth of a merchant marine.

Thoughtful people are beginning to realize that this canal may become the most ponderous white elephant that we have ever had on our hands. It is an isolated fragment of our seacoast; it is the most difficult to defend of our possessions; it has excited the jealousy of the world; it will be almost a constant source of international dispute. I can not bring myself to believe that either England or any other nation has any grievance on account of the regulations that we have prescribed. I do believe that any complaint that has been made is a pretense and a sham.

The President has an international program in which he is deeply interested. This program is for the benefit of the world, and is not a piece of self-seeking diplomacy on the part of the United States. We are as generous with our sentiments of good will as we have been with our resources in building the canal. The program of the President has been met by punctilious objections on the part of England and other nations. Apparently they do not wish that the United States should take the lead in carrying forward a movement for international peace. Disarmament throughout the world would be a blow to a nation of speculators and manufacturers. With the exception of the American Revolution and Civil Wars, all other wars that have taken place in the world have been an advantage to the British nation. If the half million Germans and the half million Frenchmen who are under arms, went home and went to work at manufacturing, they would probably bankrupt every factory in England. I say this because I believe it. The circumstances all tend to prove it. What nation could do less than respect the tremendous sacrifice and labor spent in constructing this canal? How is it possible that our course, taken as a whole, is considered an offense? We have a President in whose personality and high attainments all that is learned and dignified, all that is lofty and pure, all that is altruistic, unselfish, and truly progressive in the nature of the American people, is given the highest expression. To borrow and modify the words of the greatest orator of ancient or modern times, he has "that chastity of honor which feels a stain like a wound, which has ennobled whatever it has touched, and before which vice itself loses half its evil by losing all its grossness." We know that as faithfully as the mariner's compass keeps its course, whether in the noonday calm of a summer sea or in the tempestuous darkness of an ocean night, so surely can we depend upon the conscience of Woodrow Wilson to move along the path of duty. He laid this matter before us because he believed it was his duty. He will grant to each of us the privilege and the sacred right of passing upon it in accordance with our individual sense of duty. Not the President, but a European nation has accused this House of committing an act of national dishonor by passing this exemption bill. On this charge and specification I vote "not guilty."

Separate and apart from all other questions involved in this matter, the most serious objection of all is that the repeal bill, now before us, may be held to be unconstitutional. It contains this provision:

> The tolls shall not exceed $1.25 per net registered ton, nor be less than 75 cents per net registered ton.

This prescribes a fixed charge to be levied on all commerce passing through the canal. Section 9 of article 1 of the Constitution is as follows:

> No tax or duty shall be laid on articles exported from any State.

Is this toll a tax? If so, it is not within the power of Congress to levy and collect it. It was the plain purpose of the Constitution to make outgoing foreign commerce absolutely free. The Supreme Court has decided several times that exports from a State mean exports to a foreign country. So Congress has power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises on interstate commerce, but not on articles exported from any State. The word "tax" includes about every kind of charge that can be collected for the benefit of the United States Treasury, except a fine or a penalty. This question is fully discussed in a case decided by the Supreme Court April 15, 1901. It is found in the One hundred and eighty-first United States Report and entitled "Fairbank v. United States." In 1898 Congress provided for a stamp tax on various kinds of printed paper used in the transaction of business, including a charge of 10 cents for—bills of lading * * * for any goods, merchandise, or effects to be exported from a port or place in the United States to any foreign port or place.

Mr. Fairbank, who lived in Minnesota, and who was a railway agent, issued an export bill of lading for wheat to England without affixing thereto a revenue stamp. He was tried under the penal provisions of the act for this failure and fined $25. He took the case to the Supreme Court of the United States. Justice Brewer delivered the opinion of the court. This charge on outgoing commerce was held to be unconstitutional and the part of the act providing for it was held to be null and void. The concluding paragraph of the opinion is as follows:

Without enlarging further on these matters, we are of opinion that a stamp tax on a foreign bill of lading is in substance and effect equivalent to a tax on the articles included in that bill of lading, and therefore a tax or duty on exports and in conflict with the constitutional prohibition.

Four of the justices of the Supreme Court dissented from this opinion, but it has never been reversed. They set forth the history of similar taxes, which were considered "a small stamp duty imposed * * * upon the vellum, parchment, or paper upon which was written or printed a bill of lading," and rested their opinion on old interpretations of such acts which were based on acquiescence.

The substance of the opinion is that the Constitution must be interpreted in spirit as well as in letter. If we should levy a stamp tax of 10 cents on a bill of lading for a shipload of merchandise to leave San Francisco for Europe by way of the canal, we could not collect the 10 cents for the use of the Treasury of the United States. But under this bill several thousand dollars might be collected on the same cargo for the use of the Treasury of the United States if the act is held constitutional. The toll might be collected in San Francisco as well as at the canal.

If we have a right to collect it we might require that it should be collected before the ship leaves port. The objection that is set forth in the dissenting opinion of the Supreme Court in the Fairbank case, based on acquiescence, would not apply. The law and the practice, since the foundation of this Government, has always been for free waterways and free transportation. Even before the Constitution was adopted, in providing for the government of what was called the Northwest Territory, it was enacted and afterwards carried out to the letter that—

* * * The navigable waters leading into the Mississippi and St. Lawrence, and the carrying places between the same, shall be common highways, and forever free.

The act of April 8, 1814, for the admission of Louisiana, among other things provided:

That it shall be taken as a condition upon which the State is incorporated in the Union that the River Mississippi and navigable rivers and waters leading into the same and into the Gulf of Mexico shall be common highways and forever free, without any tax, duty, impost, or toll therefor.

The act of Congress of June 4, 1812, providing for the government of the Territory of Missouri, among other things, used the same language.

The provisions of this section were repeated in the act of Congress of March 6, 1820, enabling the Territory of Missouri to form a State, under which act the State of Missouri was admitted into the Union.

The river and harbor act of July 5, 1884, provides that all canals under the jurisdiction of the United States shall be free of every kind of toll and charge. This is the settled policy of the Government. The greatest commerce carried through any canal in the world is that conducted through the St. Marys Falls Canal, called in French the Sault Ste. Marie. This canal was taken over by the Government from the State of Michigan more than 30 years ago and has cost the Government, up to date, $24,000,000. In the season of 1912, 72,472,676 tons of freight were taken through this canal, more than half of it iron ore. The value of it was $791,357,837. The total expenditure in 1912 for operating the canal was $152,197.34, which was 4.64 mills for each ton carried through it. This expense was paid by the Government, and the use of the canal is free for every ship that sails the Lakes. We have spent more than twice the cost of the Panama Canal on the Mississippi and Missouri Rivers since we have had jurisdiction of them. What would a citizen of Kansas City or St. Louis think if he had to pay toll for the use of the river? We are spending millions trying to induce him to use the river.

Gentlemen who are so very solicitous about the income of the Government, and who have talked with such animation about securing a small amount for the use of the Panama Canal, were perfectly calm and serene when $140,000,000 was appropriated for the Navy—twenty millions more than the cost of the Navy in the last year of the Civil War. These gentlemen are leonine on the subject of income and lamblike on questions of appropriation.

A battleship costs fourteen or fifteen millions of dollars, a great deal more than, by all calculations, will be the annual income of the canal. And yet we have a political party that would favor the building of four battleships a year. We are talking about universal peace and disarmament.

I will state this proposition, and say that I believe in it as a sound national policy: If the canal is made free to all the nations of the earth, it will do more for universal peace and good will than our vast expenditures for a Navy. We intended it as a contribution to the commerce of the world, and now the world is quarreling with us about the contribution. Rather than have the representative of any foreign power dictate to the Congress and the people of the United States, and rather than submit to his dictation, I would open the canal free to the commerce of all the world.

In this whole transaction the United States has shown a spirit of self-sacrifice. The task of the American people is to become the conquerors of nature and not the conquerors of men. With the money spent on the canal we could have carried the flag of the United States to the Arctic Ocean and extended our sovereignty throughout all North America and then recovered the money. But we are not seeking the overthrow of other Governments. We consider conquest unworthy of modern civilization. After accomplishing the greatest task of all time—making two oceans one—we have offered to the nations of the world, at a trifling cost, the use of the world's greatest achievement. The ancients, upon finding the fragmentary foot of a colossal statue, would exclaim that the statue had been that of Hercules. Ex pede Herculem. Have the nations seen the foot of Hercules? Are they carping and caviling at the colossal achievement that has humbled all their history? Is it possible that they would have greater respect for us had we conquered them? Be that as it may, and regardless of what may be the consequence to me personally, I will never vote for anything that would even seem like furling the standard of the United States and laying it at the feet of any other power on the face of the globe.

[Mr. RAGSDALE addressed the House. See Appendix.]

[Mr. LOFT addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I have so little time remaining that I reserve it for the conclusion on our side.

Mr. DOREMUS. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK].

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. UNDERWOOD). The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] is recognized for the remaining time in the control of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DOREMUS]. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House of Representatives, I thank you for the cordiality of your reception.

Mr. Speaker, there is no personal issue between the President of the United States and myself. [Applause.] There has not been at any time. I trust there never will be. I have at no time uttered one word of criticism of the President. At no time, so far as I am informed or believe, has the President said one single word of criticism of me. [Applause.] In the nature of things, a man who is worthy to hold a high public post in the service of his country must believe that other public servants are actuated by the same high, courageous, and patriotic motives by which he believes himself to be moved. [Applause.]

I have never for one moment entertained the opinion that President Wilson is actuated by other than the highest patriotic motives. [Applause.] I do not believe that President Wilson has ever entertained any other opinion as to the conduct of those of us who find it necessary to differ with him on this measure. President Wilson does not desire a breach in the Democratic Party. I do not desire a breach in the Democratic Party, and there is no breach in the Democratic Party. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I would scorn to believe that President Wilson countenances for one moment the efforts of some of the jackal press to represent that we are seeking to disrupt the Democratic Party. The President is too big a man not to desire that this great question should be fought out on its merits, free from personalities, which can do no good and may do much harm. The President has too high an idea of the duties of a public servant to desire Members to do other than vote their conscientious convictions. With most of those who have asserted that I am seeking to disrupt the party the wish is father to the thought. [Applause.]

In the New York World of Tuesday, March 22, appeared a scurrilous and slanderous article with these head lines:

Leaders work to split Democracy over canal tolls. As filibuster against exemption repeal goes on in the House it is said that both Speaker CLARK and Mr. UNDERWOOD will oppose the President's measure.

That is one of the most preposterous statements made in any newspaper since Guttenberg invented movable types. [Applause and laughter.]

The last statement in that paragraph is the only true statement in it; that is, that we are both opposed to this bill.

You gentlemen into whose faces I am now looking know the Democratic leaders of this House better than any other men on earth know us. Does any man in this House believe that the Democratic House leaders are working to split the Democracy? [Cries of "No!" "No!"] If so, let him courageously stand up here and now, so that men may see the cast of his countenance. [Applause and laughter.]

The Democratic leaders of this House led in the long, bitter, and successful fight in the Sixty-first Congress which elected a Democratic House in 1910 and set in motion the forces which put a Democratic President in the White House, gave us a Democratic Senate, and a Democratic majority of 144 in this House. [Applause on the Democratic side.] It is a proud record, and yet the New York World has the gall to charge that those same leaders are trying to split the Democracy. I can stand here now and point out 50 or 60 men who would never have sat within these historic walls had not the Democrats and insurgents made that fight in the Sixty-first Congress. [Applause.]

Further along in the aforesaid World article occurs this passage:

The ship subsidyists are seeking to spring a great surprise when the vote is taken. When debate upon the repeal is finally opened on the floor they hope to uncover one trump card that will turn the tide of defeat.

This trump card is to be Speaker CHAMP CLARK. Thus far Mr. CLARK has carefully avoided stating his position on the question. The World correspondent learned to-day that Mr. CLARK is wavering against repeal. He did not vote when the bill was passed originally, and therefore he has none of the fears of changing his vote that appear to be uppermost in the minds of many Democratic politicians.

The ship-subsidy interests hope to get Mr. CLARK to make a thundering speech against repeal. If he can be induced to come out and announce that he is in favor of "nailing the Stars and Stripes to the canal," as one antirepeal man expressed it to-day, some Members believe many votes may be changed.

With Speaker CLARK, Mr. UNDERWOOD, FITZGERALD, and KITCHIN urging their followers to oppose the bill, it is conceded that a most remarkable spectacle will be staged upon the floor of the House.

That is another base and false insinuation. If any man here believes that slander, let him stand up here and now, so that he may be seen by these hundreds of witnesses.

In another World article those of us who stand for American rights as against British domination are assailed for "bolting the President." [Applause.] Merciful God! What an idiotic phrase! I have heard of men bolting platforms and of bolting nominees, but whoever in 6,000 years that the world has existed heard of a man bolting a man in office? It can not be done. It is an impossibility in nature.

We are denounced by the plutocratic World as bolters because we stand by the platform, which surely is an astounding way to bolt. And I use the words "plutocratic World" advisedly, because that is the name bestowed upon it by Mr. Seymour, one of the principal editors of the New York World, who called it that when he was running the St. Louis Republic; and if he denies it I will prove it by a hundred editorial references.

I refuse absolutely to have my Democracy measured by the weathercock World.

I have been a Democrat all my life. I am a Democrat now. I expect to die in that faith. I never bolted a Democratic nominee or platform in my life. When I was a boy down in the Kentucky hills, there was prevalent a disease called "intermittent fever"; that is, the fever came up every other day. The plutocratic World is an "intermittent Democrat." [Laughter.]

The World's insinuation that I am influenced by ship subsidies is too contemptible for consideration. Everybody, including the World, knows that from my first entrance here I have fought all ship-subsidy propositions tooth and nail. On one occasion I led the fight in the House which defeated a ship-subsidy proposition by 1 vote.

Not satisfied with the foregoing slanders, it attributes the fact that I am standing on the Baltimore platform to the fact that I have not forgotten the Baltimore convention. How can I forget a performance which nobody else in America seems able to forget, including the New York World itself? [Laughter and applause.] It, along with every editor in America who hopes to be ambassador, minister plenipotentiary, consul general, or to hold some other fat and juicy job, has been endeavoring to place me in antagonism to the President ever since the election. These papers declare that I am opposing this surrender to Great Britain as an opening gun in my campaign for President in 1916. It may surprise these obsequious courtiers to know that I never hinted to any human being that I would be a presidential candidate in 1916; and that I am not a candidate. Consequently their slander has been a gratuitous mental degradation.

It will surprise these limber-backed incense swingers still more to know what I have uniformly told those who have suggested my candidacy in 1916, and it is this, "If President Wilson makes a success of his administration he will be renominated and reelected in 1916 [applause]; but if he makes a failure, which God forbid! the nomination will not be worth having." [Applause.]

I never entertained the slightest ill will toward the President about the Baltimore convention. I wish him well. I did all I could to elect him, far more than some of those who so vociferously and fulsomely praise him now and for whom deep down in his heart he must entertain supreme contempt. [Laughter and applause.] I have steadfastly supported him until we are called upon to bolt the platform. I absolutely refuse to do any such thing. [Applause.]

One more word on this head: I do not believe that the fact that I led on 29 ballots at Baltimore, receiving a clear majority on 9, and that I got a majority of over 300,000 over the President in primary elections where he and I competed, precludes me from discharging my duty or exercising my rights as a Representative in Congress and as Speaker of the House to stand up for America against Great Britain. [Applause.]

Finally, the New York World says that I am to be defeated for Speaker as punishment for "bolting the President." So be it. [Cries of "No!" "No!"] The World tried to beat me for reelection to the Speakership; but nevertheless I received every vote in the Democratic caucus. [Applause.] At that rate Methuselah would be an infant beside me before the New York World defeats me for Speaker. [Laughter.]

The New York Sun practically nominates the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] for Speaker. Here is its exact language:

Reports have it that already the "little leaders"—

Now, I resent for my distinguished friends the title of "little leaders"; they are big-bore leaders; but the Sun says:

Reports have it that already the "little leaders" have decided that Representative CARTER GLASS, of Virginia, would be a good man for floor leader, and that Representative SWAGAR SHERLEY, of Kentucky, would make an ideal Speaker.

No doubt they would. The strange part of that paragraph is that it makes no mention of my voluble, vehement, and vociferous friend from Texas [Mr. HENRY] for the Speakership [laughter], for the Sun must know that he has had his eagle eye on the Speakership for, lo! these many years, and "hope deferred maketh the heart sick." It seems to me that the Sun has dealt him the most unkindest cut of all by omitting him from the lists.

Kentucky, where I was born and raised, and to whose limestone I owe my large frame—Kentucky has furnished several Speakers, among them Henry Clay, "Harry of the West," "the Millboy of the Slashes," the greatest man that ever sat in the Speaker's chair. It has often been wondered why this marvelous man was elected Speaker on his first day of service in the House. Four or five months ago, in writing a series of articles about the House of Representatives, and so forth, which I am going to publish in a book, I dug out this mystery, and here it is; and it may possibly convey a lesson, not only to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] but to some other folks. For several years the British had been committing gross outrages on our sailors and on our shipping. The administration was not disposed to demand redress, or, if it did, it did so very feebly; but the American people rose in protest against the outrages of the British on our shipping and on our sailors, and Henry Clay, in the prime of his splendid powers, only 34 years old, came over the Allegheny Mountains, shouting loudly to compel the British to give redress for those grievances. The people were with him, and they are always on the right side if you give them a chance and time to inform themselves. The House was with him, and notwithstanding it was his first day in the House he beat the candidate for peace at any price more than 3 to 1. [Applause.] He is among the immortals; God bless him in his grave. [Applause.] He was followed all his days in his career of mingled victories and defeats by the intense love of a vast multitude, as intense a love as that of the Old Guard for Napoleon, and it was because he was always an American first. [Applause.]

I have this to say: The fact that I am making this fight for our platform pledges may end my public career. There are many things worse than being defeated for Congress or defeated for the Speakership or even worse than to be defeated for the Presidency, and one of them is to repudiate the platform on which you are elected. [Applause.]

I can be happy without the Presidency. I can be happy without the Speakership. The happiest hours of my congressional life were spent on the floor of the House engaging freely in the parliamentary struggles, great and small, which rage in this large, energetic, and tumultuous body. If my constituents who have stood by me with unshaken fidelity should retire me to private life, I can still be happy in the love and affection of my wife and children, in the society of my books, and in cultivating flowers and trees. [Applause.]

One thing dead sure, when I do go out of public life, whether next year or 20 years hence, it will be with my mental integrity unimpaired and my self-respect intact. [Applause.]

Cowards die many times before their death;
The valiant never taste of death but once.

[Applause.]

I will not leave my children much property, but I will leave them the rich legacy of a good name, which King Solomon says is more precious than rubies. [Applause.]

Why have the plutocratic World and others of its kind made these false statements, these base insinuations, these ugly threats? To bully and browbeat me into helping to do an un-American thing—an utterly unjustifiable thing—a thing which will excite the scorn and derision of the civilized world. [Applause.] It can not be done. I have sense enough to know my duty, and courage enough to do it as becomes a Member of this House and the Speaker thereof.

I take a genuine pride in the membership of this House. I always defend it against muckrakers. Some of them have said things about me which they will regret when their fever cools down, but I pass them by. [Applause.] The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] became extremely heated because I exercised the right which they reserve to themselves; that is, of voting as it seemed to me was right. So far as the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] is concerned, I say, "Shoo! fly, don't bodder me. Shoo! fly, don't bodder me." [Laughter and applause.]

I have no word of criticism for my Democratic friends who are going to vote for the repeal. We have worked together too long; we have fought shoulder to shoulder, heart to heart, too often; we have mourned together in defeat for 16 years, but never were disheartened; we have rejoiced together in our victories during the last 4 years, and I hope we will have cause to rejoice in many more.

With deep affection
And recollection.

I often think of the 172 Democrats and thirty-odd insurgent Republicans who achieved our great victory on March 19, 1910, which started a political revolution. I love those men too well to quarrel with them now. [Applause.] You and I, Mr. Speaker, happened to be the Democratic leaders in that historic parliamentary contest, and among House Democrats you and I have been the chief beneficiaries. You owe the leadership of the House and I owe the Speakership to the fact, fortunate to us, that we were the Democratic leaders on that memorable occasion, but I have asserted a thousand times, and I do now reassert, that every man of the 172 Democrats and thirty-odd Republicans who fought with us on that bloody field is entitled to his full share of honor. In the immortal words of Admiral Winfield Scott Schley, "There was glory enough for all." With such men I will not quarrel. Indeed, the dignity of the high position which I hold by the partiality of the House forbids that I quarrel with any Member. I refuse to degrade the Speakership by so doing.

I assume that every Member will vote honestly the way dictated by his intellect and his conscience; but why should I be denied the same privilege? No man here should be a "rubber-stamp" Congressman. [Applause.] I refuse absolutely to be either a "rubber-stamp" Representative or a "rubber-stamp" Speaker. [Applause.] If I did, you would have no respect for me. I stand for the dignity, the privileges, the immunities, the prerogatives, and the good name of the House of Representatives. I do not want to see this House degraded by passing, right or wrong, without any tenable reason, a bill which reverses our solemnly recorded action of two years ago, and which the Democrats indorsed at Baltimore. What if more Democrats did vote against it than voted for it? The Republicans had a right to vote in this House, and they voted with the Democrats and carried the bill. [Applause.] I wish we could all vote together over on this side. I regret that we do not; but—

'Tis with our judgments as our watches; none
Go just alike, yet each believes his own.

So, if we must differ, let us differ in kindness, and it will be better, much better, for the party, and therefore better for the country. [Applause.]

Truth to tell, I never spent as much time thinking about what my duty was on any other proposition as upon this. I looked at it from every conceivable angle to see if there was any justification for not keeping our platform pledge, for I desired to stand with the President, knowing full well that my motive would be misconstrued by every office seeker in the land [laughter]; but, to save my life, I could conjure no excuse for my bolting the platform. That is the reason why I was so slow in announcing my conclusion in the matter. Having had so much trouble in coming to a determination myself, I never asked a single Member to vote as I did. I am certain that the entire membership of the House will bear me out in that statement.

On the 19th day of August, 1893, I made my first speech in the House. On that occasion, as on this, a platform figured in the proceedings. Among other things, I said:

I am a Democrat. I stand by the platform—by all of it—by every jot and tittle of it, because I believed in it with my whole heart when it was made and I believe in it with my whole heart now. It contains the Democratic gospel pure and undefiled. Over no political utterance did I ever rejoice more than over that, because it was not a Janus-faced, double meaning, good Lord, good devil, all-things-to-all-men sort of document, but was a clear, bold, honest, manly, masterful, comprehensive declaration of Democratic faith. From a hundred rostrums, in the presence of high Heaven and thousands of intelligent, law-abiding, industrious, God-fearing, patriotic people I pledged myself to stand by it here, and come what may, I am going to keep my word.

* * * * * * *

It is an old saying that all things are fair in love or war, and some people appear to believe that anything is fair in politics. I dissent in toto from any such immoral doctrine. The people have a right to honest treatment at the hands of those who aspire to be their agents in public affairs, and to the man who betrays them they will send the silken bowstring for his own destruction.

[Applause.]

* * * * * * *

What is a platform, anyway? Is it an honest declaration of principles which the framers honestly intend to enact into laws if they attain to power, or is it a dishonest device whereby to entrap the unwary voter? Is it a candid statement of the faith that is in us, or is it a bait to catch gudgeons?

Is it the plighted word of men of honor to accomplish certain things, or is it only "a good-enough Morgan" till after election, which palters with the people in a double sense—which "keeps the word of promise to the ear and breaks it to the hope"?

[Applause.]

That was what I said when I first came here. I have stood by that declaration ever since, now almost 22 years. I stand by it now. I will stand by it until I am bereft of my senses. It is the rule of conscience and of patriotic service. No other rule will do to live by or to die by. [Applause.]

That statement is in language more bizarre than I would use now, but the idea expressed therein is the same idea I entertain now and will entertain until I am in my grave.

There has been much felicitation among the supporters of this bill about their tremendous victory on the adoption of the rule. When it is remembered that the majority was only 28 on the rule and that a change of 15 votes would have defeated it in a House with 144 Democratic majority, the grounds for their self-congratulation are hard to discover.

When Pyrrhus, King of Epirus, was walking over a battle field whereon he had won a hard-fought victory and observed the number of dead and wounded among his own soldiers, he mournfully exclaimed:

Another such victory and we are undone!

[Laughter.]

To whom does the Panama Canal belong, anyway? To the United States of America. [Applause.] We built it at the enormous cost of $400,000,000. We built it on American soil. We built it by the genius of American engineers. We have fortified it; we will control it. In order to get a chance to build it we created a Republic. [Applause.] Of course, we used to abuse Col. Roosevelt and poke fun at his fly-by-night Republic; but he was the American President; we are responsible for him. He may have been a little hasty—I think he was—in the recognition of that newborn Republic, but nevertheless it is our Republic. We created it and we can not escape its paternity. [Applause and laughter.]

For whose benefit did we build the canal? We are not such numbskulls as not to know what we built it for. We built it primarily for our own benefit. That is what we did, and nobody can lie out of it. [Applause and laughter.] Secondarily, we built it for the benefit of the world, but it was to be used under rules and conditions that we and nobody else prescribe. [Applause.] The British Government has just as much right to prescribe the rules for the government of that canal as it has to prescribe that I shall wear a white flannel suit in midwinter, as Mark Twain used to wear in the coldest weather. [Applause and laughter.] Why did we build it? There is the crux of the whole situation. What did we do it for? Why did we violate the integrity of Colombia? Because that is exactly what we did. What did we spend $400,000,000 for? What did we want with the canal anyhow? I will tell you what we wanted. We wanted to get cheap freight water rates. [Applause.] And we wanted to fix it so that we can get both parts of our fleet into the Pacific or the Atlantic at the same time, wherever we want them and when we want them. [Applause.] Who fought the building of that canal and defeated it for 15 long, wearisome years? The transcontinental railroads. [Applause.]

Who would be the chief beneficiaries of this repeal bill? The same transcontinental railroads—the Canadian Pacific and the Tehuantepec National Railway heading the list. It would be many millions of dollars in their capacious pockets annually. To do a thing to enable them to hold up their old rates is altruistic generosity run mad and an outrage on the American people. I refuse to indorse any such program.

As a party pledged to encouragement of competition, we long ago took our stand unequivocally in favor of freeing transportation between our own ports, and, so far as I am informed, no change in conditions has taken place that could possibly justify a reversal of that policy.

Now, that is the truth, and you can not blink it. How much will the stock of the Tehuantepec Railroad, principally owned by Lord Cowdray, be worth after the canal is completed? It will not be worth 3 cents on a dollar. I will tell you what I would rather see. I would rather see that canal blown up than to give the English any control over it. [Applause.] It has been the dream of men since Balboa first looked down upon the peaceful ocean to cut a canal across that Isthmus. But I would rather see it filled up with granite bowlders cemented together than to yield one particle of control over it to any foreign nation beneath the sun. [Applause.] It is ours forever, for better or for worse, just like the Mississippi River and the Missouri River that line my district. It belongs to us. There is no question about that. [Applause.]

One of the wisest things the fathers did was to distribute the powers of government among three departments—legislative, judicial, and executive; and they endeavored to so arrange things that no one department should encroach upon the prerogatives of the others.

Under this system of checks and balances certain duties are devolved upon the President which he is sworn to discharge, and, truth to tell, President Wilson shows no reluctance in discharging his duties and exercising his powers to the utmost. [Laughter.]

When he was elected governor of New Jersey he declared that he had been elected leader of the people of that State. When he was elected President he declared that he had become, ipso facto, leader of the people of the United States. In both declarations he was correct, but even leadership has its limitations. [Applause.]

I am willing to follow where he leads so long as he is in the White House and so long as he does not ask us to repudiate a plain platform declaration, and there I draw the line. [Laughter.]

Under our system a national convention is the grand inquest of a political party, the highest authority for the declaration of party principles, higher than President or congressional caucuses; indeed, higher than President and congressional caucuses combined. There is no question about that.

The fathers also devolved upon Congress certain duties which we are sworn to discharge faithfully and well, duties which we can not shirk or fail to discharge without self-stultification and the condemnation of the people and of our own consciences.

The President discharges his duties. The question is, Have we the wisdom, the courage, and the patriotism to discharge ours? If not, we should make way for men imbued with the spirit of '76, to the end that we may transmit our priceless heritage of liberty to our children and our children's children unimpaired. [Applause.]

The declaration in favor of free tolls for our coastwise trade was writ large in the Baltimore platform. It is in these words:

> We favor the exemption from toll of American ships engaged in coastwise trade passing through the canal.

Was there ever a plainer sentence written since writing was invented? [Applause.]

> We also favor legislation forbidding the use of the Panama Canal by ships owned or controlled by railroad carriers engaged in transportation competitive with the canal.

The proponents of the repeal at first, with far more zeal than discretion, asserted that that plank was inserted in the platform surreptitiously and without any consideration. But that would have blasted too many reputations of men who were on the platform committee [applause]—particularly the 11 men on the subcommittee which reported the tolls plank to the full committee—and they refused to rest under that false and foolish charge and told the truth about it in self-defense; and the truth is the tolls plank was introduced in the usual way and was fully discussed—not only discussed, but amended and agreed to in its amended form by the full committee and then by the whole convention.

That sentence about railroad-owned ships was not in the first draft of it, but it was in the nature of an amendment.

We went to the people on that platform containing the free-tolls plank; headed by President Wilson himself we all indorsed it; standing on it we appealed to the voters of the land for their support; and they, responding to our Macedonian cry for help, enabled us to sweep the land from sea to sea by amazing majorities in the Electoral Colleges. And now it is proposed that we reward their faith in us and their support of us by repudiating one of the planks of that platform on which we achieved that astounding victory, a plank so clear that there could be no misunderstanding about it, no possible misconstruction of it. I refuse absolutely to be a party to any such performance. [Applause.] Tell it not in Gath, proclaim it not in the streets of Askalon that the Democratic Party will not keep faith with a confiding public.

We most earnestly desire peace with all nations; we will buy peace from none. [Applause.] In the memorable words of the immortal Pinckney, "Millions for defense but not one cent for tribute." When we were a feeble folk, with only five or six millions of people and with very little wealth, the high-souled Jefferson scornfully refused to pay tribute to the pirates of the Barbary coast, and, though a lifelong lover of peace, sent American men-of-war to shell them out of their holes.

Now, being the richest and most powerful nation on the globe, with a population of 100,000,000 souls—the very flower of the human race—we are asked to grant to Great Britain, whom we defied and defeated in our infancy, and whom we defied again and defeated again in our early youth in the War of 1812—properly called "Our Second War of Independence"—concessions grounded in injustice and humiliating in character—claims for which concessions had been abandoned by Great Britain until Senator ELIHU ROOT made a speech upholding the contentions of that foreign power—contentions which had been flatly rejected by a President of the United States and his Secretary of State. There is no tale in the Arabian Nights or even in Munchausen so utterly incredible as that historic fact. Why should we grant Great Britain a demand which she had abandoned prior to that widely bruited senatorial speech? No sufficient reason has ever been vouchsafed to us, and none ever will be, because it is an impossibility in nature. Yes, we desire peace with all nations; but it is the sort of peace which Disraeli boasted he returned with from the Congress of Berlin to London, "Peace with honor" [applause], for securing which he was made an earl and further distinguished by the Garter. In his famous first inaugural, formulating the Democratic creed, Thomas Jefferson puts the same idea in these words, familiar to us all:

> Peace, commerce, and honest friendship with all nations, entangling alliances with none.

My brilliant friend, of whom I am very fond, Senator LEWIS, of Illinois, drew a picture in the Senate yesterday calculated to make a man's hair stand on end "like quills upon the fretful porcupine" [Laughter.] He says Russia will gobble Alaska, the Japanese will take the Philippines, Guam, the Sandwich Islands, and the Pacific coast to the passes of the Rocky Mountains. While they are doing that England will gobble up Mexico. Now I will tell you what I have got to say about it. We want war with no nation; we want peace; but rather than surrender our right to our complete sovereignty over every square foot of our globe-encircling domain, we will cheerfully and courageously face the world in arms. [Applause.] They may jump on us, but if they do they will jump off again. [Applause.]

The amazing request of the President for the repeal, like the peace of God, passeth all understanding. [Applause.] If he has any reasons which are not utterly untenable and which impelled him to make the request, he has not vouchsafed them to us as a body or, so far as I am informed, to any Member of the House. If he has adequate reasons and did not deem it prudent to make them known to the world at large, he could have communicated them to us in secret session. With all due deference to the President, it seems to me that we are entitled to those reasons before bolting a Democratic platform, which is generally considered an indefensible, an extra-hazardous performance, frequently fatal in its results.

I think, as Speaker of this House, I had a right to know them. [Applause.] I am the third officer in this Government, and I am as patriotic as the second or the first. [Applause.] You have a right to know; you are a part of the Government. [Applause.] Now, if the President did not want to give them to the world, he could have given them to us in secret session; and if they had convinced us as they seem to have convinced him there would have been no dissension in this House. [Applause.] We are all Americans. The fact of a man being a Republican or a Progressive does not keep him from being just as patriotic as if he were a Democrat. [Applause.]

Now, what were the two reasons assigned?

In his message one reason assigned by the President was in these words:

That exemption constitutes a mistaken economic policy from every point of view.

If it is "a mistaken economic policy" now, was it not "a mistaken economic policy" during the campaign of 1912, when we all, under the lead of the President himself, indorsed it as part of the Democratic creed, on which we appealed for votes? If so, why did the President indorse it then? It can not be that a proposition which was good before the election can be so awfully bad after the election.

But it is not "a mistaken economic policy." If so, is not our policy from the very beginning of shutting all foreign ships out of our coastwise trade also "a mistaken economic policy"? Do not our rules of charging foreign vessels for wharfage, dockage, pilotage, and so forth, while charging our own vessels no fees or smaller fees, also constitute "a mistaken economic policy," if the President is correct? In short, if he is correct, is not anything we can do to give our own people any economic advantage whatsoever in the race for commercial supremacy "a mistaken economic policy"?

Most assuredly the "mistaken-economic-policy" reason of the President is untenable and fades away before the stubborn facts of our history.

As that is a disputed point, why not amend this bill so as to continue the present law with the exemption section for two years or suspend it for two years? By amending the bill either way we control the situation. If the exemption from tolls should turn out to be "a mistaken economic policy," we can repeal or modify it; but if we pass this repeal bill, control over our own canal, built on our own soil with our own money, is gone from us and our heirs—

Forever and forever,
As long as the river flows,
As long as the heart has passions,
As long as life has woes.

Here is what President Wilson said at Washington Park, N. J., August 5, 1912:

One of the great objects in cutting that great ditch across the Isthmus of Panama is to allow farmers who are near the Atlantic to ship to the Pacific by way of the Atlantic ports.

Now, at present there are no ships to do that, and one of the bills pending—passed, I believe, yesterday by the Senate as it had passed the House—provides for free tolls for American ships through that canal, and prohibits any ship from passing through which is owned by any American railroad company.

You see the object of that, don't you? We do not want the railroads to compete with themselves, because we understand that kind of competition. We want water carriage to compete with land carriage, so as to be perfectly sure that you are going to get better rates around the canal than you would across the continent.

Our platform is not molasses to catch flies. It means business. It means what it says. It is the utterance of earnest and honest men, who intend to do business along those lines and who are not waiting to see whether they can catch votes with those promises before they determine whether they are going to act upon them or not.

And here is his address to Congress on March 5, 1914:

Gentlemen of the Congress, I have come to you upon an errand which can be very briefly performed, but I beg that you will not measure its importance by the number of sentences in which I state it. No communication I have addressed to the Congress carried with it graver or more far-reaching implications as to the interest of the country, and I come now to speak upon a matter with regard to which I am charged in a peculiar degree, by the Constitution itself, with personal responsibility.

I have come to ask you for the repeal of that provision of the Panama Canal act of August 24, 1912, which exempts vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States from payment of tolls, and to urge upon you the justice, the wisdom, and the large policy of such a repeal with the utmost earnestness of which I am capable.

In my own judgment, very fully considered and maturely formed, that exemption constitutes a mistaken economic policy from every point of view, and is, moreover, in plain contravention of the treaty with Great Britain concerning the canal concluded on November 18, 1901. But I have not come to urge upon you my personal views. I have come to state to you a fact and a situation. Whatever may be our own differences of opinion concerning this much-debated measure, its meaning is not debated outside the United States. Everywhere else the language of the treaty is given but one interpretation, and that interpretation precludes the exemption I am asking you to repeal. We consented to the treaty; its language we accepted, if we did not originate; and we are too big, too powerful, too self-respecting a Nation to interpret with a too strained or refined reading the words of our own promises just because we have power enough to give us leave to read them as we please. The large thing to do is the only thing we can afford to do, a voluntary withdrawal from a position everywhere questioned and misunderstood. We ought to reverse our action without raising the question whether we were right or wrong, and so once more deserve our reputation for generosity and for the redemption of every obligation without quibble or hesitation.

I ask this of you in support of the foreign policy of the administration. I shall not know how to deal with other matters of even greater delicacy and nearer consequence if you do not grant it to me in ungrudging measure.

A second reason for the repeal assigned by President Wilson is that the exemption of our coastwise trade from the payment of tolls is "in plain contravention of the treaty with Great Britain concerning the canal, concluded on November 18, 1901." Of course, the President believed that or he would not have said it, but he was mistaken. If I believed that, I would vote with him, for I am as tender and jealous of my country's honor as he is or as any other living man is, even as tender and jealous as the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY], the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER] are, notwithstanding they are the self-constituted custodians of the honor of the American Republic and the conscience keepers of the American people. [Applause.]

It is painful, perhaps presumptuous, to disagree with these three great international jurists, but it must be done. The Supreme Court of the United States is supposed to know some law. In the case of Olsen versus Smith, reported in the One hundred and ninety-fifth United States, volume 332, at page 344, a case involving the very point involved in the exemption section of the Panama tolls law, the court had the temerity to rule contrary to the opinion of my three learned friends aforesaid. Chief Justice White, then Mr. Justice White, delivered the opinion of the court in these words:

Nor is there merit in the contention that, as the vessel in question was a British vessel coming from a foreign port, the State laws concerning pilotage are in conflict with a treaty between Great Britain and the United States providing that "no higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed in any port of the United States on British vessels than those payable in the same ports by vessels of the United States." Neither the exemption of coastwise steam vessels from pilotage resulting from the law of the United States nor any lawful exemption of coastwise vessels created by the State law concerns vessels in the foreign trade, and therefore any such exemptions do not operate to produce a discrimination against British vessels engaged in foreign trade and in favor of vessels of the United States in such trade. In substance the proposition but asserts that because by the law of the United States steam vessels in the coastwise trade have been exempt from pilotage regulations, therefore there is no power to subject vessels in foreign trade to pilotage regulations, even although such regulations apply without discrimination to all vessels engaged in such foreign trade, whether domestic or foreign.

In other words, the court held that there could be no discrimination where there was no competition, and that as by the law of the United States only American vessels can engage in the coastwise trade, it was no violation of the treaty if the regulations applied to all vessels in the foreign trade. The reasoning of that decision applies equally well to the present situation.

In his very able minority report the gentleman from California [Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND] thus elucidates the decision:

The remarkable similarity of the facts and conditions in the Olsen against Smith case and that under consideration is apparent. In that case as in this it was urged that a law of the United States granting an exemption in favor of vessels engaged in the coastwise trade was in violation of a treaty. The exemption in that case was from pilotage charges; in the present case it is from toll charges. Certainly it can not be contended that there is any distinction between the cases in that regard.

In that case the language of the treaty bound this country not to impose any higher "duties or charges" on British vessels than on vessels of the United States in the same ports. But under the local law British vessels were required to pay pilotage charges, while American vessels were completely exempt from such charges. "A plain violation of the treaty," the majority would say, but in effect the Supreme Court said: "No; for what we do or omit to do with regard to our coastwise trade is of no concern to any nation, for they can not complain with regard to a traffic in which they have no interest. No regulation, exemption, or privilege which we see fit to grant to our coastwise trade is a just subject of complaint, for it does not concern vessels engaged in the foreign trade."

Certainly the President has never read the Olsen against Smith decision by our court of last resort or he never would have concluded that the exemption of tolls on our coastwise trade was in plain contravention of our treaty with Great Britain.

If we have entered into an engagement which forbids us to manage our own affairs, then we must abide by it, however foolish or unnecessary that engagement may have been. But have we? Here opinions—honest opinions—differ; and, mind you, not only American but British opinions. His Majesty's Government is quite certain now that exemption of tolls on our coastwise traffic violates the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, but it was very far from certain when its accredited representative wrote to our Secretary of State as late as July, 1912, that—

If the trade should be so regulated as to make it certain that only bona fide coastwise traffic which is reserved for United States vessels would be benefited by this exemption, it may be that no objection could be taken.

So far as our own best judges are concerned, it is, I believe, quite safe to say that, with the exception of the learned senior Senator from New York and our former highly respected ambassador, Mr. Choate, the weight of recognized legal opinion of the highest merit, from Mr. Olney, Mr. Taft, Mr. Knox, and to my mind, though I would make no invidious distinctions, most important by far of all, from the present Chief Justice of the United States, in a precisely similar case, is practically unanimous to the effect that neither legally in a broad sense nor technically in a narrow application does this treaty forbid us to regulate the transportation of our own goods in our own ships through our own canal between our own ports.

The President differs from the judgment of these and many other men of like understanding. He is convinced that the statute as it now stands does contravene our solemn obligation, and should therefore be repealed. So believing, he does the only thing that an honorable and conscientious head of the Nation could do; he asks us to reconsider our action in view of his conviction that we have violated a pledge. Whatever may be the differences of opinion respecting the merits of the case, I do President Wilson honor for his act. If I were in his place and believed as he believes, I should do as he has done. Moreover, I have such confidence in the President that I have not the slightest doubt that if he were in my place and believed what I believe, he would do as I am doing. But I do not and can not indorse his judgment in this matter. I think he is wholly in the wrong, at least so far as the treaty bears upon our own domestic situation, and consequently offers no just cause for the breaking of a well-considered party pledge.

In addition to the Supreme Court decision, as pointed out by Mr. MANN, the same view is held by two Presidents, by two Secretaries of State, and by the House itself on three separate occasions.

While I have great respect for the opinions of the President and my three worthy colleagues aforementioned, the weight of authority is against them.

The plain, unvarnished truth of history is that from the beginning to the present hour, what we do about our domestic trade, which includes the coastwise trade, we have considered solely as our business, and that foreign nations have absolutely nothing to do with it. It is none of their business what we do with it.

The repeal means the practical abandonment of the Monroe doctrine, which we forced into the code of the international law and which the American people will maintain at all hazards. That is the only proposition they ever agreed upon; and the reason they agreed upon it was that it was a genuine American pronouncement, one to warm the cockles of the heart of every true American betwixt the two seas. It was the doctrine of self-defense. Touch that doctrine and the bristles of the American people rise instanter. Those who assert that the Monroe doctrine is dead reckon without their host.

No one can forget how, when we had our quarrel with Great Britain over the Venezuelan question, President Grover Cleveland thrilled the hearts of his countrymen, without regard to political affiliations, by a message on which his fame will rest far more than upon all his other acts and words in the coming time. His famous and courageous declaration, "To-day the United States is practically sovereign upon this continent, and its fiat is law upon subjects to which it confines its interposition," made him for the first and only time a popular idol. Therein he bluntly and succinctly stated the opinion of 99 per cent of the American people.

James Monroe stated the Monroe doctrine very modestly. We were a modest folk then; but the Monroe doctrine has grown with our growth and strengthened with our strength, till now it is what Grover Cleveland said it was; and surely nobody will have the temerity to accuse him of being either a demagogue or a jingo.

Now may the God of our fathers, who nerved 3,000,000 backwoods Americans to fling their gage of battle into the face of the mightiest monarch in the world, who guided the hand of Jefferson in writing the charter of liberty, who sustained Washington and his ragged and starving army amid the awful horrors of Valley Forge, and who gave them complete victory on the blood-stained heights of Yorktown, may He lead Members to vote so as to prevent this stupendous folly—this unspeakable humiliation of the American Republic. [Prolonged applause on the floor and in the galleries.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. UNDERWOOD). The gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, how much time remains of debate to the various sides?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Thirty-seven minutes remain, controlled by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON]. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON].

Mr. PETERS of Massachusetts rose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Georgia yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman from Massachusetts to excuse me. I had forgotten for the moment. He requested permission to have read a letter. If the gentleman will send the letter to the Clerk's desk, I will have it read in my time.

Mr. PETERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, as the name of Mr. Richard Olney, former Democratic Secretary of State, has been referred to during the debate, and his views have been quoted by those in opposition to this measure, I have asked the gentleman from Georgia to permit this letter from Mr. Olney to me to be read in order to present correctly his views on the present situation.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will read the letter in the time of the gentleman from Georgia.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

BOSTON, March 28, 1914.

Hon. ANDREW J. PETERS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. PETERS: I have your favor of the 25th instant asking my views as to how a Representative in Congress should vote on the bill to repeal the free-tolls provision of the Panama Canal act.

If I were in your position, I am very certain I should feel that I ought to stand by the President.

The situation is peculiar. Here is a treaty unquestionably obscure and susceptible of two opposite interpretations, as conclusively shown by the conflicting views of two Presidents of the United States and by the irreconcilable differences of opinion among eminent lawyers without regard to their political affiliations. Recognizing this situation, and though he might have proposed arbitration, the President, in effect, declares that the merits of the issue are immaterial, and that the repeal of the act which raises the issue is absolutely essential to our good standing with the great powers of the world and to the proper conduct of our foreign relations. He makes this declaration as President and as that branch of the National Government especially charged with our foreign relations, and takes the responsibility of assuring Congress and the country that, as compared with the results to be gained by repeal, all other matters involved are of slight account. Now, this declaration of the President must be accepted as made in good faith, with absolute sincerity, and with an intimate knowledge of foreign relations that Congress can not pretend to. What else, therefore, is there to do but follow the President's lead upon a matter upon which he is entitled to lead both by reason of superior acquaintance with the subject and because our frame of government requires him to lead? It must be borne in mind that for Congress not to support such an urgent appeal as the President has made in this instance is not merely to defeat a measure which may be, and which he deems to be, required both by the honor and the well-being of the Nation. It is to discredit him for the future, it is to weaken and prejudice him in his subsequent intercourse with foreign nations, it is to give them notice that he is rather a figurehead than a real factor in the National Government, and that dealings with him are hardly to be regarded as very serious affairs.

Other pertinent considerations leading to the same result might be mentioned, but in the precise situation now confronting Congress they may, I think, be safely passed over because those already given ought to be regarded as decisive.

Very truly, yours,

RICHARD OLNEY.

Mr. ADAMSON said: Mr. Speaker, in the short time remaining I would not be able to indulge in any pyrotechnics if I had a supply of fireworks. There are three good reasons why this provision should be repealed and why it never should have been adopted. One is the Government of the United States was intrusted by the people to construct that canal, primarily for the benefit of the Government of the United States, as the owner of the canal, administering that institution fairly and honestly for the use of its own vessels and collecting incidentally from commerce as much as possible of revenues to reimburse the people, instead of taxing the people to pay a deficit out of the Treasury. The revenues will not be sufficient to defray the expense of operating the canal, even if all pay uniform tolls. If only half should pay tolls, then a deficit of half the expense of operation would be paid out of the Treasury by the people. That does not seem to alarm some people. Some people have been getting benefits from the Government anyway, and it appears that some people are entirely unable to differentiate between the Government and themselves when it comes to using money and asking largess from the Government. They are unwilling to allow the Government to do anything without paying tribute to them. They confuse the Government and the people with themselves. They say that it is ours and that we have a right to do with it as we please. Suppose the gentlemen who assert that should go down to the Treasury of the United States. That is the property of the United States. They can walk through there, and they may be allowed to handle $40,000,000, but they are not allowed to take that away unless they have a valid check for $40,000,000. [Applause.] A proper sense of decency and honor would prompt them to give the Government a chance to make the canal a success instead of shackling that great enterprise with their own selfish demands and making it a charge on the Treasury and a burden on the people.

The second reason is that it is a subsidy out of the Treasury to a rich special interest that does not need it, which, according to the evidence before our committee, will not give the people the benefit of it. [Applause.] There has never been any refutation of that statement. The third reason is that the discrimination is contrary to our treaty, made for the benefit of all nations, and all nations rightfully resent our violation of faith. We ought to have sense enough to do right without waiting for their objection. Some people do not understand the situation. This is not a canal built originally in our own country, but in a country where the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has already explained to you Great Britain had more possessions than we had at the time, and contested the supremacy and disputed our right to build there. Oh, what a pity we did not have the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] there with his eagles or one of his eagles. He had two. That splendid metaphor of his is about as badly mixed as his history and logic. He had an old eagle 130 years ago twisting the lion's tail and lining her nest with his tawny mane, and now he has a young eagle, which is scared to death when the lion roars. That must have been a curious bird to retain its youth for these long years. What a pity he was not down there then, to drive that lion from the continent. What a pity the gentleman from New York [Mr. CHANDLER] was not here also—the brave man who said that he can live without the esteem of England, but not without his own self-respect. Mr. Speaker, if self-esteem be a specific for longevity, I see no reason why that debonair gentleman should not live forever. [Laughter and applause.]

Oh, but we are cowardly, cowardly; we are afraid; and it is said you changed your politics. Let me tell those gentlemen who talk about cowardice that it is not always the man who prates, not the fellow when he is talking to the masses or tickling the ear of the groundling, but it is the man with responsibility upon him when he meets danger who is brave enough to do right, "who dare do all that may become a man, and who dare do more is none."

When a ship-subsidy jingo mentions cowardice or calls you "pusillanimous" for honestly standing up for the people against graft, talk poetry to him. Tell him—

> And if thou saidst I am not peer
> Of any lord in Scotland here—
> Lowland or Highland, far or near—
> Lord Angus, thou hast lied!

Oh, the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] and the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN] were greatly troubled about the Democratic platform, about gentlemen changing positions. They thought because this thing got into the Democratic platform that was the reason for changing and going across to the enemy instead of standing by the people, but the papers for four days have deplored the fact there was only one side of this case, because the first tier of leaders were standing by the trusts and the special interests and you have to draft these second-class temporary leaders to represent the people, and those gentlemen could not stand the idea of being classed anywhere but in the first tier of leaders. That is the reason Mr. MONDELL and Mr. SLOAN sought cover to get into the class and rank with the first tier of leaders. I can understand that. The gentleman from Wyoming gave several versions and several reasons for his change. One was that the President had come over to him, and although his original reason for voting was good, he flopped because the President agreed with him. His wabbly argument is worse than Goldsmith's drunken man:

> The pupil of impulse, it forced him along,
> His conduct still right, but his argument wrong;
> Still aiming at honor, yet fearing to roam,
> The driver got drunk and the horse drove home.

He had sound conclusions and a good reason, and he quit because the President came to the relief of our committee in this matter. Now, gentlemen, I desire to say your committee has worked here, and I have endeavored to learn all I could from them about this subject for 17 years. We brought in two years ago a bill on the subject of the Panama Canal. We have been studying ever since Col. Hepburn, bless his old soul, and I had the first debate in this House on this very proposition of giving exemption of tolls to American ships in the Fifty-fifth and Fifty-sixth Congresses; yet people say it was not mooted at that time, and I said a more foolish thing than the Speaker said just now. I said I would rather allow the Isthmus to stand there forever and have the mountains pile up forever and the two oceans eternally separate there than for Congress to go so deep in the business of graft and special privilege as to tax the American people hundreds of millions of dollars for special interests. [Applause.] And I do not propose now to run to cover because the President of the United States comes here and agrees with me after this long fight. [Applause.] Now, gentlemen, I did not support Woodrow Wilson for nomination, and when I heard that OSCAR UNDERWOOD and the Speaker were rising in insurrection against the President I knew it to be false, because I supported both of them for President. I wanted both of them—either one I could get. If I could not get both for President, I wanted one for President and the other for Vice President. I even berated Woodrow Wilson so much as to say that the Vice Presidency was good enough for him. Surely that does not brand me as very partial to him, does it? I still believe that either one of those other gentlemen would have made a good President, although Woodrow Wilson has made the best this country has seen for 100 years. [Applause.] I did not believe, and I do not believe now, that any man I supported would enter into insurrection against a Democratic President, because he is President now and he was Woodrow Wilson then. I will tell you what is a fact. They would have had to do something like he has done—they would have to learn something about the canal. When he was first nominated he did not know anything more about the Panama Canal than they do now.

They are great tariff debaters. CLARK is the biggest Speaker I ever saw, and UNDERWOOD is the greatest floor leader I ever saw in my life [applause], but they have not studied the canal and do not know anything about it, and neither did the President. The President made a foolish speech over in New Jersey, so the newspapers say, in which he talked about excluding ships at the canal, and said we did not have enough coastwise ships. I reckon CLARK and UNDERWOOD think that now, by the way they talk. My God, one-tenth of the coastwise ships we have, which is the biggest fleet in the world, and equal to those of the combined nations of the world, are large enough and strong enough to do profitable business through the canal, and if each of the ships constituting that 10 per cent would make one round trip each year there would be six ships a day passing through that canal from coast to coast. They would either go empty or the business would multiply a hundredfold. That is how many we have, and that is only 10 per cent of them, and those, judging by the initial letters and names of the owners, represent every kind of trade and trust and combination in the United States. And we know how much a gallon of oil weighs, how many of them would go to the ton, and we know how little one-sixth of a cent a gallon would affect the price of Standard Oil, as affected by the toll the Standard Oil would pay at the rate of $1.20 a net ton. How would the people get any benefit of that, and why should we say we do not have ships enough. According to the evidence before the committee, they select their own routes and never compete with one another and never will; and one firm, which is owned in part by other combinations, and which itself has stock in oil companies and other companies, has enough ships to do all the business of that canal, and it says it will do it, in spite of all comers. Its agent walked out of the committee room and said in the presence of a dozen witnesses that while he would like to put the toll in his jeans, anybody who thought a cent of it would ever pass to a shipper or a consumer was a fool.

The trouble is, gentlemen, when they go to consider this canal they make a mistake to analogize it or liken it to something else. There is not anything else to compare it with. There never have been two such canals in the world. We started this canal after long negotiation, described to you by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. We failed to get the capital with which to build it. We made an agreement of equality and neutrality to have it built by a private company and protected by the joint operation of maritime nations. Failing to do it, capital found a cheaper place and built the Suez Canal, connecting the different oceans of the world, at about one-fourth of the cost, and applied exactly the same rules, in substance. Afterwards, this Government, needing the canal for the use of its own ships, its warships, and auxiliary ships, and the people desiring a closer connection between the two coasts, secured a modification of the old treaty under which it was prohibited from building it, and it was changed so as to allow our Government to build it, provided it took exactly the same position that the private company would have occupied and which the private company occupied at Suez, which meant "I will use the canal for my benefit, but I am not the Shipping Trust or not all the people; I am the official Government of the United States, and I have a right to make that enterprise prosperous, if I can, for the benefit of the tax-paying people."

Men who talk to you about battleships raise bugbears about excluding our own battleships. Great goodness, whom do they pay tolls to? They pay them to the Government of the United States, by pulling money out of one pocket and putting it into another.

But the second article of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty says it shall have all the rights of owner and builder subject to the conditions of fairness and equity, and if you will read the notes in the Senate you will find that Senator Bacon and Senator McLaurin, of Mississippi, made motions to amend the second treaty that was confirmed—not the first one with the Bard amendment—striking out the provision that preserved all the terms of article 8 of the old Clayton-Bulwer treaty. And they were defeated by 60 to 18, showing what the Senate meant and understood at that time.

"Oh," but they say, "what do we get out of it?" These men ought to know what a man gets out of a thing when he collects tolls out of all mankind. It is a business institution. The Government's interest is to get all the money it can out of it—out of all commerce that uses it. If commerce had built that canal under the old contract, our Government would have been glad to be out of it and glad to pay the tolls on its warships, but commerce would not build it. As the Government had to build it, it should use it for its own ships first, and then take toll out of commerce which will patronize it.

The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] and others have criticized a statement in the majority report that the grant from Panama is accompanied by a covenant running with the grant which we are bound to respect. The gentlemen are pleased to construe that as an assault on our sovereignty. I do not care to charge lack of candor nor lack of information, but as the same report carried the answer to their suggestion, it is a little strange that gentlemen who are both wise and candid could not see both when they saw one. The gentleman from Alabama read article 3 of the treaty with Panama, which "grants all rights, power, and authority which the United States would possess if sovereign of the territory to the entire exclusion of the right, power, and authority of Panama." I call attention to article 18 of that same treaty, declaring that—the canal and the entrances thereto shall be neutral in perpetuity, and shall be opened upon the terms provided for by section 1 of article 3, of and in conformity with all the stipulations of the treaty entered into by the Governments of the United States and Great Britain on November 18, 1901.

And I further quote article 4 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty:

It is agreed that no change of territorial sovereignty or of the international relations of the country or countries traversed by the before-mentioned canal shall affect the general principle of neutralization of the obligation of the high contracting parties under the present treaty.

It will be observed from all of these clauses that the question of sovereignty is not involved at all. We did not go to Panama to found a government nor colonize a new settlement, we went there to build a canal, and all we needed was a right of way. In the treaty with New Granada—article 35 under which we built the Panama Railroad and which is still in force—we negotiated as to a "right of way" either for a canal or railroad.

In the Hepburn Act to construct a canal, in section 2, we provided for the acquisition and perpetual control of a strip of land to construct thereon a canal. In article 2 of the treaty, Panama grants its authority for the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation, and protection of a canal. Nobody questions any sovereignty—it is not necessary. Our rights are fixed by the several treaties. We desire to operate a canal and we can do anything necessary to run a canal, but in consideration of securing that high point of vantage ground we agreed to deal fairly with people of all nations, including our own, and I object to robbing our people just as much as other Governments object to discrimination against theirs. The same gentlemen have the same trouble about battleships. That question is not in . They want to know what we will do if ever we have war with another nation and the other nation tries to run battleships through our canal. If any man imagines that we will ever allow a nation at war with us to run a battleship within 3 miles of either entrance to that canal he is certainly entitled to another thought coming to him, and he knows little about war.

The bungling provisions now in section 5 are not the result of any fault of your committee. We had a sensible and compact provision well considered and properly drawn, but in the anxiety to secure discrimination men fumbled around in a hurry in about two hours' debate and substituted the Doremus amendment, but still it does not contain the word "battleships." In order to give directions to our officials about their conduct we merely provided that uniform tolls should be collected from all vessels except the official vessels of the United States and the Republic of Panama. The words "vessels of the United States and its citizens" crept in with the Doremus amendment, I do not know whether by intent or accident, but they do not mean "battleships." The vessels of the United States mean any vessels chartered or licensed in the merchant marine. The Government of the United States as the owner of the canal can, by article 2 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, do anything that the corporation owning the Suez Canal can do with that canal.

The only difference is one is a private corporation, the other is owned by the Government of the United States. Each has a right to collect tolls and make money, and a man who has not financial sense enough to know that the right to control and collect the revenue, which forms the only strength and attraction to own business, does not know enough to come to Congress. If the private corporation controlling the Suez Canal has any property or vessels of its own, it passes them through, if necessary, without any ceremony or permission from anybody—there is nobody to ask or pay but themselves. The United States Government can do the same with its vessels and property. The reason it does not treat warships of other nations like its own is that it does not own the ships of the other nations; it does own those in its own navy, but there may be a transfer of ownership to the United States Government if ships of other nations try to fool with our canal in a hostile way. There is no danger of warships being excluded from the Suez Canal during war, because that is a private corporation and is not going to have war with any nation. It is protected in the performance of its contract by a convention of the maritime nations of the world, and they would fight anybody who would try to interfere with it or blockade it. The United States Government, as the owner, should use its own property as it pleases, if necessary to pass through the canal. It will collect tolls from all other vessels but its own which use it. If any nation goes to war with the United States, in conformity with the old maxim, "all laws are silent as to belligerents during war," and a treaty is law as well as any statutory regulation. My judgment is that if one of them is ever allowed to get within cannon shot of the canal, its ownership will be changed and it will be flying an American flag. It is no longer observing the rules of that canal, and if it does show its belligerent masthead anywhere within range, it will either go to the bottom or come in as our property. [Applause.]

There is no use in talking nonsense about these things. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], my predecessor as chairman of this committee, and the only man in this House outside of our committee who knows much about this subject, does not speak as he spoke to-day out of ignorance. By no means. He knows it, but has told more truth to-day in his speech than all the other advocates of special interests that I know of in all the nine years during which they have bombarded us with literature to take this canal over for the use of the special interests. He told you the truth about that situation down there when we made the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. He told you the truth, but he did not seem to see the effect of it.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] made the same speech two years ago, all except that part about the Democratic platform. But he was then too fresh from the wreck and the shattering of 16 years of Republican promises to be very sensitive on the subject of platform. [Laughter and applause.] In fact, the Democratic Party had not then made a platform on this particular line. In fact, subsidy is not a cardinal doctrine of the Democratic Party.

The Democratic convention was not called at Baltimore for the purpose of discrediting its party and putting blots upon its proud escutcheon as to honesty and fairness. There is not a Democrat in the United States, outside of the particular apostles of the special interests—one of whom, I suppose, is identified with the Shipping Trust and the boss gang of New York as closely as Mohammed was with the Mohammedan religion—but outside of them there was not a Democrat in this land who had a suspicion that such an effort would be made there. Gentlemen talk about that platform and say we are bound by platforms, and some here say they are sorry they can not keep one.

I want to assure you, my dear fellow Democrats, that your fears are unfounded. Men who have fought subsidies as long as you can not be charged with infidelity and need not be afraid of the sneers of men who never kept their own platform and who do not intend to observe yours. [Applause.] They never before found another sentence in the Democratic platform that they favored, and now when they have found one that they can afford to swallow you may know there is a fly in the ointment. [Applause.]

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is the only man I have heard state his propositions who is honest enough to tell the truth about it. I have seen a thousand falsehoods printed in the jingo newspapers calling the exemption a plank in the Democratic platform. The gentleman from Illinois tells the first truth about it that anybody does. He says there are two provisions in the plank. That plank started out with the old regulation creed of the Democratic Party against special interests and special privileges, and bounties and subsidies out of the Treasury, and right along after it, in the same plank, it says, in substance: "We favor swagging this much while we have a chance. It is not in the Treasury; it is on its way there, and we will fool the people and we will take that as it goes. It is true it will not help the foreign trade any, but we will get that much and thereby have an entering wedge. It has already passed the House, and if it is in the platform, then the Senate will pass it."

I have heard Senators say they would not have voted for it unless they had seen it in the platform and unless they had heard the statement made that it was the action of a Democratic House. Otherwise they would not have voted for it.

You gentlemen over there on the Republican side have fallen on each other's necks and hysterically wept with happiness because you thought there was a split in the Democratic Party. You are mistaken. You are premature in your joy. It is simply a crack in a plank—a resounding crack, to be sure. [Laughter.] And if you do not split it away and throw away the spurious part your party is bound to carry that burden and injure its reputation, which up to this time has been pure and spotless.

"Oh," you say, "other men would be discredited if you say this plank did not get into that platform honestly." I would like to have a plebescite of that convention and find out just how many Democrats knew it was in the platform. I do not know of a single mortal man outside of the fellows who said they were on that committee who knew of it. I do not doubt that there were some brilliant Democrats on that committee. Now, I have no doubt that they got somebody from Congress to write into that platform some expressions of approval of the action of a Democratic House and that this was handed in as one of those acts and allowed to go in in that way. Good men are easily fooled. Innocence is ever simple and credulous. Conscious of no guile, it suspects none in others. It wears no shield or guard before its breast. Every door and portal of the heart is thrown open, and when a man comes along dressed in the habiliments of righteousness and progressiveness, which was particularly the sesame of that convention, and gets on the platform committee and in the hour of opportunity remembers his friends who are about to receive a great bounty, and puts it in in the form of a plank at the expense of honest men who are trusting him, he helps his special interest, though he puts infamy on his party. [Applause.]

For these reasons we squarely impeached that sentence in the platform, and the President, who is the authorized head of the party and the only arbiter of disputes as to party doctrines, decided in our favor that it was no violation of the platform to vote against ship subsidy in favor of domestic honesty and international fidelity and honor. No Democrat any longer has an excuse to shield himself behind the platform. Those Republicans who imagined they heard a crack in the Democratic Party were mistaken; it was only a crack in an unsound part of the platform, and it was not a plank, but a crack in the plank and they will hear the crack of doom before they ever hear a crack in the Democratic Party.

It is remarkable, if not amusing, what a frenzy of excitement gentlemen can work themselves up into over so vile a cause. When they go to talking about honor it ought to be based on a worthier pretext than their right to rob the people of a part of the money from the Treasury to give to an already highly protected selfish interest. They talk so big about going to war. I not only would not fight England and the world for the right to discriminate against my own people and their Treasury, to give their money wrongfully to a small number enjoying a special interest, but I would not even vote to perpetrate such a domestic infamy on my own people if all the balance of the world demanded it and threatened to go to war and compel us to do it. In that case we would have something to fight for, and I would fight the world, the flesh, and the devil rather than ever vote to violate my oath and the commandment against stealing and a treaty with all the world in order to rob the Treasury for a favored few. If I got whipped, the victory would not be permanent. When the people learned their rights and how they had been injured, the battle would be renewed in behalf of truth and honesty and would finally win.

I tell you the great chairman of that platform committee was watching the wrong man. They thought he was defending the people against Tammany and Wall Street, but he was letting a worse man into the Treasury. [Applause.] Let me tell you about this subsidy. They say, "It is so easy and nice." It is a great deal meaner than the protective tariff that you have been fighting so long. That is merely a condition of business. Under that they put a tax on goods that come into our ports from abroad. It is unfair business, and we have fought it for that reason. But here is a case where the money is already available. The ship is there. The money is in its strong box. It ought to be put right into the Treasury. "But," they say, "it is so easy to divert it and rob the people of it, and let the Treasury pay that instead of that ship. It is so handy. Let us do just that, and the people will not know it."

Why, under ancient law, when clothes had to be hung out to dry on wash days and could not be locked up, it was a much more heinous offense to steal those clothes than it was to steal clothes that were locked up and put away. I want gentlemen to understand that when the people find out this situation, find out the wrong put upon them, they will visit condign punishment on the people who have taken advantage of them to take their money because they could, because it was easy, because it was on its way into the Treasury. But I will tell you where these gentlemen make their mistake. The act which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] told you about this morning authorized us to go and buy a right of way; not to acquire dominion over anybody's country, not to colonize a new region or build a new government, but to operate a new facility of commerce to cut off 8,000 miles of distance, and nothing else. As he tells you, we voted in that act to authorize the purchase and to allow the country through which it ran the beneficial use of that canal—a differential use. He used that for a different purpose, but it is illogical. The same thing is in the arrangement with Suez—that the company could treat with the country through which it ran and pay them in any way agreeable for the use of the right of way.

Under article 19 of the Panama treaty the same concession is made to Panama that was made by the Suez company to the Khedive of Egypt. The concession to Panama was authorized by section 6 of the act to construct a canal. This arrangement is substantially the same made by the owners of the Suez Canal with the country through which it passed. The concessions are considered in lieu of tolls and as in settlement of tolls, and intended and accepted as consideration for the concessions granted by the Khedive.

The reciprocal arrangements in the treaty with New Granada were afterwards availed of in perfect harmony with the Clayton-Bulwer treaty when the Panama Railroad was commenced about the time the Suez Canal Co. was organized. The Clayton-Bulwer treaty, made in 1850, contemplated three possible routes, either canals or railroads. The Panama Railroad Co. has through all its history observed perfect equality toward the citizens, vessels, and Governments of all nations, except the Government through whose country it ran. As Panama and Egypt exercised dominion over the entire region, they had a right either to build a canal through the territory or contract with other people to do it, and there can be no rational objection to it and never has been. The Tehuantepec Railroad was not built in conformity with that Clayton-Bulwer treaty, because it was built by Mexico in her own territory. She offered advantageous terms to the United States Government, but they were not accepted. If they had been accepted that road would have been subject to the terms of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. The same provision was in the treaty with Colombia that the Speaker told you so graphically about our violating; but he did not tell you that England, whom he hated so much, was standing there with France and Germany holding the clothes while the great author of the new party raped Colombia and destroyed her sovereignty over that territory that we had pledged to protect. [Applause.] He did not tell you that they were as quick to recognize the independence of the Republic that we created as we were. They stood by us, and they expected us to be fair when they stood by us. It is the same provision that was in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. It is in the same provision that was made when we built the Panama railroad, and we have religiously kept the faith, first with New Granada, second with Colombia, and last with the Republic of Panama until the United States bought it. It is nonsense to talk about discrimination in favor of a Republic whose land the right of way runs through.

The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] read to you the conveyance of that country to our country of that right of way. He was not candid enough to read to you the other part—that it was conveyed to you, subject to the treaty with England, to give fair and equal treatment. Neither was he candid enough to read to you the second article of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, in which it was declared that although you may acquire sovereignty down there, you have still got to live up to this treaty.

Now, gentlemen, there are just those two canals and that one railroad, and they are all built under the same provisions. They are not in a domestic country.

Get two things into your head, and you can verify them if you will look to the authorities. The question of sovereignty is in no wise involved. Neither is there a word of truth in the statement that we are foreclosing any rights under the treaty. The act as reported by our committee did not contain a word of foreclosure, neither does existing law nor the pending bill. The only effort to make a declaration to foreclose was made by the friends of the Shipping Trust in trying to secure an advantage by declaring for free tolls. It is true that our committee never before had to ask for a rule; neither did our committee ever before have to assail the impregnable position of a vested private interest which had already secured this ungodly graft. We had to ask for a rule because after two weeks of effort we found it impossible to procure an agreement to expedite the consideration of this bill, the most important one since the infamy was enacted.

Why do the opposition pretend to hate Canada and England so, when only a few years ago they slopped all over Canadian reciprocity, and held an extra session of Congress here in a vain effort to secure it?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote.

Mr. DEITRICK. Mr. Speaker, the rule under which the Panama toll question is being considered is chiefly objectionable because it unreasonably cuts off amendments to the bill. Only one motion is allowed, and that being a motion to recommit the bill with instructions to the committee. Some of the instructions submitted in such a motion might be wise and some unwise. We will therefore have to vote for them as a whole or against them entirely. At least each dissenting member of the committee reporting a bill should always have the right to propose one amendment, with a reasonable amount of debate on it. The rule is also objectionable because it does not provide that each Member of Congress who wishes to speak on the bill be accorded that privilege for not less than 10 minutes. The course laid down by the rule is unjust to the membership of this House and should not be tolerated. It was therefore a pleasure to me to vote against such a rule.

Standing by itself there may be two sides to the question of granting American coastwise vessels free passage through the Panama Canal. For my own part, I can see no substantial difference between allowing steamboats to pass through the United States Government locks on the Ohio River free of charge in direct competition with railroads on either bank of the river and permittting American coastwise vessels to pass through the Panama Canal free of charge. No one complains in the case of the Ohio River locks, and it is difficult to seriously consider complaints against the free passsage of American coastwise ships where they pass through the canal. Ships passing through the Panama Canal are just as much engaged in interstate commerce as those passing through the Ohio River locks. Numerous other cases of locks, canals, and water passages along our rivers or coast where no tolls are charged could be given. One might argue that if free tolls for American coastwise ships at Panama is a subsidy, then practically every expenditure of money by the United States Government which directly or indirectly helps some person, firm, or selected district or territory more than another is a subsidy. Few persons would carry the subsidy argument this far, yet to be logical they should do so.

It has often been said that the Democratic platform declares against the granting of subsidies. It does, but in the next paragraph of the platform a clear and distinct exception is declared to this general rule against subsidies in the following words:

> We favor the exemption from tolls of American ships engaged in coastwise trade passing through the Panama Canal. We also favor legislation forbidding the use of the Panama Canal by ships owned by, or controlled by, railroad carriers engaged in transportation competitive with the canal.

Under our party form of government one of the chief factors in determining how a citizen will vote on election day is the platform on which the candidate stands. The platform is a promise and should not be broken except in extreme cases, and then only for weighty reasons, which the voters would unquestionably approve.

I have listened, read, and searched, and have been unable to find a single reason that would justify my breaking this platform promise. To say that we have broken our treaty with England or any other nation is begging the question.

The judgment of hundreds of our well-informed lawyers, statesmen, and others, such as ex-Secretary of State Olney, is to the effect that this Government has a perfect right under our treaties to exempt our coastwise vessels from tolls, if we so desire. The British Government has shown poor taste, indeed, in interfering in this question, which is merely one of our own internal affairs; and we may ask ourselves if it is wise to mix a purely local economic question with our foreign policy.

Our own transcontinental railroads are interested parties who have profited by different land and money grants of this Government, and some of their owners have accumulated fortunes out of them exceeding $100,000,000. Little weight can be given to their arguments.

Without attempting to set forth all the points raised on either side of this question, it may be properly urged that the burden of proof is on those advocating repeal of the present law. They have brought forth no new or convincing reasons in support of their contentions. I therefore gladly take my position with the present law passed by the Sixty-second Congress, with the Democratic platform and the Progressive platform, in favor of free tolls to our coastwise ships passing through the Panama Canal.

[Mr. PATTEN of New York addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. O'LEARY. Mr. Speaker, this is no question of mere political or diplomatic expediency. It is vital and goes directly to the control, the sovereign right, of this country in its own possessions. The President's message is merely his opinion, and in the absence of any explanation or of any reason given for the repeal of the coastwise trade exemption clause, in my opinion, it is an absolute violation of the party promise as expressed in its national platform and an absolute surrender of our right to control the destiny of the canal, upon the mere blustering, hypocritical demand of a foreign power which neither aided in its construction nor desired it, and which, being forced to witness this great triumph of American engineering skill, wrought at the sole cost of this great Republic in lives and in treasure, now desires to deprive American trade and the American people of its benefits, so far as possible, and to place the great transcontinental railways, whose stock it largely holds, without expense, upon the same plane as American shippers. Ever the same thrifty nation it has always been through all the centuries, acquiring profit at some one else's expense.

It is claimed that the national honor is at stake, and I grant that it is, but not along the lines laid down by the most vociferous shouters for the national honor. Indeed, just the opposite, for the national honor can only be degraded by a surrender of American rights, and not by a manly adherence to the principles and policies which have, up to this time, governed this Nation in her dealings with foreign nations not to permit any meddling with purely domestic affairs.

No one seriously contends now that the exemption of American coastwise trade from tolls is a violation of any treaty rights.

By article 1 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty of 1901 the Clayton-Bulwer treaty of 1850 was expressly, wholly superseded and entirely abrogated. The conditions that surrounded the country, through which the canal was afterwards constructed, entered into the making of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

A canal was to be constructed, then, if at all, through the lands of a foreign government, the Republic of Colombia, subject to the provisions of the treaty of 1901, and such treaty as might be negotiated with Colombia.

The latter negotiations fell through, and in 1903 a successful revolution placed the Republic of Panama, recognized by all nations, in control of the territory required; and by treaty with Panama, in 1903, the United States arranged for the construction of a canal through a belt of land granted by the Republic of Panama, a recognized nation, in perpetuity to the United States, as much the private property of the United States as the District of Columbia or any other Federal territory. The conditions that existed in 1901, and in the light of which the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was entered into, had wholly changed, and that treaty in no wise applies. The Clayton-Bulwer treaty applied only to the building of a canal in Nicaragua and was abrogated by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, and the latter applied only to conditions existing in 1901 and the building of a canal through the territory of the Republic of Colombia, and had no force when conditions changed and a canal was actually built through lands of the United States, granted to it by the Republic of Panama.

The United States and Great Britain differ as to the effect of this treaty. This country has had a habit of differing from foreign countries as to the policy it shall pursue. We need never look for the approbation of foreign countries for any American policy, and we can not afford to pursue any other. If my country was wrong in the policy she was pursuing, I should still vote to sustain her; but when, as in this instance, in my opinion, the policy pursued heretofore, and set forth in the party platform is right, honest, and just to the American people, I must cast my vote to sustain it.

I am not aiding in legislating in the interest or favor of any country other than the United States and am not interested in the contention from their standpoint.

The most that can be said from the standpoint of the foreign countries in the past is that their interests have never been ours, and in the present instance the contention made is shady and hypocritical, entirely for the advantage to the nation who did least to bring this great engineering feat to a triumphal, successful completion.

[Mr. NORTON addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Speaker, it was my opinion when this controversy over tolls in the Panama Canal began that one side had all the facts and sound arguments and the other side all the spectacular features—the twisting of the lion's tail, the eagle screaming, and the flag waving. I was amused at the cleverness of the tail twisters and frequently applauded them, but saw little in their arguments to convince any thinking man of the merits of their side. As a strong believer in the idea that canals and waterways improvements generally should support themselves without constant subsidy from the taxpayers, I was for tolls—at Panama and elsewhere. I paid little attention to the international phase of the question, because it seemed to me unimportant whether the treaties under which we obtained the right to build the canal as a project of the United States Government gave us the right to exempt our ships in the coastwise traffic from tolls or not, so long as there appeared, in my opinion, no sound reason for exempting them. That we could do nothing toward building up a merchant marine by exempting coasting vessels seemed entirely clear, because by law American ships have an entire monopoly of the coastwise trade.

The only matter about which I had any doubt was the President's request for repeal as an aid to his foreign policy. We have been able to find out little about the President's foreign policy, except in so far as it relates to Mexico, and I most emphatically disapprove the policy of allowing American citizens in Mexico to be killed and their property destroyed without effective protest. I believe that marines could have been landed in Mexico long ago, without war, to protect American citizens. Other Presidents have taken this means of protecting our citizens during numerous revolutions in Central America, and President Wilson could have done the same in Mexico.

American citizens by the score, including women and children, have lost their lives in Mexico and nothing was done, but when a prominent Englishman was killed the Department of State suddenly awoke from its dreams of universal peace, and something at least resembling pressure was brought to compel the bandit chieftains, with whom Secretary Bryan has so openly sided, to give up the Englishman's body and punish the offenders. Apparently the pressure did not go far enough to accomplish anything of consequence, but very soon afterwards came the demand for the repeal of the exemption from tolls in the Panama Canal act in aid of our foreign policy.

I was very reluctant to cast a vote that could be construed as an indorsement of such a policy under pressure from England, but in spite of my reluctance I should still have been willing to vote for the repeal bill if it had stopped with the first section, merely repealing the exemption clause of the act of August 24, 1912, and leaving untouched the section authorizing the President to discriminate in favor of our own shipping if he saw fit to do so. The bill, I am informed, was so drawn at first, but failed to meet the President's approval, and the second section was added. That section gives at least some color to the statement that we are surrendering our rights at the demand of England.

We built the canal at a cost of $400,000,000, and the natural assumption is that we can do with it what we please, unless distinctly prohibited by the treaties with Great Britain under which we obtained the right to build it. Now, Mr. Speaker, I believe that Senator ELIHU ROOT is the ablest man in public life to-day, and I concede that he and others who contend that the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was intended to prohibit discrimination have rather the better case; but the arguments of their opponents, who maintain that the words "all nations observing these rules" do not include the United States, which built the canal and promulgated the rules for its use, are strong and are supported by many men of great ability and high character. There are distinctly two sides to the controversy over the treaty, and, in my opinion, we should not surrender the American side without protest.

If the Democratic majority of this House would permit an amendment to this bill asserting that in repealing the exemption of American coastwise shipping from the payment of tolls we do not concede that we have no right to discriminate in favor of our own ships in our own canal, or if an amendment were permitted for the submission of the whole matter of our treaty rights to arbitration, I should vote for the bill. Since a gag rule has been forced upon us preventing amendment, I see nothing to do but to vote against it, in spite of my belief that as an economic policy the exemption was unwise.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. Speaker, a little less than two years ago the Panama Act of August 24, 1912, became a law. I was an attentive student of this great question during that memorable debate and have now given it close attention. In vain have I searched for the new light that prompted the dogmatic decision of the President that the exemption from tolls of our vessels engaged in coastwise trade—is in plain contravention of the treaty with Great Britain concluded November 18, 1901.

It is remarkable that some of the most able, illuminating, and convincing arguments, upon its former consideration, were made in support by distinguished gentlemen on the other side who now silently and mutually reverse their attitude and in a meek, piping voice will answer yea upon roll call. Why are they silent? Why do they not take the House into their confidence? Why do they not explain wherein their former arguments were fallacious and unsound? Why deprive the House of this new effulgence that has so suddenly burst upon them? Are these gentlemen obsessed too, like the gentleman from Tennessee, with the delusion that the President is infallible?

No one can entertain a higher estimation of the exalted office of President than do I. I doubt if any other magistrate, or ruler, or King, or Emperor in the world is called upon constantly to perform more arduous, exacting, and important duties. His personal and direct participation in public affairs as the leader of the dominant party and as President of a mighty Republic commands the honor and respect of every citizen.

No administration ever entered upon its mission with a more sympathetic and kindlier disposition toward it on the part of the people than did President Wilson's. The people throughout the country were determined to give the régime "of the new freedom" a full and fair opportunity to make good; and they have patiently abstained from criticism of the minor and even larger defects of his administration. But it must not be forgotten that the vast power he wields and the rich favors he is able to bestow, unfortunately, attract a troop of fawning and flattering courtiers, who laud his virtues and approve his views. It may be truly said that—

> Being once perfected how to grant suits,
> How to deny them, whom t' advance, and whom
> To trash for over-topping; having both the key
> Of officer and office, set all hearts i' the State
> To what tune pleased his ear.

Congress has willingly rendered such ready and implicit obedience to all his mandates that he no longer sought counsel with the leaders of his party or remembered the pledges personally made in his addresses or those contained in the platform of his party. On the subject of Panama tolls the Democratic convention at Baltimore made this solemn pledge:

We favor the exemption from tolls of American ships engaged in coastwise trade passing through the Panama Canal. We also favor legislation forbidding the use of the Panama Canal by ships owned or controlled by railroad carriers engaged in transportation competitive with the canal.

On August 5, 1912, Candidate Wilson, in approving this plank of his party platform, at Washington Park, N. J., said:

One of the great objects in cutting that great ditch across the Isthmus of Panama is to allow farmers who are near the Atlantic to ship to the Pacific by way of the Atlantic ports.

Now, at the present time there are no ships to do that, and one of the bills pending—passed, I believe, yesterday by the Senate as it had passed the House—provides for free tolls for American ships through that canal, and prohibits any ship from passing through which is owned by any American railroad company.

You see the object of that, don't you? We don't want the railroads to compete with themselves, because we understand that kind of competition. We want water carriage to compete with land carriage, so as to be perfectly sure that you are going to get better rates around the canal than you would across the continent.

Our platform is not molasses to catch flies. It means business. It means what it says. It is the utterance of earnest and honest men, who intend to do business along those lines and who are not waiting to see if they can catch votes with those promises before they determine whether they are going to act upon them or not.

On the binding obligation of party declaration I quote from the distinguished three-ply Democratic candidate for President, and the present most disappointing Secretary of State, William Jennings Bryan, who, in a speech before the House of Representatives of Pennsylvania at Harrisburg, Pa., May 13, 1913, said:

I lay it down as a proposition, and I am prepared to defend it anywhere, that the representative who secures office upon a platform and then holds the office and betrays the people who elect him is a criminal worse than the man who embezzled money intrusted to him.

In the face of these positive pledges, when scarcely a year has passed since he was inaugurated, the President, with the approving smiles and zealous applause of the Secretary of State, delivered in person this brief but startling edict to the Congress:

Gentlemen of the Congress, I have come to you upon an errand which can be very briefly performed, but I beg that you will not measure its importance by the number of sentences in which I state it. No communication I have addressed to the Congress carried with it graver or more far-reaching implications to the interest of the country, and I come now to speak upon a matter with regard to which I am charged in a peculiar degree, by the Constitution itself, with personal responsibility.

I have come to ask for the repeal of that provision of the Panama Canal act of August 24, 1912, which exempts vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States from the payment of tolls and to urge upon you the justice, the wisdom, and the large policy of such a repeal with the utmost earnestness of which I am capable.

In my own judgment, very fully considered and maturely formed, that exemption constitutes a mistaken economic policy from every point of view, and is, moreover, in plain contravention of the treaty with Great Britain concerning the canal, concluded on November 18, 1901. But I have not come to you to urge my personal views. I have come to state to you a fact and a situation. Whatever may be our own differences of opinion concerning this much-debated measure, its meaning is not debated outside the United States. Everywhere else the language of the treaty is given but one interpretation, and that interpretation precludes the exemption I am asking you to repeal. We consented to the treaty; its language we accepted, if we did not originate it; and we are too big, too powerful, too self-respecting a nation to interpret with too strained or refined a reading the words of our own promises just because we have power enough to give us leave to read them as we please. The large thing to do is the only thing we can afford to do, a voluntary withdrawal from a position everywhere questioned and misunderstood. We ought to reverse our action without raising the question whether we were right or wrong, and so once more deserve our reputation for generosity and the redemption of every obligation without quibble or hesitation.

I ask this of you in support of the foreign policy of the administration. I shall not know how to deal with other matters of even greater delicacy and nearer consequence if you do not grant it to me in ungrudging measure.

This brief dictatorial command, with its mysterious hints and "implications" or "greater delicacy and nearer consequence," unless his demand is "granted in ungrudging measure," has stirred the Nation from center to circumference. The address takes on an added significance, since, in December last, the President, in pursuance of his constitutional duty, happily advised the Congress that—

There is but one cloud upon our horizon. That has shown itself to the south of us, and hangs over Mexico.

What has happened since to call forth this ominous message? From whence comes the gathering clouds now discerned by the President athwart our foreign horizon? Is it small wonder that, as now presented, the economic side of the question is of small consequence and is given but scant consideration, and that the earnest attention of the people now turns to the more vital inquiry as to the causes that have prompted this humiliating sacrifice and backdown from a position unitedly taken by all national parties. Is the brilliant achievement of American diplomacy to come to naught? Do we not have sovereignty over our own territory and the wonderful achievement on it of American genius and American treasure? It is in vain in this crisis for gentlemen to debate its economic features. The economic question is no longer before Congress. The people will not be diverted from the paramount issue by noisy declamation by some gentlemen against Ship Trusts and ship subsidies, and by others against the unconscionable plots against the people of greedy transcontinental railroads. The question now uppermost in their minds is: "American rights against foreign pretense and aggression." The question rests solely upon the construction of the treaty between United States and Great Britain.

The President, with the utmost earnestness of which he is capable, in this address urges us to make an abject and humiliating relinquishment of acknowledged and inherent rights. When did the President attain such eminence in international law that he can flippantly overrule the great weight of legal authority in favor of the policy already adopted by the United States? President Roosevelt, under whose administration the treaty was consummated, does not agree with him; President Taft, learned in the law and everywhere recognized as splendidly equipped and worthy to occupy the highest place on the Supreme Bench, does not agree with him; the House and Senate in 1912, free from Executive pressure and deciding the question upon the law and testimony, have disagreed with him. The Supreme Court, in the case of Olsen v. Smith, laid down the rule in indisputable language that our coastwise traffic is exclusively within our own regulations and not subject to the provisions of general treaties relating to foreign commerce. A strong array of distinguished American and foreign jurists have demonstrated by irresistible arguments that by the logic of the situation and by all the rules of legal interpretation, and in justice and fair dealing, in enacting the Panama Canal act of 1912 we are clearly within our treaty rights. Who are the President's advisors? Who are the authorities on international law upon whom he relies? He tells us that outside of the United States "the question is not debated," that everywhere else the treaty "is given but one interpretation, which precludes the exemption," for the repeal of which he asks.

Does anyone expect that the great maritime power of the world, the mistress of the seas, would not seek every advantage in the game of diplomacy? Would other nations not likewise favor an interpretation favorable to themselves and against us? Since when did nations in their diplomatic relations cease to favor, however skillfully veiled in the profusion of words, their own interests? Centuries of experience and always a fixed and permanent foreign policy has given England first rank in the art of diplomacy. She challenges the admiration of the world in the aggressiveness and fidelity with which she defends and extends her interests. She is past master in the diplomatic game of bluff. But her present attempt, however, to assume joint sovereignty with us over the canal is such an unjustifiable and palpable fraud that the American people will not tamely and supinely acquiesce and abet such a triumph over our impractical and complacent administration.

We have heard a great deal about our obligations under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty of April 19, 1850, and the Hay-Pauncefote treaty of November 19, 1901, and, at the risk of incurring the criticism of the lawyers of the House, who, though often hopelessly at sea themselves in construing the law, strenuously resent a layman's intrusion upon their prerogatives, I shall try to point out some plain facts set forth in these treaties.

In the first place, the Clayton-Bulwer treaty in its preamble refers particularly and exclusively to a ship canal to be "constructed between the Atlantic and the Pacific Oceans by the way of River San Juan de Nicaragua and either or both of the Lakes of Nicaragua or Managua to any port or place on the Pacific Ocean." You will note that no other territory nor any other enterprise was included within its provisions. At that time it seems that, despite the Monroe doctrine, England, with her well-known earth hunger, had under one pretext or another extended her possession and laid claim to portions of Honduras and along the Mosquito Coast, by which she controlled the mouth of the River San Juan de Nicaragua. The control and use of this river became necessary to further the ship canal then under contemplation by American financiers. To secure this the treaty was negotiated, and in express terms applied only to an oceanic canal through the territory defined therein, save only the expressions used in article 8.

Article 1 of the treaty again explicitly restricts the contract to that particular canal before mentioned, and declares that "the Governments of the United States and Great Britain hereby declare that neither the one nor the other will ever obtain or maintain for itself any exclusive control over the said ship canal"—that is, the same ship canal referred to in the preamble—"by the way of River San Juan de Nicaragua, and either or both of the Lakes of Nicaragua or Managua, to any port or place on the Pacific Ocean." There is not a line in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty that extends or applies to a canal between the Atlantic and Pacific outside or beyond the countries named therein. You can not read into the treaty any such meaning. Indeed, immediately after the conclusion of the treaty the United States, with the illustrious Daniel Webster as Secretary of State, entered into negotiations with Mexico for rights of way across Tehuantepec similar to those now held across the Canal Zone. The treaty then was fresh from minds who understood its meaning and intent. England at that time raised no question as to our right to engage in such enterprise. It is true that, through her diplomatic representatives, she succeeded in circumventing us, but her efforts in this direction were not in any sense based on any alleged treaty rights. Undoubtedly had our Government at that time acquired the rights we now possess over Panama, there would have been and could have been no valid objection from any provision in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty raised to our building the canal. Undoubtedly we had just as much right to construct the Panama Canal as had the French company under Count De Lesseps, so far as any restrictions of the treaty were concerned.

It is contended that we are prevented by article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty from engaging in the building of a ship canal at any other place without the consent of Great Britain. What language can be found in the treaty to even remotely sustain such a position? The main object of the treaty was to facilitate and encourage the construction of a particular canal then being promoted by private American financiers over the route therein mentioned. The project failed, and with its failure the treaty became obsolete. Much stress is laid upon the provision in article 8 which reads:

The Governments of the United States and Great Britain having not only desired in entering into this convention to accomplish a particular object, but also to establish a general principle—

And so forth.

But article 8 must be read together with article 5, in which the "general principle" of article 8 is clearly stated. Article 5 of the treaty reads:

The contracting parties further engage that when the said canal shall have been completed they will protect it from interruption, seizure, or unjust confiscation; and that they will guarantee the neutrality thereof, so that the said canal may forever be open and free, and the capital invested therein secure. Nevertheless the Governments of the United States and Great Britain, in according their protection to the construction of said canal and guaranteeing its neutrality and security when completed, always understand that this protection and guarantee are granted conditionally, and may be withdrawn by both Governments or either Government if both Governments or either Government should deem that the persons or company undertaking or managing the same adopt or establish such regulations concerning the traffic thereupon as are contrary to the spirit and intention of this convention, either by making unfair discriminations in favor of the commerce of one of the contracting parties over the commerce of the other or by imposing oppressive exactions or unreasonable tolls upon the passengers, vessels, goods, wares, merchandise, or other articles. Neither party, however, shall withdraw the aforesaid protection and guarantee without first giving six months' notice to the other.

This article binds the United States and Great Britain to protect the canal upon the express condition that equality of treatment shall be extended to both of them, but neither Government, by this article, is given or asserts any right to demand anything from the persons or company undertaking to build the canal. The company which may build the canal is acknowledged under this article to have exclusive power to adopt or establish such regulations as it pleases. But unless the regulations adopted by the owning company concerning traffic are just and equal, either one or both Governments had their remedy in withdrawing from the guaranty of protection.

The principle laid down and clearly established in this article is that protection is the price paid for equal treatment. Simply this and nothing more. Protection and equality of treatment stand in the relation of cause and effect.

Article 8 simply reaffirms the same principle, regardless of whether the canal is built along the specific route mentioned in the treaty or by way of Tehuantepec or Panama. You can not find a single sentence in the treaty that gives any right at all to either our Government or Great Britain except on the basis and principle of guaranteed protection. This is the crucial principle of the text of the treaty from the first word in it to the end.

Neither in the debates nor by personal investigation of the question has it been made clear to my mind the reason or necessity of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty as a preliminary step to enable us to proceed with the building of the canal at Panama. Had our eyes not been turned to the Nicaraguan route at the time, but instead we had acquired and possessed the present Canal Zone, I am satisfied the Hay-Pauncefote treaty would never have been concluded.

Let us now consider for a moment the Hay-Pauncefote treaty and its connection, if any, with the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, which it superseded. The first Hay-Pauncefote treaty submitted to the Senate, in article 2, reads:

The high contracting parties, desiring to preserve and maintain the "general principle" of neutralization established in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer convention, which convention is hereby superseded, adopt, as the basis of such neutralization, the following rules, substantially as embodied in the conventions between Great Britain and certain other powers, signed at Constantinople October 29, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Maritime Canal.

This, then, embodied the general principle of article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, providing for joint protection therefor. Article 3 of this treaty contains a joint invitation to other nations to come in and adhere to it, as follows:

The high contracting parties will, immediately upon the exchange of the ratifications of this convention, bring it to the notice of the other powers and invite them to adhere to it.

It will be noticed that in both article 2 and article 3 the United States and Great Britain are designated as the high contracting parties who jointly adopted rules for the regulation of the canal and jointly were to bring the same to the notice of the other powers and invite them to adhere to it. The adoption jointly obviously carried with it the obligation jointly to enforce them; that is, England and the United States were jointly obligated to protect it and accordingly were to be entitled to equality of treatment.

When this treaty was submitted to the Senate serious objection was raised in the Senate, and it failed of ratification. Great Britain was balked in her attempt to fasten her policy upon the United States. Defeated in her effort to acquire rights and powers to which she could assert no valid claim, fully knowing how slender a thread she had on which to hang any pretense of right concerning the building by us of a ship canal at Panama, England very adroitly, with a feint of great magnanimity, yielded everything except a color of right to be consulted.

Now, compare article 2 in the first draft of the treaty with article 3, which it became of the treaty as ratified. All semblance of joint action, joint protection, and the resulting joint equality of treatment has been wholly and absolutely eliminated. The United States now stands as the sole actor, sole protector, and of necessity the sole beneficiary of all rights predicated on that protection. Is there no meaning in the elimination of Great Britain as one of the high contracting parties to formulate and adopt such rules and regulations for the operation of the canal and in our declining to invite foreign powers into its affairs? Could anything more clearly establish the fact that the Senate held firmly to the position that the United States would own, build, regulate, and control and defend the canal without calling upon the other powers; that the United States would exercise the exclusive right to adopt rules of traffic on terms of entire equality to all other nations; and that, in substance and effect, the United States, the sovereign owner and proprietor of the canal, would prescribe the rules governing its use by other powers?

What is England's position to-day? She disclaims any obligation to aid in protecting the canal, which was the only and sole condition either in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty or the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty on which equality was predicated. What has she given in return for her unwarranted and audacious demands? She never possessed any rights over Panama to yield to us. She assumes no obligation of protector. On what grounds, then, is England's demand based. She herself repudiates the only "general principle" running through all the treaties—that equality of treatment can only be secured by a guaranty of protection. Without the expenditure of one dollar of treasure, having no territorial rights along the Canal Zone, repudiating the responsibility of joint protection, she has the arrogance to now come forward and by the terms of an obsolete treaty assert, in effect, joint sovereignty with us over our canal. Could brazen effrontery go further? And the most lamentable thing of all is that our own President, obsequious to the good opinion of the foreign powers, is urging us, right or wrong, to yield to such baseless and preposterous demands.

England's foreign policy is permanent and fixed and always in the hands of trained and astute diplomats. She abides her time until the fateful moment arrives to press her demands. She understands full well that the volatility of Republics is likely to bring into power for a brief interim a weak and yielding administration. Evidently England is impressed that now is the appointed time and a most favorable opportunity to gain the tremendous triumph she seeks.

In 1912 I voted in favor of the exemption clause in the present Panama act. I have discovered no reason to cause me to change. I confess that on purely economic grounds the question is not wholly one-sided. If this bill merely involved the question of tolls or no tolls, it would be comparatively unimportant, as then experience would point the way if further legislation were necessary. I take the view that one of the purposes of the canal is to facilitate and develop our commerce. I regard it as an extension of our system of river and harbor improvements. We have expended for rivers and harbors a far greater sum than the tremendous outlay upon the Panama Canal. We are continuing to spend annually millions of dollars on rivers and harbors as a national policy for internal improvement. A formidable combination is now industriously forming with an ambitious program and the attractive battle cry "from the Lakes to the Gulf." Every gentleman who is so strenuously advocating this Lakes to the Gulf scheme would vigorously and indignantly resent the intimation that its free use would constitute a subsidy to the vessels that carry the commerce for which it is to be constructed. Do these conscientious gentlemen, who so stoutly inveigh against ship subsidies and insist that the free use of the Panama Canal to this Nation's coastwise commerce is a subsidy, ever refuse to vote for the largest appropriation possible to obtain to dredge out some creek or waterway in their own districts? We built the Panama Canal primarily to bring our Atlantic and Pacific coasts into closer water communication for national defense; and, secondly, to promote our foreign and domestic commerce; and, thirdly, because manifestly this stupendous task rightly and properly devolved upon the United States.

England, to her credit, gave her cordial approval to our program, although we did not require it to build the Panama Canal. I maintain that the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was concluded upon the theory that the Nicaraguan route would be chosen; but, at any rate, she was most desirous to facilitate its construction, for the reason that she will be its greatest beneficiary.

It is true that we are approaching the centenary of peace between England and this country—I hope for an everlasting peace between us. One in language, in principles of law and ideas of freedom, coming events will cement our friendship. I do not berate England. She is looking after the interests of our nearest neighbor—Canada. Had it not been for the hot-footed journey of Sir Robert L. Borden, Premier of Canada, in June, 1912, and the inauguration of a pro-English propaganda at home, it is doubtful if England would have had the temerity to issue on any such unsubstantial grounds any protest against our policy. But finding powerful interests here hostile to the legislation, true to her traditions she seized upon the opportunity to strengthen and advance her commerce. When she finds that we know our rights and dare to maintain them she will respect us all the more for it.

Why should Great Britain or Canada seek to meddle in our coastwise trade? Neither Great Britain or Canada or any other nation can load or discharge a single cargo in our coastwise trade. If Canada imagines that her interests are in any way adversely affected by free tolls, we can at our leisure take up the question of adjusting our differences by mutual concessions. Surely both Canada and Great Britain are absolutely barred by their own construction of similar language in treaties made with us and other nations from insisting upon the interpretation they now seek to establish with regard to the treaty.

We are soon to record our verdict upon this burning issue. The people are aroused, and those who are recreant to the demands of the hour will not escape the wrath to come. We are dealing with a proposition that will be noted in the annals of our time, and our children and our children's children will read in their histories of England's brilliant piece of statecraft at our expense, whereby through a bold bluff she acquired equal rights in the Panama Canal, built by us at a cost of $400,000,000, without the expenditure of one dollar or any guaranty whatever. The building of the canal will always be one of the world's wonders, and the surrender of our sovereignty over it one of our stupendous blunders and England's most brilliant triumphs.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, much of the discussion that has centered around this bill has been under three principal heads. The first has been the repudiation of the last Democratic national platform by the administration in urging the repeal of this law. The second has been with regard to the question of whether or not the Hay-Pauncefote treaty compels us in fairness and in honor to repeal the free-toll provision of the canal act; and third, the economic side of the question. This refers to the question as to whether free tolls will be of any considerable benefit to the consuming public and our industries, or whether it will only be for the benefit of the shipping interests. As to the first proposition, I do not consider it of much importance, nor do I consider it very surprising that the administration has taken the position it has, when we consider the promises heretofore made by the Democratic Party and its failure to keep them. Of course there is no dispute as to the position President Wilson took upon the free-toll proposition during the campaign for election. He was then indorsing the Baltimore platform when, in a speech during that campaign, he said:

> Our platform is not molasses to catch flies. It means business. It means what it says. It is the utterance of earnest and honest men, who intend to do business along those lines and who are not waiting to see whether they can catch votes with those promises before they determine whether they are going to act upon them or not.

We also have of record the position taken by the Secretary of State, Mr. Bryan, as to what he thinks of a party that violates its platform. He said:

> I lay it down as a proposition, and I am prepared to defend it anywhere, that the representative who secures office upon a platform and then holds the office and betrays the people who elect him, is a criminal worse than the man who embezzled money intrusted to him.

Mr. Speaker, the important question, however, for us to consider here is the treaty in question. I have no doubt of the fact that free tolls for our coastwise ships will be for the benefit of the people themselves, because of the fact that it would lower freight rates. Let us consider the treaty itself. Many great Secretaries of State, including John Hay, a Republican, and Richard Olney, a Democrat, have had much to do with the making of this treaty and its interpretation. They both said we were fully within our rights in exempting our coastwise ships from the payment of tolls. Mr. Hay was one of the parties to the treaty, representing the United States. Here is what Secretary Olney said upon the subject:

THE HAY-PAUNCEFOTE TREATY OF DECEMBER 16, 1901.

> This treaty provided that all nations should be allowed to use the canal on equal terms and conditions. The exact language of that treaty in part is as follows:
> "The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable."
> Another section, however, of this treaty is as follows:
> "It is agreed that the canal may be constructed under the auspices of the Government of the United States, either directly at its own cost or by gift or loan of money to individuals or corporations or through subscription to or purchase of stock or shares, and that, subject to the provisions of the present treaty, the said Government shall have and enjoy all the rights incident to such construction, as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal."
> The United States has gone ahead and fortified the canal and taken other means to exercise complete control over it. Those who have favored excepting American coastwise vessels from paying tolls claim that that provision in the treaty providing that all nations shall be treated on terms of equality does not include the United States, for the reason that the United States owns and is furnishing the money and doing the work of building the canal. The Hay-Pauncefote treaty was entered into to take the place of what was known as the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, which was conceived to form an obstacle to the United States building the canal, in that it provided in part that the United States and Great Britain should exercise equal rights to the use and management of the canal, and that it should be open also on equal terms to all other nations. This would have prevented our country from occupying or fortifying the canal to the exclusion of Great Britain. The United States was not willing to spend the necessary money in the enterprise with that treaty in existence. Therefore the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was entered into to supersede the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. With reference to this question, Secretary Hay, on January 15, 1904, said:
> "The Clayton-Bulwer treaty was conceived to form an obstacle and the British Government therefore agreed to abrogate it, the United States only promising in return to protect the canal and keep it open on equal terms to all nations in accordance with our traditional policy."

The man who did more to build the canal than any other was Theodore Roosevelt. As late as January 18, 1913, he said:

> I believe that the position of the United States is proper as regards this coastwise traffic. I think we have the right to free, bona fide coastwise traffic from tolls. I think that this does not interfere with the rights of any other nation, because no ships but our own can engage in coastwise traffic, so that there is no discrimination against other ships when we relieve the coastwise traffic from tolls. I believe that the only damage that would be done is the damage to the Canadian Pacific Railway. Moreover, I do not think that it sits well on the representatives of any foreign nation, even upon those of a power with which we are, and I hope and believe will always remain, on such good terms as Great Britain, to make any plea in reference to what we do with out own coastwise traffic, because we are benefiting the whole world by our action at Panama, and are doing this where every dollar of expense is paid by ourselves. In all history I do not believe you can find another instance where as great and expensive a work as the Panama Canal, undertaken not by a private corporation but by a nation, has ever been as generously put at the service of all the nations of mankind.

Mr. Speaker, in my judgment there is nothing in the treaty contention by the present administration. As to the benefit to our country and that it is not for the benefit of any ship subsidy, I wish to call your attention to the following:

> Resolutions unanimously adopted by the National Rivers and Harbors Congress, consisting of over 1,200 delegates, representing every State in the Union.
> We submit that waterways improved or created by the Federal Government by the use of money contributed by the whole people of the United States should be free for the use of American ships in fair and open competition and on equal terms, without the payment of tolls, but we contend that a water carrier owned, controlled, or operated by a competing land carrier is unfair competition, and in order to preserve to the whole people the benefits of continued fair competition so that the beneficent influence of open waterways shall not be nullified by hostile interests, we recommend the enlargement of the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission, to the end that the commission may more effectually regulate competing land and water carriers and competing water carriers and provide for the interchange of traffic.

Much of the commerce of the great Mississippi Valley will flow down the rivers which drain it to the Gulf and thence through the canal to the Pacific coast. Likewise Pacific coast products will, under free tolls, to a large extent eventually be distributed throughout the Middle West via her waterways. The completion of the Lakes to Gulf waterway project will make it not alone possible but practicable to exchange Pacific coast lumber for Lake Superior ore without either commodity touching the floor of a freight car. Every burden placed upon traffic through the canal impairs its usefulness as a competitive route and decreases its benefits to the American people.

TOLLS A SUBSIDY TO RAILROADS.

The levying of tolls on coastwise shipping would prove a subsidy to the railroads. The toll must necessarily be charged by the carrier through the canal by adding it to the freight rate, and therefore there can be no question but what it would be in line with railroad policy to secure the highest possible tolls on coastwise traffic through the canal.

Till we secure deep waterway from St. Louis to New Orleans, which we hope will be soon, it is contemplated to operate lines of barges on the Mississippi River and its tributaries to connect with coastwise steamers at New Orleans with the opening of the canal. The lower the toll the farther into the interior of the country will the benefits resulting from low freight rates be felt.

Mr. Speaker, great stress is laid upon the preamble of the treaty and its reference to the neutralization of the canal as defined in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, which, it is claimed, compels the United States to forget that it is the owner of the canal, and, as regards its own vessels, forces it to look upon itself as a canal customer bound to pay for its use the regular tolls. It is elaborately argued that neutralization of this sort is a policy to which the United States has been committed from the earliest times.

But the argument ignores necessary distinctions and fails to note that "neutralization" of a canal describes a policy applicable as between the canal owners and customers of the canal, but in no way touches or restricts the canal owner's rights or the canal owner's policy as to the use of the canal by itself. The several phases of American opinion, official and otherwise, respecting the construction and control of the Isthmian Canal have already been pointed out. While merely in the position of a probable user of the canal, the United States always and consistently claimed that the terms and conditions of use should be the same for all comers, but in no way denied or disputed the inherent rights of the canal owner. Those rights, as already shown, are expressly recognized by the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, which allows the owner to fix terms at will for the use of the canal by States, withholding the protection to the canal given by the United States and Great Britain, and even permits the owner to deny to such States the use of the canal altogether. Since accepting its inevitable rôle of the canal builder and owner, the United States has always and consistently stood on its rights as such, and, beyond agreeing to the neutralization of the canal as between customers, has repudiated the idea of any control of the canal except its own.

How clearly such is the case is shown by the briefest examination of the neutralization provided for in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, the principle of which is not to be impaired by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. What sort of neutralization is it? First, the United States and Great Britain are to determine what are just and equitable charges for the use of the canal by their citizens or subjects; second, the canal shall be open on those same terms to citizens and subjects of other States; but, third, the citizens and subjects of other States shall have the benefit of those terms only if such other States grant the same protection to the canal as the United States and Great Britain engage to afford. Now, there is no element of this species of neutralization which the Hay-Pauncefote treaty leaves unimpaired, since the United States alone fixes reasonable and equitable rules for the canal traffic; since the canal may be used by all nations on no other condition than that they observe those rules; and since—as shown by the elimination from this treaty of article 3 of the unratified Hay-Pauncefote treaty of February, 1901—adherence to the treaty by the other powers is not to be invited. If by construing article 8 in connection with other articles of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty any controlling principle of neturalization is to be deduced, it is the simple requirement that the same terms shall be made to all customers of the canal, a requirement restricting the rights of the canal owner to just that extent and no more, and not disabling it from treating its own shipping in any way it sees fit.

This treaty—Hay-Pauncefote—that the President says is violated by the free-toll act for our own coastwise ships has been interpreted by the Supreme Court of the United States. That very question was involved in its decision in the case of Olsen v. Smith (195 U. S., 332). This decision has had the effect of fully sustaining the interpretation of the treaty by President Roosevelt, President Taft, and Secretaries of State Hay, Olney, and Knox. This decision of the highest court in the land says that the provisions of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty are not applicable to vessels in the coastwise trade.

In this case the question whether treaties with foreign countries affected our coastwise commerce was squarely before the Supreme Court of the United States and determined adversely.

In that case the duly State-licensed pilots of Galveston, Tex., brought suit for damages against certain unlicensed pilots for piloting in that port, and prayed for an injunction restraining them from operating without a license and in violation of the State laws concerning pilotage. These laws provided a rate to be paid for licensed pilotage by vessels engaged in the foreign trade, but exempted those engaged in "the coasting trade in any part of the United States." Section 1444 of the Revised Statutes of the United States also contained a provision exempting coastwise vessels from the operation of State pilotage laws.

The defendants set up several defenses, among others contending that—

> As the vessel in question was a British vessel coming from a foreign port, the State laws concerning pilotage are in conflict with a treaty between Great Britain and the United States, providing that "no higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed in any ports of the United States on British vessels than those payable in the same ports by vessels of the United States."

Ruling on this contention of the defendants that the exemption of vessels engaged in the coastwise trade was a discrimination violative of the treaty provision above set out, the Supreme Court of the United States held unequivocally that such exemption of vessels engaged in the coastwise trade did not concern vessels engaged in the foreign trade. The language of the decision is plain and emphatic as announced in the opinion rendered by then Justice, now Chief Justice, White:

> Neither the exemption of coastwise steam vessels from pilotage, resulting from the law of the United States, nor any lawful exemption of coastwise vessels created by the State law, concerns vessels in the foreign trade, and, therefore, any such exemptions do not operate to produce a discrimination against British vessels engaged in foreign trade and in favor of vessels of the United States in such trade.

The syllabus statement of the rule thus announced by the Supreme Court is as follows:

> A State pilotage law subjecting all vessels, domestic and foreign, engaged in foreign trade to pilotage regulations, but which exempts pursuant to law coastwise steam vessels of the United States, is not in conflict with provisions in the treaty between the United States and Great Britain to the effect that British vessels shall not be subject to any higher or other charges than vessels of the United States.

The ground upon which that decision rests is plain to see. It is simply that it is no concern of vessels engaged in the foreign trade what provisions or exemptions are made regarding the coastwise trade. By a law reaching back to the very beginning of the Government all foreign vessels are absolutely excluded from our coastwise trade. As they can not on any terms or in any event enter the coastwise trade, it is no concern of theirs what provisions are made regarding it. A general statement in a treaty regulatory apparently of all vessels can not be held to apply to vessels engaged in trade exclusively domestic and into which foreign vessels could not enter under any circumstances because prohibited by law. For that reason any privileges or benefits granted by a nation to its own vessels engaged exclusively in trade between its own ports is not a discrimination against vessels engaged in foreign trade.

Mr. Speaker, it is indeed remarkable to see the zeal of those who serve the transcontinental railroads and aid them to keep up their freight rates by denying the exemption of Panama Canal tolls to coastwise vessels. These advocates of railroad monopoly and the payment of tolls pretend to believe that we are violating the treaty when we pass American vessels through free. They pick out one particular rule and demand that it shall be construed as England would construe it, but they flippantly and hypocritically fling away all the other rules as of no importance whatever. They would observe one rule; they would ignore and repudiate all else.

It is all very absurd. We entered into a treaty for the construction of the canal and we adopted—England did not adopt, Germany, France, did not adopt, but the United States, singly and alone, adopted certain rules which were incorporated in the treaty, and these rules were adopted not to cut us off from sovereignty, but to promise to all foreign nations equal treatment as our customers. Of course, we shall fight for that canal in war times, and, of course, we shall blockade it against an enemy. But if it is once conceded that the rules apply to the United States as well as to foreign nations, and if it is conceded that we can not regulate tolls to suit ourselves on our own vessels, then we concede the surrender of sovereignty as a belligerent nation, for these rules can not be severed and observed in part and ignored in part.

Mr. Speaker, sound reasoning, judgment, experience, able precedents, and common sense all agree that we can legally and honorably maintain the position we have heretofore taken upon this question, and I shall vote now, as before, upon the side of the United States.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. Speaker, seldom in the history of our country have the people spoken with such directness and unanimity as upon the subject of the Panama Canal.

The Democratic platform formulated at Baltimore contained this provision:

> We favor the exemption from tolls of American ships engaged in coastwise trade passing through the Panama Canal. We also favor legislation forbidding the use of the Panama Canal by ships owned or controlled by railway carriers engaged in transportation competitive with the canal.

There is no uncertain sound in the Republican platform. The Panama Canal act, which it is proposed to repeal by this bill, was passed during the last administration. The Republican platform indorses the record made and makes specific reference to the completion of the Panama Canal.

The Progressive Party also declared its views respecting Panama Canal tolls. Here is what the platform says:

The Panama Canal, built and paid for by American people, must be used primarily for their benefit. We demand that the canal shall be so operated as to break transportation monopoly, now held and misused by the transcontinental railroads, by maintaining sea competition with them; that ships directly or indirectly owned or controlled by American railroad corporations shall not be permitted to use the canal, and that American ships engaged in coastwise trade shall pay no tolls.

The Socialist Party platform was silent upon this point, but it contains a declaration for Government ownership and management of railroads, steamboat lines, and so forth, and I think it is fair to presume that in the event of Government ownership of a line of steamships from, say, Atlantic ports to Pacific ports and connecting with the Alaska Government-owned railway, the Socialists would not want to give up our treaty rights respecting the control of the canal. In this connection the Socialist candidate for Congress in the seventh district of New Jersey declared himself in public last week against the passage of this bill. But, leaving out the votes for Socialist candidates, as I do not wish to be technical, there were over 13,000,000 of American voters who voted for candidates belonging to parties committed to the principle of free tolls. And judging from the election contest now in progress in Massachusetts, the people have not changed. All of the candidates at the special election there have declared themselves against the passage of this bill. Not a candidate among the number would take the risk of saying he would support the President upon this question.

NATIONAL HONOR.

Mr. Speaker, I hold the President in high regard. I have shown my respect for him in the past by voting for certain measures advocated by him. But much as I respect him, I do not represent him here. My allegiance is to 200,000 people in the second district of North Dakota. We are asked to support this bill upon grounds of "honor." My notion of representative government is that it is not the part of honor to disobey the instructions of the people as expressed in platforms. If the people are wrong, as claimed, or if the people have changed their views, which is not claimed, why not ask for a new mandate at the elections next November? The canal will not be opened until long after that. I am willing to trust the "honor" of our Nation to the keeping of the people who elected us. If we disregard the votes of the people and vote for this bill, every political rascal of the future will find in the action of this day, as Mr. CHANDLER has pointed out, a precedent and excuse for broken party pledges and faithless public service. At the election of 1912 there were 16,912 men who voted for me, 7,426 for my Democratic opponent, and 1,922 for the Socialist candidate. At the time these votes were cast the present canal law was on the statute books. I shall never vote to repeal it until the people pass on the question again.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. CHANDLER] in his excellent speech, delivered yesterday, said:

I oppose the repeal because more than 13,000,000 of American voters, prompted by the highest patriotic motives, keenly alert to their own and the Nation's interests, in possession of a complete record of fact, with their party platforms in front of them, acting upon the advice of their best and wisest statesmen, with every phase of the discussion familiar to them, and with the voices of the orators and the thunderings of the press still ringing in their ears, deliberately marched to the polls in November, 1912, and declared emphatically and overwhelmingly in favor of free tolls for American coastwise vessels passing through the Panama Canal. That judgment still stands, and should be considered sacred and inviolable by every lover of liberty and every friend of republican government until it is reversed by the only power that can reverse it, the people themselves. He who questions the validity or the righteousness of that judgment questions the capacity of the American people for self-government. He who would review, revise, and reject that judgment without the consent of the people, and without first giving them a chance to review, revise, and reject it themselves, is a stranger to the high and holy obligations that should rest forever upon the hearts and consciences of American Representatives.

Mr. Speaker, if I were in doubt respecting the meaning of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, or even if there were some reason to believe that England had the best of the argument, I would not think of surrendering any of our rights before giving the people a chance to again express themselves at a national election. So far as the voters of my district are concerned, I have no reason to believe that they have changed their views. Only one constituent has written me upon this subject. He is a thoughtful, conscientious school-teacher. He says that he is opposed from the economic standpoint to free tolls, but considers the right to control the canal the question of paramount importance.

THE PARAMOUNT QUESTION.

Mr. Speaker, when this discussion began the economic side occupied the center of the stage, so to speak. Now, and as the controversy continues, it will be dealt with in a new and much more important form. Shall we abandon the claims to control and sovereignty over the canal, asserted in the past by the executive officers of the United States Government and by the Congress, speaking for and on behalf of the people, and by the people ratified by an overwhelming vote in the 1912 election? Shall we confess that in passing the Panama Canal act of 1912 we dishonored ourselves as a people? The question of control is the paramount question, as my constituent rightly claims. Having disposed of that the Congress can deal with the economic question as the people direct. Unfortunately the administration bill and the gag rule accompanying it, which forbids amendment, give us no opportunity to divide the question or consider it separately. Many Representatives have expressed their willingness to vote for the repeal bill if a clause were added providing that it should not be regarded as a construction of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty and safeguarding our treaty rights.

TREATY HAS BEEN MISQUOTED.

It is surprising how many people have expressed an opinion of the treaty without having read it, and who are ready to wear sackcloth without first considering whether we have done any nation a wrong. There is also a popular misconception of the wording of the treaty. It was probably caused by a speech made by Joseph H. Choate, in which he left out three very important words. He was comparing the Panama Canal act with the treaty, and used these words:

Why, the merest schoolboy can pass upon the question.

I am going to read you the two clauses, and I would like to challenge any Member to show how they can possibly be reconciled:

"The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and war of all nations on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise."

That is what the treaty says. In the canal bill the clause covered by Mr. ROOT's motion to strike out is this:

"No tolls shall be levied upon vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States."

Can you put those two things together and reconcile them in any possible way?

This incorrect quotation was given a very wide circulation. It formed the basis of many editorials quoted on this floor by solemn-faced Congressmen, quick to believe their country was engaged in a dishonorable act. Even journals of such high class as Collier's recently quoted the treaty that way, and high-browed professors on Carnegie's pension list have given us the benefit of their advice. Hundreds upon hundreds of newspapers gave utterance to the statement. "All nations" means just what it says—"all nations." But that is not what the treaty did say. The words "observing these rules" were omitted by Mr. Choate. Here is the exact text:

ARTICLE 3.

The United States adopts, as the basis of the neutralization of such ship canal, the following rules, substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople, signed the 28th October, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Canal, that is to say:

1. The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic, or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

This article of the treaty was illuminated by the thoughtful address of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TEMPLE]. He said:

There has been, and there is likely to be, some confusion in discussing the various Hay-Pauncefote treaties. The first Hay-Pauncefote treaty was signed on February 5, 1900, was sent to the Senate for ratification, and ratified there, with certain amendments, on December 20, having been before the Senate a little more than 10 months. The first Hay-Pauncefote treaty was the one that was amended by adding to it the Davis amendment. It was the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty to which the Bard amendment was offered, not the treaty of 1901 and ratified in 1902; and it seems to me, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, that all discussions as to the meaning of the treaty of 1900 are to be taken with a great deal of allowance when we assume to apply them to the treaty of 1901. When the Senate ratified the treaty of 1900, if the action can be called ratification, it was ratified with three amendments, which made it necessary to send that treaty back to Great Britain. It went back, and Lord Lansdowne replied with a letter, of February 22, 1901, declining to accept it as modified by the Senate amendments. Then Mr. Hay began the draft of a new treaty, and that new treaty differed from the treaty of 1900 in many and remarkable respects.

In the first place, the treaty of 1900 differed from the treaty of 1901 in this respect, namely, article 3 then began with the statement that the "two contracting powers adopt the following rules." The present treaty begins with the statement "The United States adopts the following rules." [Applause.] The old Hay-Pauncefote treaty had in the first rule this clause: "That the canal shall be free and open 'in time of war as in time of peace' to vessels of commerce and of war of all nations." The new treaty left out the promise that the canal should be open "in time of war as in time of peace." And instead of opening the canal to the ships of all nations, the new treaty opened it only to the ships of the "nations observing these rules."

Now, what is the history of that particular clause? It is this: In the old Hay-Pauncefote treaty there was no provision that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty should be superseded. It was to be still in force, with only such slight modifications as the Hay-Pauncefote treaty might make. The new treaty, which was finally adopted, contained as its first article a provision that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was superseded. That released the United States from the agreement to the Clayton-Bulwer treaty that we would never acquire territory in Central America, and therefore left us free to acquire the strip of land on which the canal was to be constructed. We likewise released Great Britain from whatever limitation the Clayton-Bulwer treaty had imposed upon her rights in Central America. The new treaty, as I have said, provided that the United States alone should adopt the rules which are the basis for neutralization and which are adopted for no other purpose. And the contention of Great Britain then was that Great Britain, in agreeing to the treaty on the understanding that the United States was to adopt certain rules as the basis of neutralization for the canal, actually assumed the obligation herself of observing these rules, while the other nations would have no such obligation.

This was considered a very important matter. The former Hay-Pauncefote treaty had an article providing that other nations of the world should be invited to become signatory powers. The United States was unwilling to ask or permit any other nation to come in and join us, as all the great powers of Europe had joined together for the neutralization of the Suez Canal. Consequently this article was stricken out of the original treaty by one of the Senate amendments, and, of course, was left out of the new draft prepared by Mr. Hay. Great Britain, believing that if she should sign the treaty she would be bound by the rules in article 3, while the same rules would not be binding upon other nations, proposed to insert instead of the words "all nations" this clause:

"All nations which shall agree to observe these rules."

And Mr. Hay in his memorandum says that the President could not agree to this language, because he did not wish to submit the treaty to the agreement of other parties, and did not wish the other powers to have any contract right in the canal. [Applause.] And he proposed, therefore, to modify the Lansdowne amendment, which would have read "all nations agreeing to observe these rules," and to make it read "all nations observing these rules." The proposed change was acceptable to Great Britain. Lord Landsdowne's note of October 23, 1901, said:

"His Majesty's Government were prepared to accept this amendment, which seemed to us equally efficacious for the purpose which we had in view, namely, that of insuring that Great Britain should not be placed in a less advantageous position than other powers, while they stopped short of conferring upon other nations a contractual right to the use of the canal."

So the treaty was written, with the complete understanding of both parties, in such fashion that if any nation on earth will not observe, shall refuse to observe, or shall neglect to observe these rules, the canal is not open to warships or ships of commerce of that nation. [Applause.]

Mr. MURDOCK. Including Great Britain.

Mr. TEMPLE. Yes; of course including Great Britain.

THE OPINION OF A NOTED DEMOCRAT.

Mr. Richard Olney, formerly Secretary of State, a leading Democrat, and generally recognized as a great authority on international law, in a discussion of article 3 of the treaty said:

The words under construction are, in substance, the first of a set of six rules adopted by the United States as the basis of the neutralization of the canal.

But the other five certainly apply only to parties other than the United States, so that there is the strongest reason for holding that the first of them is to be given a like application.

And, if the British construction be correct, instead of liberating the United States from all foreign control of the canal and from all duties to foreign powers in respect of its use—except not to discriminate between them—the Hay-Pauncefote treaty compels the United States to reverse its established policy and to devise a plan for subsidizing its own vessels in order that they may have such free and other use of the canal as the United States may decide to be demanded by United States interests.

BUNK ABOUT THE PROPOSED GEORGIAN BAY SHIP CANAL.

Some "bunk" has been introduced in this debate respecting the Georgian Bay ship canal, a paper canal only. It has not been built yet. It is being talked about. Engineers completed a survey of it six years ago, and nothing has been done since, and probably never will. There are many obstacles. The estimated cost is $105,000,000 for a 22-foot canal, not 30-foot, as claimed. Nobody knows what a 30-foot canal would cost. In either case it is doubtful whether it would ever pay, as there would be keen competition by the present waterway, which, while longer, is not subject to so much lockage and is open 43 days longer each year, because the Georgian Bay route runs through a colder section.

There are also financial problems in the way. It was only a few weeks ago that a Dominion of Canada loan bearing the high rate of 4 per cent, as against 3 per cent paid upon some former loans, was turned down in London. It is well known that Canada has been using her credit liberally. The London bankers in turning down the Canadian loan said, "Canada should spend less and borrow less." I am, of course, not asserting that Canada, guided by resourceful men, can not in the future raise the money to complete the canal if she thinks it wise to do so, but the talented and farseeing statesmen of that country are likely to use their money in enterprises which promise better returns.

These timid gentlemen, who are quick to take alarm, have made themselves believe that the Canadian Government will not open on fair terms to Americans this paper canal. If the Canadian Government ever constructs this canal, which they have not seen fit to do after a lapse of six years since the engineers' report, because they are not assured it will pay, is it not fair to assume, if it is ever built, that their usual good business acumen will cause them to bid for American business by making reasonable rates?

The contention of these apprehensive gentlemen is that if we treat Canada generously now Canada will in the dim, distant future, if the paper Georgian Bay ship canal ever becomes a reality, treat us fairly in its rates for the use of that canal. But in the name of all that is fair, are our Panama rates not generous? My belief is that the rates which our country has adopted for tonnage through the Panama Canal of $1.25 per ton are generous to a fault, and that the broad-minded statesmen of Canada in the future will never have just cause to complain of them; but if they do—well, I prefer to cross that bridge when we come to it. If we retain the control of the Panama Canal we shall then be in a position to accord fair treatment to Canadian and British shipping through the Panama Canal if they will accord fair treatment through their canals to the shipping of our country. If we need in the future to make a concession to Canada upon the Panama Canal or other canals owned by the United States in return for a similar concession from them, it can be done then just as well as now, and perhaps better. No such contingency is likely to arise, however.

TWO OTHER WILD PROPOSALS.

Gentlemen on this floor have succeeded in keeping their faces straight while speaking of the alleged danger to the Northwest from the construction of two other paper canals. One of these is the proposed Huron & Ontario Canal, running from Georgian Bay to Lake Ontario. I gather from reliable sources—the report of the Deep Waterways Commission—that all this proposed canal lacks is water. It has been shown that there is not enough water at the summit level to feed the locks both ways.

Then between the same lakes there has been proposed the Trent Valley Canal. Of course it is always easy to get local people on any stretch of country to propose either railways or canals. This particular proposal may make a strong impression upon the gentlemen considering this subject of Panama tolls, but there are a few facts connected with the proposal which will not likely commend it to individuals looking for safe investments or to a Government of level-headed Canadians. The proposed Trent Valley route is ony six times as long as by land. It is as crooked as a snake, and there is 500 feet more of lockage than by way of the Welland Canal.

The claim has also been made that there is a large tonnage through the Welland Canal in which the northwestern farmers are interested, but no figures have been given. Statistics have been given of the great tonnage through the Sault Ste. Marie Canals, leaving it to be inferred that the same tonnage passes through the Welland Canal, which connects Lake Erie and Lake Ontario.

The great bulk of the traffic through the Sault Ste. Marie Canals is to points south and east of Lake Erie—to Cleveland, Buffalo, Pittsburgh, and other cities. But granting that there is some traffic from the American Northwest passing through the Welland Canal, I would like to have some gentleman tell me to what extent it affects the farmers of the Dakotas or Minnesota. One of the best authorities of the Minneapolis Chamber of Commerce is authority for the statement that not a single bushel of wheat grown in Minnesota and the Dakotas was shipped out of the United States during the year 1912. I do not happen to have his figures for the year 1913, but I am satisfied that not a single bushel of wheat grown in the States mentioned was shipped out of the United States during the year 1913. It is a well-known fact that the high-grade wheats of the United States are kept in this country, purchased by millers in the Northwest, South, and East to mix with lower-grade wheats. The wheat shipped out of the United States is not from the American Northwest. Will it affect the shipment of flax? Not at all, because all the flax grown in the United States is used in this country. The same is true of barley, potatoes, and other commodities produced in the Northwest. Some barley is exported from the United States, but not of the quality raised in the Dakotas, Minnesota, and Wisconsin. My impression is that the farmers of the Northwest will not develop any great amount of fear because of the proposed Canadian canals, first, because of the high improbability of their ever being built, and, secondly, because their commodities will not pass through them to any great extent, if at all.

GENEROSITY.

Mr. Speaker, referring again to the matter of generosity, I am reminded that the tolls upon the Suez Canal, controlled by Great Britain and costing much less money, are greater than the tolls already fixed for the Panama Canal. Great Britain draws a modest 30 per cent annually for its investment in the Suez Canal, while experts have figured that our returns from the Panama Canal for many years to come will not amount to more than the interest upon the Panama bonds.

THE SUEZ CANAL.

Great Britain opposed the building of the Suez Canal and did everything it possibly could to prevent its construction, even to the matter of inducing Said Pasha to withdraw 20,000 laborers from the canal to raise cotton, which was then unobtainable from the United States.

WILL HISTORY REPEAT ITSELF?

But in spite of the opposition of England and in spite of obstacles placed in the path of De Lesseps by other nations through the influence of Great Britain the canal was finally completed in 1867, and strange to say the first steamer which passed through it was a British steamer. Defeated in its opposition to the construction of the canal, Great Britain then became very active to secure its control. It purchased the shares owned by the debt-ridden Khedive of Egypt, thus obtaining control of the canal stock company. Now, the question is whether history will repeat itself. Great Britain is pressing for concessions in the Panama Canal. Will the United States yield without even so much as requiring the question to be arbitrated? Great Britain is exercising commercial as well as political control over the Suez Canal and even went to the extent of closing the canal to commerce during its war with Egypt in the early eighties. Its grip was strengthened by the treaty proposed at London in 1885 by certain great powers and subsequent events. It was drafted for the purpose of granting the freedom of use of the Suez Canal, but the treaty was not signed, because Sir Julian Pauncefote asked for the insertion of the following clause in the proposed treaty:

The British delegates, in presenting this draft of a treaty as the definite regulation intended to guarantee the free use of the Suez Canal, think it their duty to formulate a general reservation as to the application of these provisions, in so far as they may not be compatible with the transitory and exceptional condition of things actually existing in Egypt and may limit the freedom of action by their Government during the period of the occupation of Egypt by the forces of Her Britannic Majesty.

A couple of years later a new treaty was drafted at Paris by England and France, subject to the concurrence of the other powers concerned. When this treaty was submitted to the different powers Prime Minister Salisbury sent at the same time a circular containing the reservation made by Sir Julian Pauncefote in the words contained in his amendment proposed previously at London. Finally the matter was disposed of by the treaty signed at Constantinople by the diplomatic representatives of Great Britain, France, Germany, Spain, Austria, Hungary, Italy, Russia, Holland, and Turkey.

By that treaty all the nations just referred to, excepting Great Britain, are bound to respect the neutrality of the Suez Canal, and to guarantee its free use by ships of both war and commerce of all nations in time of war as well as in time of peace.

Great Britain has not as good title to Egypt as has the United States to the Panama Canal Zone, but during the period of its occupation of Egypt Great Britain enjoyed and now exercises full control over the canal. The Pauncefote who knew how to secure the rights of England in the control of the Suez Canal is the same Pauncefote who signed the treaty of 1901 with our Secretary of State, John Hay; and I think it is fair to presume that if there had been any intention at that time to lodge the control and management of the canal otherwise than in the United States, language to convey that idea in unmistakable terms would have found its place in the treaty.

THE DEADLY PARALLEL.

The construction of the treaty with Great Britain of 1815 should not be overlooked. Here is the deadly parallel.

TREATY WITH GREAT BRITAIN OF 1815.	HAY-PAUNCEFOTE TREATY.
"No higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed * * * in the ports of any of His Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe on the vessels of the United States than shall be payable in the same ports on British vessels."	SECTION 1, Article 3. "The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable."
Under this treaty, nearly 100 years old, Great Britain charges the United States from three to six times the charges made to British vessels engaged in coastwise trade. Great Britain believes this complies with the treaty, and we have constantly conceded the point.	Under this treaty Great Britain asks that a different construction be placed upon the English language, and that coastwise trade of the United States be not exempt.

COST IN HUMAN LIFE AND MONEY.

The great American canal across Panama has been built at tremendous cost of brain, muscle, blood, and treasure. The item of $400,000,000 is not all. Think of the many who were injured or lost their lives. I asked the Isthmian Commission recently for a statement of the number killed and injured and the number dying from fevers. The Washington office said the figures had never been compiled and my request was referred to Col. Goethals at Panama. When the information is furnished, I venture to say it will show almost as many men killed and injured as were killed and wounded during the Spanish-American War, and will also show a large number of deaths from fevers, particularly during the first years of the work.

SERVING AS DIRECTORS.

I believe that we are serving as directors in a great people's corporation which built the canal. The public owns it. We stand here with practically a referendum vote of the people instructing us to maintain the law. We are in much the same position as directors of a private corporation who vote the proxies of other stockholders who have attached to their proxies instructions respecting how they desire to have them voted. Personally I feel that I am bound by all the votes of the people of my district cast at the last election under the platforms which I have already quoted. Believing as I do in the honor and integrity of the people, in their intelligence and capacity for self-government, and that the honor of our country is safe in their hands, I shall vote as they have instructed me.

Mr. AVIS. Mr. Speaker, I shall vote against the bill now under consideration, which seeks to repeal the section of the Panama Canal act which exempts American vessels engaged in coastwise trade from the payment of tolls for passage through the Panama Canal.

I do not wish my vote on this bill to be construed as a final expression of opinion as to the wisdom or unwisdom of the economic question, which is only incidentally involved at this time. Whether as an economic principle it is sound or unsound to impose tolls upon such vessels I do not care to irrevocably commit myself. Further and future consideration of this question might cause me to arrive at a different conclusion and to vote differently.

Due to the imposition by the Democratic majority of the inconceivable, infamous, and iniquitous "gag rule," which limits this debate to 20 hours and thereby forbids careful investigation of this momentous question, I have not had the opportunity to give it the thought that it justly is entitled to. Unlimited debate on this bill is of the greatest importance to the people of the United States, and action on it in the great haste necessarily required by that "gag rule" may be, and most likely will be, fraught with dire consequences to the people of the United States.

But, from the study and consideration that I have been able to give the question, it clearly seems to me that the exemption of such vessels from the payment of tolls is morally right and economically sound.

While on the face of the bill it would appear that we are called upon to vote on the economic question; as a matter of fact, this question is only incidental and is the mere excuse for determining the real question involved. The real issue is whether or not we shall yield to the demands of a foreign nation and by our votes construe the Hay-Pauncefote treaty according to the contentions of such nation, however may be our judgment to the contrary.

If Congress passes this bill and thereby repeals the present law which exempts American vessels engaged in coastwise trade from the payment of tolls for passage through the canal, it will be construed as an acquiescence in the contentions and demands made by Great Britain, namely, that the United States by the present law will discriminate against Great Britain in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic in violation of section 1, article 3, of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. It will be further taken as an absolute and unqualified admission on the part of the United States that it has no right under the treaty to exempt its "coastwise vessels" from the payment of such tolls, and by analogy that it has no right in the future to thus exempt its vessels of commerce and of war from the payment of such tolls.

THE TREATY—OUR RIGHTS AND OBLIGATIONS.

I for one am not willing by my vote to concede that any of the provisions of the present law are in violation of any of the obligations of the treaty.

If I were satisfied that by exempting American "coastwise vessels" from the payment of such tolls this Government were violating its treaty obligations, I would unquestionably vote to repeal the present law relating thereto.

I have given this phase of the matter considerable study and thought, and have no doubt as to the rights of the United States in the premises. However, if reasonable doubt about the matter existed in my mind, I must confess that I would resolve that doubt in favor of my own country; but, as I stated before, I have no doubt whatever on this score.

At the time of the making of the Clayton-Bulwer convention in 1850 the United States and Great Britain contemplated the construction of a canal between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans by parties having the authority of the local government or governments through whose territory the same might pass. Neither Government contemplated the building of the canal by itself, or the other.

In that convention the United States and Great Britain accorded their protection to the construction of such canal, guaranteed its neutrality and security when completed, and provided that the parties constructing or owning the same should not make any unfair discriminations in favor of the commerce of one of the contracting parties over the commerce of the other.

After the memorable trip of the Oregon around "the Horn" during the Spanish-American War the statesmen and people of the United States fully realized the absolute need of a speedier means of ship communication between the Atlantic and Pacific seaboards during time of war.

Moreover, by reason of the annexation of the Hawaiian Islands, the acquisition of the Philippine Islands, and the prospective expansion of American commerce in the Pacific Ocean they more fully realized the desirability of the immediate construction of the canal and its ownership and control by the Government of the United States, not only as a short and convenient route for vessels of war, but as a means of commercial intercourse.

It was further and wisely thought that its construction and operation would greatly benefit the citizens of the United States by indirectly causing the great transcontinental railroad systems to reduce the exorbitant transportation charges then imposed and to establish and maintain just and equitable charges of traffic as competitors of our merchant marine.

At that time was further realized the folly of our Government beginning the construction of a canal under the unfavorable provisions of the Clayton-Bulwer convention, and while it remained in full force and effect. Negotiations were shortly thereafter initiated to supersede that convention and for the making of a treaty, under the provisions of which the Government of the United States could consistently undertake, by itself, the marvelous engineering feat of connecting the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans by a great maritime highway.

These negotiations resulted in the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty. This treaty, in the form presented, was not acceptable to the Senate of the United States, and was amended by it in several particulars. The amendments adopted were not satisfactory or agreeable to Great Britain for reasons, some of which were set out in the official correspondence exchanged between the two Governments.

Thereupon, after further negotiations the second Hay-Pauncefote treaty was agreed upon, and upon submission to the Senate of the United States was approved and ratified.

I desire to invite attention to articles 1, 2, and a part of article 3 of the present treaty, which are as follows:

ARTICLE 1.

The high contracting parties agree that the present treaty shall supersede the aforementioned convention of the 19th April, 1850.

ARTICLE 2.

It is agreed that the canal may be constructed under the auspices of the Government of the United States either directly at its own cost, or by gift or loan of money to individuals or corporations, or through subscription to or purchase of stock or shares, and that, subject to the provisions of the present treaty, the said Government shall have and enjoy all the rights incident to such construction as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal.

ARTICLE 3.

The United States adopts, as the basis of the neutralization of such ship canal, the following rules, substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople, signed the 28th October, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Canal, that is to say:

1. The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

It will be noted that by article 1 the present treaty superseded the Clayton-Bulwer convention.

By article 2 the Government of the United States was to have and enjoy all the rights incident to the construction of the canal by it, as well as the exclusive right of providing for its regulation and management.

The language of article 2 not only clearly negatives the idea that the Government of the United States was simply to regulate and manage the canal—to be a mere gatekeeper and tolls collector—but expressly provides that "the said Government shall have and enjoy all the rights incident to such construction."

As the territory through which the Panama Canal runs is owned by the United States, its rights as a sovereign nation would apply thereto even though it were not expressly provided in said treaty that the Government of the United States "shall have and enjoy all the rights incident to such construction."

I submit in all fairness to those who are opposed to the United States exercising the rights of sovereignty and ownership over the canal this question:

What are the rights that are contemplated by article 2 of the present treaty that are incident to the construction of the canal in addition to "the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal."

Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that this question can only be satisfactorily answered in one way, and that is that the Government of the United States is rightfully and legally entitled to exercise all the rights that are incident to the ownership of the canal and the territory through which it runs not expressly or by necessary implication denied to it in the present treaty.

In construing and interpreting the treaty we must not only be aided by the light of reason, but we must avail ourselves of the circumstances which surrounded the high contracting parties at the time of its negotiation and making.

When the Clayton-Bulwer convention and the two Hay-Pauncefote treaties were made, and for many years previous—and at the present time—the navigation laws of the United States forbade the vessels of any foreign power from engaging in our coastwise trade. How, then, can it seriously or reasonably be contended that by the present treaty the Government of the United States denied to itself the right to permit its vessels engaged in coastwise trade to use the canal on such terms and conditions as it might determine and prescribe?

American "coastwise vessels" were certainly not contemplated by the high contracting parties as being embraced in the description, "vessels of commerce and of war," as used in article 3 of the treaty.

The contention that the words "vessels of commerce and of war" do not include "coastwise vessels" is clearly justified and borne out by the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Olsen v. Smith (195 U. S., 332), in which case the court was called upon to construe the meaning of the words "vessels of the United States" and "British vessels" as those words appeared in the treaty of 1815.

As previously stated, the Clayton-Bulwer convention was expressly superseded by the present treaty, and the only references to that convention which made any part of it, a part of the present treaty, are to be found in the preamble and article 4 thereof, in which the references are to the "general principle" of neutralization established in article 8 of that convention. No reference whatever is made therein to the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty, which was not adopted.

The first Hay-Pauncefote treaty did not supersede the Clayton-Bulwer convention. The latter remained in force and effect, in so far as the respective rights and obligations of the Governments of the United States and Great Britain were concerned, except so far as its provisions were modified by the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

The whole purpose of the Government of the United States was to build an American canal, the entire cost and enormous risk of which was to be borne by the United States alone; and, when completed, it was to be its exclusive property and was to be managed and controlled by it, not only for its own benefit, but for the benefit of all mankind and the commerce of the world; hence the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty, in the form presented, was not satisfactory to the Senate of the United States.

As amended by the Senate it was not acceptable to the British Government, principally for the reason that Great Britain was still left under the responsibility and obligation of enforcing the neutrality of the canal, which had been imposed upon or assumed by her jointly with the United States in the Clayton-Bulwer convention.

Under these circumstances it was deemed advisable to relieve Great Britain of all of the responsibility and burden of maintaining the neutrality and security of the canal, to supersede the Clayton-Bulwer convention, and for the United States to assume the entire responsibility and burden of enforcing the rules by which the canal should be regulated without the assistance of Great Britain or any other nation. With these changes the present treaty was adopted.

Mr. Speaker, I therefore submit, what rights incident to sovereignty and to the construction of the canal are denied to the United States by the present treaty? They are certainly not to be found in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer convention, to which references are made in the present treaty.

Article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer convention in its entirety is certainly not a part of the present treaty, as the references therein are limited and confined to the "general principle" of neutralization established in said article.

A perusal of that article will show that its language and provisions are exceedingly vague and indefinite, and related to the construction of a canal or canals other than the particular one then under consideration, and contemplate future treaty stipulations in regard thereto.

The word "neutralization" under international law has a technical meaning. When used in treaties, in its technical sense, it has reference to time of war or hostilities. A neutral is a state or nation that refrains from aiding or interfering between belligerents during time of war.

A "belligerent," in its technical sense, is a power or nation engaged in legitimate warfare.

It is logical and reasonable to assume that the words "neutralization" and "belligerent" as used in the treaty are to be given their technical meanings.

We must, therefore, necessarily conclude that the "general principle" of neutralization established in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer convention, when considered with the other provisions of the present treaty, meant the "general principle" of neutralization to be observed in time of war or hostilities between belligerent powers.

Article 3 of the present treaty, in its entirety, must be looked to to ascertain what rights, if any, incident to the ownership and construction of the canal were yielded by the United States.

I will now quote article 3 in its entirety:

The United States adopts, as the basis of the neutralization of such ship canal, the following rules, substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople, signed the 28th of October, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Canal—that is to say:

1. The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

2. The canal shall never be blockaded, nor shall any right of war be exercised nor any act of hostility be committed within it. The United States, however, shall be at liberty to maintain such military police along the canal as may be necessary to protect it against lawlessness and disorder.

3. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not revictual nor take any stores in the canal except so far as may be strictly necessary; and the transit of such vessels through the canal shall be effected with the least possible delay in accordance with the regulations in force, and with only such intermission as may result from the necessities of the service.

Prizes shall be in all respects subject to the same rules as vessels of war of the belligerents.

4. No belligerent shall embark or disembark troops, munitions of war, or warlike materials in the canal, except in case of accidental hindrance of the transit, and in such case the transit shall be resumed with all possible dispatch.

5. The provisions of this article shall apply to waters adjacent to the canal within 3 marine miles of either end. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not remain in such waters longer than 24 hours at any one time, except in case of distress, and in such case shall depart as soon as possible; but a vessel of war of one belligerent shall not depart within 24 hours from the departure of a vessel of war of the other belligerent.

6. The plant, establishments, buildings, and all works necessary to the construction, maintenance, and operation of the canal shall be deemed to be part thereof, for the purposes of this treaty, and in time of war, as in time of peace, shall enjoy complete immunity from attack or injury by belligerents, and from acts calculated to impair their usefulness as part of the canal.

It is claimed by those who champion Great Britain's cause that by section 1 of article 3 the United States obligated itself to accord to the vessels of commerce and of war of Great Britain, and of all other nations observing the rules, the very same treatment that it should accord to its own vessels of commerce and of war.

I have already shown that the words "vessels of commerce and of war" do not include "coastwise vessels."

The only nation that has any contract rights in the canal other than the United States is Great Britain. It was proposed by the Government of Great Britain to give other nations contract rights therein, but the proposal was rejected for the reason that it was desired to make the canal strictly an American canal.

The use of the canal was limited to the vessels of commerce and of war of the nations observing the rules set out in the treaty. Great Britain by entering into the treaty agreed to observe the rules therein set out; but by so doing she or her subjects are not entitled to any better treatment or any more privileges in respect thereof than any other nation or its citizens or subjects observing the rules.

The vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing the rules set out in article 3, including Great Britain, are entitled to use the canal on terms of entire equality, and the United States can not discriminate against any such nation in favor of any other nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise.

The United States is undoubtedly obligated not to impose any unfair and inequitable conditions or charges of traffic on any such nation, or its citizens or subjects.

I do not see how it can be reasonably contended that the words "all nations observing these rules" and "such nation" include the United States. The words "all nations observing these rules" and "such nation" refer to Great Britain and the other nations who may observe the rules, not to the United States, which adopted the rules.

If the words "all nations observing these rules" and "such nation" include the United States, which they do not, and if an American vessel engaged in coastwise trade can not pass through the canal without the payment of tolls without such an act being a violation of the treaty, neither can a war vessel of the United States.

Solidly linked together are the words "vessels of commerce and of war," and if it is a violation of the treaty for the United States to exempt its vessels of commerce from the payment of tolls for passage through the canal it is likewise a violation of the treaty for the United States to exempt its vessels of war from the payment of such tolls.

Again, if section 1 of article 3 in its entirety applies to the United States as well as to "all nations observing these rules," all the other sections of article 3 in their entirety must likewise apply to and include the United States.

Mr. Speaker, for the reasons heretofore given I am firmly convinced that the United States has the clear moral and legal right under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty to exempt its vessels engaged in coastwise trade from the payment of tolls for passage through the canal, and by so doing it is not in the remotest degree chargeable with a violation of its treaty obligations in the premises.

TOLLS AND COMPETITION.

It is claimed that Great Britain's present demands are prompted by her interest in the Canadian Pacific and the railroad which crosses Mexico and links the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, both of which are controlled by British capital.

I can readily understand and appreciate why these railroads and the great American transcontinental railroad systems, as a matter of selfish desire for gain, want tolls imposed upon all vessels passing through the canal.

One of the principal reasons for constructing the canal was to bring our merchant vessels into competition with the railroads, and thereby benefit the public.

Mr. Speaker, will not such competition insure reasonable and just charges of transportation for the exchange of commerce between our Atlantic and Pacific seaboards? Cheap transportation for the canal certainly means cheap overland freight rates.

Will not lower freight rates develop and promote the commerce of the vast territory drained by the Mississippi, Ohio, and Kanawha Rivers, upon the improvement of which the Government has spent and will continue to spend stupendous sums of money—sums which in the aggregate will compare favorably with the amount spent upon the Panama Canal? Will not free tolls benefit the American farmers by giving them cheaper markets for their products?

I have very little patience with those who may attempt to justify or excuse their votes for the pending bill by saying that they are opposed to subsidies, and that the granting of free tolls to our "coastwise vessels" is, in effect, the granting of subsidies to them.

I will concede that our "coastwise vessels" will be greatly benefited; but will not the American public benefit vastly more? Unless we show some favoritism to our merchant marine, what will become of it? At the present time a very small percentage of our exports and imports is carried by vessels navigating under the American flag. I would like to see our merchant marine restored to the supremacy upon the seas that it at one time maintained.

Nearly all of the foreign powers pay subsidies to their ships. England, Russia, France, Germany, Japan, and other foreign nations practically pay all the tolls imposed upon their respective vessels for passage through the Suez Canal. If foreign nations pursue this course with respect of the Panama Canal, their vessels will soon have a monopoly over the vessels of the United States of the transportation of passengers and freight through the canal.

If those of our Democratic friends who would justify their votes for the repeal bill on the ground of opposition to subsidies wish to be consistent, why do they not introduce and insist upon the passage of a bill to impose tolls upon the vessels that navigate the Mississippi, Ohio, and Kanawha Rivers and the other navigable rivers, lakes, and canals of the United States which have been improved by the Government?

The Panama Canal was built by the United States at an enormous expense, and the rivers, harbors, and navigable waters of the United States have been improved at a similar expense. If it is right in principle to impose tolls upon the vessels of the United States which will navigate the Panama Canal, why is it not right in principle to impose tolls upon the vessels engaged in domestic commerce that navigate the Mississippi, Ohio, and Kanawha Rivers and the other navigable rivers, lakes, and canals of the United States? If it is right in principle to exempt one class of vessels from the payment of tolls, it must necessarily follow that it is right to exempt the other class also.

The Panama Canal was primarily built for the benefit of the public; so were the navigable rivers and lakes of the United States improved for the benefit of the public. The American public should be the chief beneficiary of their construction and improvement, respectively.

If canal tolls shall be imposed upon "coastwise vessels," engaged only in domestic trade, the consuming public will largely have to bear the burden thereof. I am therefore for the American public in this controversy and in favor of the incidental encouragement that will be given to our domestic merchant marine.

BENEFIT TO WEST VIRGINIA.

Free tolls to our "coastwise vessels" will undoubtedly benefit all sections of the country, and particularly my State of West Virginia. Take, for illustration, my congressional district, a large portion of which is drained by the Kanawha River, upon which the Government has spent vast sums to make and keep it navigable. The railroads traversing that section have to compete with the river, which competition results in lower cost of transportation to the people of that section.

We produce in my congressional district one of the very few coals of the United States that will stand the heat of the Equator and Tropics without igniting by spontaneous combustion. A market for this most valuable coal can, and undoubtedly will, be built up upon the Pacific coast if prohibitory charges of transportation do not prevent. A rail haul of a very few miles will take this coal to the Kanawha River. It will then have a short and direct water route down the Kanawha, the Ohio, and the Mississippi Rivers, through the Panama Canal, to the Pacific coast. If tolls of $1.25 per ton shall be imposed upon this coal, as is now proposed, may not these tolls prohibit our coal from entering the Pacific seaboard markets and thereby rob my State and district of the benefit to which it is rightfully entitled in the canal?

DEMOCRATIC PLATFORM PLEDGES.

Mr. Speaker, by its platform the Democratic Party made a sacred covenant with the people. The President, Secretary of State, and you gentlemen on the other side of this Chamber were elected upon a platform in one of the planks of which it was set forth:

> We favor the exemption from tolls of American ships engaged in coastwise trade passing through the Panama Canal.

Was this platform a mere thing to run upon and not to be kept—to quote President Wilson's language, "molasses to catch flies"?

It may be claimed that I have no right to intimate that President Wilson, Secretary Bryan, and the Democratic Members of this House who seek to repeal the present law are repudiating their platform pledge, because they were not placed in power by my vote or influence and are not, therefore, responsible to me. While this may be true, yet they are certainly responsible to the people who supported them and to whom they made, what to me would be, a sacred and inviolate promise. It were perhaps in better taste for those people to say whether in violating their solemn platform obligations these gentlemen are guilty of perfidy, treachery, and deceit. I will not, then, express my own opinion, but will ask these honorable members to explain to the House what application, if any, Secretary Bryan's recent speech as to persons who violate their platform pledges has to himself, the President, or themselves.

The gentleman from California [Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND] has already quoted Mr. Bryan's language, but I hope that I may be pardoned for quoting it again.

Mr. Bryan said:

> The fact that we not only have platforms, but that the platform is becoming more specified year by year, is conclusive proof that the people believe in the Democratic theory, and they write their platforms because they believe, and those who run upon them lead the voters to believe, that they believe a platform is binding upon those who stand upon it.
> As a believer in the Democratic theory of representative government, I desire to announce it as a settled principle not to be questioned in this country that a platform is binding upon every honest man who runs upon that platform. I have heard it said by men after an election that they could not conscientiously support something in their platform, and it raises a very important question whether a man should violate his conscience as a public servant, and I frankly tell you that I believe that no man should violate his conscience, either as an individual or as a public servant. Far be it from me to say that any man elected to any office should as an official do a thing that his conscience condemns. But does that mean that he should violate his platform? No; it seems that his conscience should commence to work before the election and not hibernate until after the election.
> I lay it down as a proposition, and I am prepared to defend it anywhere, that the Representative who secures office upon a platform and then holds the office and betrays the people who elected him is a criminal worse than the man who embezzled money intrusted to him.

In view of the fact that President Wilson, in a special message delivered to this Congress, has urged the repeal of the present law which would exempt American ships engaged in coastwise trade from the payment of Panama Canal tolls in violation of the platform upon which he was elected, and Secretary Bryan has strongly indorsed the President's position in public interviews, may we not presume that we will shortly hear of their respective resignations?

THE PRESIDENT AND CONGRESS.

Mr. Speaker, before closing my discussion, there is another phase of this matter that I wish to refer to, and that is what I conceive to be the President's almost contemptuous treatment of Congress in connection with this entire controversy. In doing so, I trust that my remarks may not be construed to be an unwarranted reflection upon the President, for whom I have and entertain the highest respect.

In their wisdom our patriot fathers, "in order to establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity," ordained and established the Constitution.

It was a part of their wisdom and foresight to divide the Government into three great coordinate branches or departments—the legislative, the executive, and the judicial—each in its own sphere to be entirely independent of the others; and in such a way that one branch would be a continual check or balance upon the others. The duties and powers of each were clearly defined, and all legislative powers were vested in the Congress.

Congress should maintain the important position accorded to it by the Constitution, and should respect and insist upon its prerogatives—certainly to the extent of requiring the other departments of Government in dealing with it to act within the sphere and limitations provided by the Constitution.

I may be old-fashioned in my views and out of date, but I still believe that the Constitution should be strictly observed and complied with in all of its terms and requirements.

When the news goes forth that the President has forced Congress to obey his will in any matter, I am aware that a large number of people hail such news with mingled joy and pleasure. Such people, however, lose sight of the fact that their rights and liberties are seriously jeopardized when constitutional barriers are swept aside and constitutional limitations are not observed.

Failure in small things is usually followed by greater failure in larger things, and failure to observe the Constitution in all things can only breed anarchy and chaos as a necessary consequence.

I am not unmindful of the fact that it is the prerogative of the President to recommend to the consideration of the Congress such measures "as he shall judge necessary and expedient," but I am also aware that it is his duty "from time to time to give to the Congress information of the state of the Union."

Although President Wilson was elected to office upon a party platform which, as I have shown, is in direct conflict with the proposed legislation, and at that time entertained views upon this matter entirely at variance with his present position, as evidenced by his public speeches when a candidate, without well-defined reason he now demands of Congress the sacrifice of its former judgment as expressed in the present law.

He intimates mysteriously that a crisis of some kind exists and informs us that, with but small consideration of any economic policy involved, we should yield "in ungrudging measure," so that he may "know how to deal with matters of even greater delicacy and nearer consequence," yet will not even take us into his confidence to the extent of complying with his constitutional obligation, "to give to the Congress information of the state of the Union," so that each member may determine for himself the possible existence or seriousness of such crisis.

No member who has addressed this House has given a single good reason for the almost marvelous change of heart and position on the part of President Wilson in this matter. The distinguished Speaker of this House has told us that not even he has been informed of any excuse or reason for this wonderful change.

How, then, can those of us who entertain the former views of President Wilson be expected to change our position without justification or excuse?

It has been intimated that our Government has made some kind of an agreement with Great Britain that involves the repeal of the Panama tolls-exemption law, under which agreement the President will receive from Great Britain and Japan their friendly support of his Mexican policy; that an alliance exists between Great Britain and Japan, and Japan and Mexico, respectively, and that unless the United States surrenders in this matter we are in possible danger of war from all three of these countries.

If these intimations are true—which I do not believe—they would not swerve me one iota from my position, and should not swerve a single American citizen who has one red drop of patriotic blood in his veins. I believe that our rights in the canal should be kept and preserved for ourselves and our posterity, and I am unwilling by my vote to surrender these rights as the price of the friendship of any nation on God's footstool.

It is my sincere hope that we shall continue to maintain the friendship of England and Japan; but if we are right in this matter, the fact that we are in danger of incurring their displeasure and that of other nations is no excuse for changing the law.

While we should desire to have the friendship of all nations and should like to merit their respect and esteem, yet I am unwilling to curry favor at the sacrifice of principle and of honor. We should not be subservient to any country or privilege; and if we are threatened with war and defeat should follow, which is highly improbable, then it is better to suffer an honorable defeat than to gain an ignominious victory.

Mr. Speaker, I wish there were exhibited in this debate less of the Tory spirit and more of the patriot spirit that actuated the men and boys of 1776 and 1812; more of the spirit of Clay and Calhoun, who, when England claimed to be the mistress of the seas, whose merchants wanted the trade and to do all the carrying of the world and looked with jealous eyes upon this country, and when England and France seized our vessels and impressed our seamen and war threatened at their hands, stood nobly and bravely by their country.

"Weak as we are"—said Henry Clay—

we can fight England and France both, if necessary, in a good cause—the cause of honor and independence.

"Which shall we do"—asked John C. Calhoun—abandon or defend our commercial and maritime rights, and the personal liberties of our citizens in exercising them? These rights are attacked, and war is the only means of redress.

Mr. Speaker, feeling as I do on this matter, I shall vote for my country rather than for Great Britain or any other country in the world, and neither fear, favor, nor patronage shall be the opiate to lull my honor to sleep. I shall, therefore, now and forever stand by New England as against Old England. I shall stand by my own home and fireside. In this and all other issues I shall stand by my own country as over against all other countries or peoples beneath the stars.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. Speaker, in the limited time at my disposal I shall not attempt to discuss all of the questions that have naturally arisen during the progress of this debate on the subject of the exemption or nonexemption from tolls of American vessels engaged in coastwise traffic passing through the Panama Canal.

While I scarcely hope that any views I may hold or express on the subject would cause a change of view of any Member on this floor, yet in my State of West Virginia there are a large number of people who are intensely interested in this subject, who desire information upon it, and who, furthermore, are entitled to know the reasons for my vote upon this important subject. In that connection I will state that during the year of continuous session that I have been a Member of this House no question that has been before us has seemed so fraught with far-reaching importance as this, and in its consideration I have spared neither time nor effort in the time allowed in endeavoring to get at the bottom of the matter, in order that both my conscience and my reason, as well as my constituents, might give approval to my vote. I wanted to reflect the views of the people of my State, and be able to show such as might honestly differ with me that I acted conscientiously and with reason.

It would be a rank partisan of the view taken by him that did not admit that there are two sides to this question, and that arrayed on opposing sides are some of the most learned statesmen and lawyers of two continents. It, therefore, behooves a layman to approach with open mind the evidence on the subject—that is, the laws and treaties bearing upon it, the diplomatic correspondence relating to the treaties, the debates in the Senate, and the expressions of those who were in the thick of the negotiations and deliberations.

Personally I approached this important matter absolutely without bias, political or otherwise. I was predisposed to take the President's side of the case. I have the highest regard for his integrity of purpose, his patriotism, his independence of thought, his strong conviction of duty, his clear moral perceptions. Yet I am not willing to grant that he is infallible, nor would I be true to my conception of my own duty if I yielded to him the function imposed upon me by the Constitution and my oath of office—that of independently representing in the Congress the State of West Virginia, of voting on this and every other question according to the dictates of my conscience and in the light of the best information I can obtain.

Mr. Speaker, I have concluded, after studying closely and conscientiously this question, to vote against the repeal, and for the reasons I shall proceed to give. I do not think I am in error, and I confidently expect the approval of a large majority of my constituents; but if I am in error, and if perchance subsequent events should disclose this to me, I shall always attribute it to the much too short time allowed under the "gag rule" adopted by the Democratic majority of this House to govern this debate, under which only 20 hours of debate are allowed, only about 3 minutes to each Member if the time was evenly apportioned. There are a large number on this floor who are serving their first term, like myself, who have not had the benefit of the debates held in the Sixty-second Congress, when the canal act was passed. The time allowed is not sufficient for as thorough study of the subject as I wanted to make. Why impose such a rule upon a helpless minority? I protest against the action of the majority. If this bill will not stand all the light that can be thrown upon it, it should be defeated. What is the need for such haste? The canal will not be opened to traffic for a year or more. We are in the midst of the long session, and the short session, beginning December 1, will be held before the canal is ready to receive the ships of the world. Many hours are spent by this body upon the discussion of matters of little or no importance. Here is a matter affecting our domestic commerce and our relations with foreign nations perhaps permanently. The question of whether we are to allow foreign nations to dictate to us in matters with which they confessedly have nothing to do is before us. The practical abrogation of the Monroe doctrine is deep down in the bowels of this question, yet we are compelled to debate this question and reach a conclusion in 20 hours. What a travesty upon representative government, and how the shade of Czar Tom Reed must enjoy this spectacle of the Democratic majority muzzling and shackling the representatives of the people with a rule that prevents amendment and allows but a few short hours of debate on a matter so vitally affecting the political affairs of this continent, and particularly of the United States.

I just stated that I was in the beginning disposed to accept the President's view of this question. This feeling arose not only from the high regard I have for the President personally and otherwise, but from the fact that the casual reading I had up to that time given the Hay-Pauncefote treaty and the various articles written upon it seemed to indicate that under the ordinary rules of interpretation we were morally bound to carry out what seemed to be the intent of the treaty, and that while the bargain may have been a bad one, we were under a distinct obligation to keep faith in an international matter, just as one would do in an individual matter. If I could be convinced that the apparent meaning of the treaty were the real meaning, I should vote for the pending bill, regardless of its effect upon the coastwise commerce of the country, the political status of the United States, or the effect upon my own political future.

THE ECONOMIC QUESTION.

In the first place, let us look for a moment at the history of legislation, from the very beginning of our Government, as to the free use of our rivers and harbors by citizens of the United States.

Even while we were a confederation of colonies we find that acting under the Articles of Confederation an ordinance was passed July 13, 1787, creating the Northwest Territory, and article 4 of that act provides:

The navigable waters leading into the Mississippi and St. Lawrence and the carrying places between the same shall be common highways and forever free, as well to the inhabitants of the said territory as to the citizens of the United States, and those of any other States that may be admitted into the Confederacy, without any tax, impost, or duty thereon.

Section 9 of Article I of the Constitution of the United States provides that—no tax or duty shall be laid on articles exported from any State, nor shall vessels bound to or from one State be obliged to enter, clear, or pay duties in another.

When the territorial government of Orleans was formed by the act of March 2, 1805, the language of the ordinance of 1787 was incorporated in the act.

The United States stipulated with the State of Louisiana, as one of the conditions under which the State was admitted to the Union, that the Mississippi and its navigable branches and other navigable waters of the State should be forever free, and that no tax, duty, impost, or toll should ever be imposed by the State.

June 4, 1812, Congress passed an act for the government of the Territory of Missouri, and section 15 of that act provided that—

The Mississippi and Missouri Rivers and the navigable waters flowing into them and the carrying places between the same shall be common highways and forever free to the people of said Territory and to the citizens of the United States, without any tax, duty, or impost therefor.

The rivers and harbors act of 1884 provides that vessels of all kinds engaged in domestic commerce on our rivers, lakes, and canals should be free from the payment of tolls. The National Government has spent millions of dollars upon our rivers and harbors, as a fixed policy for the purpose of encouraging and promoting water transportation—latterly, because it acted as a check upon railroad rates. It has expended more than $100,000,000 on the Mississippi and Ohio Rivers and their branches upon the theory that it was wise to promote our domestic commerce upon our waterways, and it is held that even if not a ton of freight is moved on some of these waterways, the people generally get a direct benefit far in excess of the cost of the improvements by reason of the lower freight rates which the railroads must maintain on account of the threat of water transportation.

At considerable expense Prof. Emory Johnson was employed as an expert to figure on the amount of tonnage that could reasonably be expected to pass through the canal in order to arrive at a fair basis of rates. He figures that free tolls to our coastwise vessels will save in 10 years to the people of the United States the sum of $100,000,000 in reduced freight rates on our transcontinental railroads. Every man, woman, and child on our transcontinental railroads and their branches will receive his or her proportionate share of this saving. Under the long-and-short-haul provision of our interstate-commerce act, it will affect rates from either seaboard to interior points as well as the through rates from either seaboard to the other.

It will be seen, therefore, by those who have favored the repeal because "no tolls" to coastwise shipping was in the nature of a subsidy that it has been the fixed policy of this country from the beginning to allow free access to its waters to our vessels engaged in domestic commerce. The Panama Canal is wholly ours, is built on land over which we exercise complete sovereignty and should do so, was built by American engineers with American money, and is an object lesson to the world as the last word in engineering skill and modern methods of sanitation.

It is worth while to consider in this connection that foreign Governments pay direct subsidies to their shipping interests, and, besides, rebate to their vessels the tolls paid in passing through the Suez Canal, and will probably do so to their vessels using the Panama Canal. Ambassador Page made the admission recently that even as matters now are, with our coastwise vessels favored by the exemption of tolls, Great Britain will be benefited much more than the United States by the building of the canal, for our shipping has largely been driven from the seas. If it is bad policy thus to favor our water transportation, it has certainly the approval that many years of usage gives.

SHALL WE CONFESS JUDGMENT?

But this question, by reason of the circumstances under which it has been presented for our consideration, and by reason of the far-reaching consequences of legislation thus enacted under strong pressure of the Executive, with the specific statement that it was asked by him "in support of the foreign policy of the administration," with the further statement that he would "not know how to deal with other matters of even greater delicacy and nearer consequence if you do not grant it to me in ungrudging measure," has assumed an importance away beyond the economic question involved. The legislative branch of the Government is asked to reverse itself without raising the question whether it was right or wrong. These facts raise the question at once as to the source of the pressure brought to bear on the Executive to cause him to reverse the steadfast policy of this Government through many years. Are we thus to acknowledge our position wrong at the dictation of a foreign Government with the plainly interested motive of favoring the interests of its citizens? Shall we lay down without a fight and give up our hitherto impregnable position?

To our people of West Virginia this would seem analogous to their acknowledging that their cause now pending in the Supreme Court, the Virginia Debt case, should be settled according to the contentions of the State of Virginia without requiring that the case be properly contested before the tribunal having jurisdiction.

There is, Mr. Speaker, according to competent authorities, a very grave doubt as to the correctness of position of those who favor this repeal. That being the case, I shall resolve that doubt in favor of the American contention, for, right or wrong, I am with my country, but in this I am fully convinced the American position is right.

TREATIES.

Let us consider some of the points that seem to me to show that the coastwise shipping of the United States was not intended to be covered by the provisions of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, or, if by any construction it could be considered to be included, the totally different conditions under which the canal was finally built, and the later modification of the treaty by consent of Great Britain rendered that portion of the treaty inoperative. I shall not attempt to present an extended legal argument as to them. Even if I could do so I should not, but I shall set forth a few points that seem simple and convincing to me.

In the first place it must be remembered that ships of foreign nations are not allowed to engage in coastwise trade. A foreign vessel after discharging its load at one of our seaports can not there take on a cargo for coastwise delivery at the port where a cargo of export stuff is ready for shipment. Under our laws it must proceed light, or without cargo, from the first port to the second where the outgoing cargo is to be loaded. From this it will be seen that our coastwise traffic does not come into competition with foreign vessels, and that any discrimination in favor of our coastwise traffic can not be twisted into being a discrimination against any foreign nation.

In 1815 the United States made a treaty with Great Britain, and in that treaty occurs the following (part of article 2):

No higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed in any of the ports of the United States on British vessels than those payable in the same ports by vessels of the United States; nor in the ports of any of His Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe on the vessels of the United States than shall be payable in the same ports on British vessels.

Now, this paragraph seems plainly to imply that all our vessels in British ports would receive the same treatment as any British vessels, and vice versa. The fact is that at no time has this provision been held by either nation to include vessels in the coastwise trade, both nations giving their own coastwise vessels advantages over the vessels of the other and over all others. Neither country has ever maintained that the other could not discriminate in favor of its coastwise shipping, and quite recently our rights under that treaty have been upheld by our Supreme Court in the case of Olsen v. Smith (195 U. S., 344), Mr. Justice White having rendered the decision.

Sections 1 and 2 of Article III of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty of 1901 are as follows:

1. The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

2. The canal shall never be blockaded, nor shall any right of war be exercised nor any act of hostility be committed within it. The United States, however, shall be at liberty to maintain such military police along the canal as may be necessary to protect it against lawlessness and disorder.

It will be observed that section 1 is very similar in its apparent meaning to that of the treaty of 1815, and if the latter treaty has never been held to include coastwise traffic, section 1 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty may reasonably be open to the same construction.

Again, when the treaty of 1901 was negotiated it was not contemplated by either party to the treaty that the canal would ever be built at Panama and over and upon land of the United States. This change in the situation has been recognized by England with reference to fortifying the canal, plainly prohibited by section 2 of Article III of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, in words from the English foreign office, as follows:

Now that the United States has become the practical sovereign of the canal, His Majesty's Government do not question its title to exercise belligerent rights for its protection.

If the changed conditions caused this recognition of the sovereign rights of the United States with reference to fortifying the canal and with reference to our war vessels, why would not the same conditions affect our coastwise vessels, even if by any construction they were brought under the terms of the treaty as originally drafted?

But many may insist that the language—sections 1 and 2 of Article III—I have quoted above of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty clearly provides against discrimination in favor of our vessels of any kind, and that thereby we lost the right to thus favor our coastwise trade, which is purely domestic trade between the States. On that subject I am going to quote Senator LODGE, of Massachusetts, who voted against tolls exemption when the law now sought to be repealed was pending in the Senate and who now favors its repeal. I quote from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of July 17, 1912:

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, it so happened that I was in London when the second Hay-Pauncefote treaty was made, and, although the draft was sent from this country, that treaty was really made in London. I mention this merely to show that I had some familiarity with the formulation as well as the ratification of that treaty. When the treaty was submitted by the President to the Senate it so happened that I had charge of it and reported it to the Senate.

The second Hay-Pauncefote treaty, as Senators will remember, embodied, in substance, the amendments which the Senate had made to the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty. England had refused to accept those amendments, and then the second treaty was made embodying in principle all for which the Senate had contended.

When I reported that treaty my own impression was that it left the United States in complete control of the tolls upon its own vessels. I did not suppose then that there was any limitation upon our right to charge such tolls as we pleased upon our own vessels or that we were included in the phrase "all nations."

Again, on July 20, 1912, Senator LODGE stated on the floor of the Senate in reiteration of this view, referring to the Bard amendment:

I voted against it in the belief that it was unnecessary; that the right to fix tolls, if we built the canal or it was under our auspices, was undoubted. I know that was the view taken by the then Senator from Minnesota, Mr. Davis, who was at that time chairman of the committee. I certainly so stated on the floor. * * *

I personally have never had any doubt that the matter of fixing tolls must necessarily be within our jurisdiction, and when I referred to our going to The Hague as useless I did not mean because our case was not a good one. I meant because, in the nature of things, we could by no possibility have a disinterested tribunal at The Hague. It would be for the interest of every other nation involved to prevent our fixing the tolls according to our own wishes. * * * I know that was my opinion and the opinion of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations at the time.

For the reasons I have briefly given, Mr. Speaker, as well as for others I can not now take time to set forth, I must cast my vote against the pending measure, believing firmly that the interests of the people of my State and of the Nation demand it.

[Mr. HUGHES of West Virginia addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. MANAHAN. Mr. Speaker, during the general debate and while my colleague, Mr. STEVENS, was discussing the effect of free tolls upon American shipping, I asked him this question:

Is it not a fact that the Hill railroads in the Northwest are vitally interested in getting this repeal which the gentleman advocates?

In replying to this question he said:

I have been on the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce for more than 10 years and during all of the time this legislation has been in force, and not one single Representative, not one person, directly or indirectly, representative of any railroad or transportation company, except the steamboats, has ever come to any member of the committee that I know, urging in any way the repeal of free tolls. And I want to say that I can not make my statement too strong and too vigorous. And, further, I want to brand this statement as absolutely false, without any question of contradiction; and if any man has any statement to the contrary, let him put the names and the facts in the RECORD instead of making insinuations. It is time that kind of talk were stopped in the discussions in the House of Representatives.

Thereupon I addressed the Speaker, asking if the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] would yield for another question, and the following colloquy took place:

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. If the gentleman has a legitimate question I will be glad to answer, but he realizes, no doubt, that I am taking more time than I ought.

Mr. MANAHAN. Is it not a legitimate question to ask you if the Hill lines are not vitally interested in the repeal of this law?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I have never heard about it; and I doubt if anybody else has ever heard about it; and it makes not a particle of difference to any one of them so far as I know. If the gentleman has any facts, let him make them of record instead of making insinuations from a back seat.

THE RAILROADS' INTEREST IN PANAMA TOLLS.

Mr. Speaker, was there any insinuation in asking the simple question as to the interest of transcontinental railroads in defeating effective water competition by way of the canal? Why is such interest of the railroads in this bill so vigorously denied by my colleague, and why does he demand of me to "put the names and the facts in the RECORD"? Would he expect Mr. Hill or any of the other prominent railroad men who have been in Washington during recent months to ask for a public hearing before his committee to testify in opposition to free tolls at Panama? Does the fact that no railroad officials urged upon the committee the repeal of this toll-exemption law prove that the railroads are not vitally interested in such repeal? It is true my question implied that the railroads were interested in compelling our coastwise shipping competing with them to pay tolls at Panama. But why does my colleague become so indignant when I put the question to him, and why does he "brand this statement as absolutely false without any question of contradiction"? I asked a simple question of my colleague and called upon myself a rebuke of "making insinuations from a back seat," which was coupled with the emphatic declaration by Mr. STEVENS that "it makes not a particle of difference to any of them (the railroads), so far as I know."

I make the deliberate statement now that the transcontinental railroads are vitally interested in this bill and are doing everything in their power to secure its passage. Their friends on this floor and in the newspaper world have raised a false and misleading issue by strained construction of our treaty with England and are trying to deceive the public by claiming that it is a question of honor. It is in truth and in fact a question of railroad dividends and commercial selfishness. But let us compare the claim made by my colleague now, that "it makes not a particle of difference" to the transcontinental railroads with the statements made by him in the debate during the Sixty-second Congress on the law we are asked to repeal, as shown in volume 48 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. On page 6671 he said:

Blanket rates can not continue. The minority report assumes that freight rates will continue on the same basis as heretofore after the canal shall be finished. Everyone knows, who will speak sincerely, that this will not be true. The coasts will largely benefit from the necessary reductions. The interior may benefit slightly or not at all.

Again, on page 6673, my colleague, in discussing the effect of free tolls at the canal, said:

Next, the railroads could not stand such reduction in their revenues to meet the water rates to the coast and at the same time maintain only reasonable intermediate and local rates. The expense of operating of railroads is necessarily increasing, and that can not be avoided.

Later in the same speech I find this familiar railroad argument:

The public will demand adequate facilities which must be increased in the very near future, and will also require vast expenditures which can only be met by means of ample revenues.

JAMES J. HILL'S THEORY OF RATES AND REVENUES.

Mr. Hill has repeatedly and publicly made that same argument, which clearly shows that my colleague entertains the notion that railroad rates should be sufficiently high to enable the railroads to have "ample revenues" and thus accumulate sufficient surplus to make permanent betterments by way of adequate facilities. In other words, that the public as freight payers should furnish the permanent capital on which the railroad owners would draw dividends, a theory which I emphatically declare to be unsound economically and manifestly unfair to the general public.

Mr. Speaker, it should not be necessary to argue at length for the purpose of showing that all railroads are vitally interested in their own dividends, or that the dividends of the transcontinental railroads are directly and substantially affected by this bill to repeal the tolls exemption of the coastwise ships. The British Government recognizes that free tolls at Panama for American ships in the coastwise trade would directly affect the revenues of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and therefore that Government protests and urges the repeal of the law on the convenient ground of "honor." Likewise the great newspapers of the Northwest know that free tolls at Panama will cut transcontinental railroad rates and dividends. So they, too, urge, editorially and otherwise, the repeal of the tolls-exemption law, also on the convenient ground of "honor." My colleague, however, not only urges that the Sixty-second Congress and the President were dishonorable in passing the tolls-exemption law, but seeks to frighten us into this repeal by depicting the terrible punishment we shall be subjected to when Canada begins to discriminate against our shipping on the Great Lakes, particularly by way of the Welland Canal, and the Minneapolis Journal dignifies the argument by a learned editorial to the same effect. But what are the facts?

THE CANADIAN DISCRIMINATION THREAT IS ABSURD.

There came a time when the Canadian Government tried to discriminate in favor of her own shippers using the Welland Canal. Our Government protested that it was in violation of our treaty and protested in vain. The British Government refused to yield, although in that case the treaty provisions violated were specific and not as in this case doubtful and ambiguous in their application. In spite of our protests, however, the discrimination continued for years. Finally Congress passed an act, which was approved by President Harrison, "to enforce reciprocal commercial relations between the United States and Canada, and for other purposes." On August 18, 1892, President Harrison, under this act, issued his declaration placing a toll of 20 cents per ton on all freight passing through the St. Marys Falls Canal in transit to any port of Canada. This declaration had a potent effect upon British diplomacy. Great Britain receded and gave the necessary assurances regarding the use of the Welland Canal. Thereupon President Harrison withdrew his proclamation. Let me reassure my timid friends by reminding them that that act of retaliation is yet on our statute books, and may be found in Twenty-seventh Statutes at Large, page 267, chapter 248. It may be invoked at any time.

THE NATIONAL HONOR ARGUMENT HAS NO FOUNDATION.

But why do the newspapers of the Northwest and the special pleaders for this repeal in and out of Congress try to becloud the real issue between rail and water carriers by learned and elaborate arguments regarding our treaties and "our solemn obligations" and by unctuous admonitions to protect and preserve "our national honor"? As a matter of fact, the law exempting our coastwise ships from payment of tolls does not violate our treaty with England when all of the provisions of that treaty are considered in the light of the fact that by another treaty we acquired absolutely the land on which the canal is built, and in the light of the fact also that under our law the ships of no foreign nation can engage in our coastwise trade. The greatest lawyers in the country at the time the law was passed held, and now hold, with few exceptions, that there is no treaty violation in the tolls-exemption law, and that fact was practically conceded by the British Government until Senator Root made his amazing speech in opposition to the position taken by our Government in the matter. There is no dishonor whatever in standing up for our rights as a Nation against the bluffs and claims of an avaricious competitor for the trade and commerce of the world. It is not dishonor; it is patriotism. It is not cowardice; it is courage. I question, however, the honor and honesty of raising false issues in discussing important national and economic questions such as are involved in the management and control of our great canal.

THE REPUBLICAN NATIONAL HONOR GEOGRAPHY.

Mr. Speaker, I have been greatly puzzled by the persistence with which the great Republican newspapers of the Northwest have urged this repeal on the ground that our national honor is involved in it. An analysis of the Republican support of this un-American bill is illuminating. Of course Democratic Members of the House generally support the bill. They have to. The Progressives, to their credit, are practically unanimous in opposition to this repeal. There are 25 Republican Members in the House supporting this bill, and it is a singular and significant fact that 20 of these 25 Republicans are from the Northwest, from the heart of which the great transcontinental lines of the Hill system operate. Seven are from Minnesota, four from Wisconsin, four from Illinois, four from Iowa, and one from North Dakota. Can it be claimed that different sections of our country have different conceptions of national honor? Is it possible that four-fifths of the national honor of the Republican Party is between Chicago and the Red River Valley?

THE NORTHWEST IS NOT DISCRIMINATED AGAINST BY FREE TOLLS.

The selfish suggestion is made that the whole country built the canal, but under the free tolls the coasts will reap a larger benefit than the interior Northwest. Even if this were true, its sectional selfishness would condemn it as a matter of national economics. But it is not true. The interior, and particularly the Northwest reached by water transportation of the Great Lakes and the Mississippi River, would, by virtue of the long-and-short-haul clause controlling rates on the railroads to interior points, benefit equally with the coasts from the lowering of rates on the railroads generally as a result of water competition. What sense is there in complaining that the coast would reap the larger benefit so long as the interior is also benefited, even though possibly to less degree? What justice is there in complaining when we remember that the whole country has for years contributed hundreds of thousands of dollars, spent by the National Government in improving the Mississippi River and the Great Lakes for the purpose of protecting the natural waterways to our section? Is it not clear that no sound argument can be made in opposition to free tolls? Good faith in keeping party pledges, national integrity in maintaining the right to control our domestic affairs, national honor in maintaining unimpaired the Monroe doctrine of our fathers, sound economics, square dealing, and fair treatment to every section of our country, as well as our self-respect as a people, demand the defeat of this British policy and un-American bill.

[Mr. KREIDER addressed the House. See Appendix.]

[Mr. GREENE of Vermont addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. DILLON. Mr. Speaker, if the treaty now under discussion is to be construed as claimed by the advocates of repeal, then it must be admitted that President Roosevelt, John Hay, and the United States Senators made a monumental botch of it. We are called upon to interpret our treaty. The issue is squarely presented by President Wilson in that portion of his message which reads:

> Whatever may be our own differences of opinion concerning this much-debated measure, its meaning is not debated outside of the United States. Everywhere else the language of the treaty is given but one interpretation, and that interpretation precludes the exemption I am asking you to repeal.

Under the gag rule adopted by the House we are not permitted to amend this bill. Neither can we attach to the measure any expression as to our rights in the canal. The demand is here made that we shall surrender our sovereignty over the canal and shall declare for all time that the canal is an international waterway, open to all nations, including the United States, upon equality in its use. I can not believe that this treaty can be given such an unreasonable interpretation.

If the advocates of the measure succeed in passing this bill, it will for all time foreclose the valuable rights we have in this great waterway. As an economic proposition, I would support this measure, and see no reason why the vessels engaging in coastwise trade should not pay just tolls for passing through the canal. But I am not willing to interpret this treaty in favor of the English contention and thus for all time deprive the American people of making such regulations as they see fit for their vessels engaged in coastwise trade. For more than 100 years no country has been allowed to engage in our coastwise trade; yet we are called upon to surrender our rights to regulate our own domestic affairs. England, through the Hon. A. Mitchell Innes, chargé d'affaires, on July 8, 1912, in a letter to the Secretary of State, substantially admits that our coastwise vessels might be free from toll charges without being in conflict with the treaty. In the letter he says:

> As to the proposal that exemption shall be given to vessels engaged in the coastwise trade, a more difficult question arises. If the trade could be so regulated as to make it certain that only bona fide coastwise traffic which is reserved for United States vessels would be benefited by this exemption, it may be that no objection could be taken.

The foreign nations have no interest whatever in our coastwise trade. They are not permitted to engage in it. They ought not prevent us from regulating our coastwise trade as we see fit when they have no interest in the matter.

In the tariff legislation we were asked to turn over to the foreigner the best market in the world. In a large measure we did so. We are now asked to turn over to the foreigner the sovereignty of an American-built canal, and we are further asked to maintain it when it is conceded that it will not pay 2 per cent on the investment. This treaty does not prohibit us from controlling our coastwise trade. Coastwise trade is simply commerce between the States. We may ship from New York to San Francisco by rail, and in so doing we are engaged in interstate commerce. When we ship from New York to San Francisco through the canal we are still engaged in interstate commerce. It is just as much interstate commerce as to ship by rail. The right to control the interstate commerce is vested in Congress under the Constitution. The power exists independent of any treaty-making power. The commerce does not lose its interstate character simply because it goes through the canal.

We obtained the right to use this canal from Panama. The Canal Zone belongs to the United States, and no law can affect our right to use it. It is domestic territory coming under the jurisdiction of Congress, because Congress rules and governs it by its own enactments. John Hay, referring to the canal in submitting the treaty, said:

> When constructed it is exclusively the property of the United States and is to be managed and controlled and defended by it.

Article 2 of the treaty provides that the Government—> shall have and enjoy all the rights incident to such construction, as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and the management of the canal.

The advocates of this bill contend that the use of the words "all nations observing these rules," in rule 1, includes the United States. If such a construction is adopted, it leads to all kinds of confusion, and inconsistencies everywhere arise in this treaty. The United States is one party to the treaty. Great Britain, including all other nations, is the other party.

In article 3 six rules are promulgated which are to govern all nations observing the rules. The rules constitute a covenant on the part of the United States as to the conduct of this Nation toward all nations observing the rules. It is the basis of neutralization adopted by the United States as defining the relationship of one nation to another. If the other nations did not observe the rules laid down by the United States, then they would have no right to use the canal.

Rule 1 proclaims that the canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and war of all nations observing the rules on terms of entire equality. The United States is the owner and the other nations are the beneficiaries. The United States is not occupying the position of owner and contractee. We are the owners, and the others are the users on conditions specified. We are not contracting with ourselves. We simply covenant to grant to the other nations as between themselves equality. They adopted the equality of treatment by being bound by the rules promulgated by the United States. We could not discriminate against them so long as they observed the rules. We must treat them all alike. That was our contract. The United States was not making rules by which it was to govern itself. It is governed by Congress, and it would be a useless procedure to formulate rules for its own affairs, because it could use the canal as it saw fit. The United States being the owner, why, then, need the United States set forth rules concerning that ownership or rules governing its domestic affairs? Must we make rules for ourselves, and then guarantee to be governed by our own rules? If we adopt the interpretation claimed by the supporters of this bill, then rules 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6 can not possibly be harmonized. If we adopt the construction for which we contend, each and every one of the rules harmonize, and all are reasonable regulations.

[Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts addressed the House. See Appendix.]

[Mr. KETTNER addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. HELM. Mr. Speaker, the bill before the House is virtually an effort on the part of Congress to reconstrue a treaty, a function that does rest, and rightfully so, with the judiciary.

Congress is largely composed of politicians, who too frequently are influenced by the political effect of their official acts. For this reason it is unfortunate that a better and more wholesome way could not have been found to have the section of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty in question construed by a judicial tribunal instead of by a legislative body.

The bill proposes a reversal of the tendencies and policies of the present day on all questions of transportation. There has been a general movement in every direction toward cheaper transportation, as evidenced by the passage of the parcel-post act, the proposed public ownership of telephone and telegraph lines, the proposed very extended jurisdiction and control over all interstate commerce, and the enactment by several States of laws reducing railroad rates. The Alaskan railroad project was based partly upon the purpose of the Government to reduce the prohibitory rates of primitive methods of transporting the necessities of life to the pioneers reclaiming that vast domain. The proposed bill is out of all harmony with these movements, that have been termed progressive by those advocating them, and, as said, is a reversal not only of the tendencies of the time but of the time-honored policies of the Government, which has taken hundreds of millions out of its Treasury for the improvement of its rivers and harbors and other waterway projects and never has to this good hour sought to impose the least tax or toll upon the instruments of commerce that reaped the resultant benefits from these liberal expenditures of the public funds.

The canal, which is now rightfully considered a part of our coast line, was conceived and constructed for the prime purpose of reducing the cost of transportation, as well as for strengthening our national defense, and it seems passing strange that it is to be used to increase the cost of transportation. It will be a remarkable condition if, after having acquired the right of way by purchase, after having expended $400,000,000 to construct, after having arranged to forever maintain at our own expense this great water highway of travel, intended for the purpose of emancipating commerce from the strangle hold of the transcontinental railways—it will, I say, be a remarkable condition if, after all, it is to be so manipulated as to become an ally or auxiliary of said railroads.

The canal was intended to be an aid, not a hindrance, to American enterprise and American business, else it had best never been constructed, for unless it is to be an aid and a help to America it represents an insane and a criminal waste of the people's money.

To inaugurate a policy of charging tolls to American vessels engaged in an exclusive American line of trade is as sensible as it would be for a man who owns his home to charge himself and his family rent for occupying the land he has bought and the home he has constructed, or for the owner of a roadway across his own strip of land between two of his farms to charge his own wagons or those assisting him in conducting his business toll for traversing said roadway.

It is necessary for a thorough understanding of the far-reaching effect from the American point of view to place squarely before the House the portions of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty from which this important issue has arisen.

Article 3 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty reads as follows:

The United States adopts as the basis of the neutralization of such ship canal the following rules substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople, signed the 28th October, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Canal; that is to say:

(1) The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nations or its citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

(2) The canal shall never be blockaded, nor shall any right of war be exercised nor any act of hostility be committed within it. The United States, however, shall be at liberty to maintain such military police along the canal as may be necessary to protect it against lawlessness and disorder.

(3) Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not revictual nor take any stores in the canal except so far as may be strictly necessary; and the transit of such vessels through the canal shall be effected with the least possible delay in accordance with the regulations in force, and with only such intermission as may result from the necessities of the service.

Prizes shall be in all respects subject to the same rule as vessels of war of the belligerents.

(4) No belligerent shall embark or disembark troops, munitions of war, or warlike materials in the canal except in case of accidental hindrance of the transit, and in such cases the transit shall be resumed with all possible dispatch.

(5) The provisions of this article shall apply to waters adjacent to the canal within 3 miles of either end. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not remain in such waters longer than 24 hours at any time, except in case of distress, and in such case shall depart as soon as possible; but a vessel of war of one belligerent shall not depart within 24 hours from the departure of a vessel of war of the other belligerent.

The main issue centers in the construction of subsection (1) as applicable to our American products or commerce carried in vessels through the canal from one State to another of the United States, commonly known as interstate commerce.

The existing law concerning tolls for the use of the Panama Canal, now proposed to be repealed, reads as follows:

No toll shall be levied upon vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States.

Note how, in subsection 1 of the treaty, vessels of commerce and of war are indissolubly linked. If the United States has no superior or exclusive rights as regards vessels of commerce, then the same is true of vessels of war. If the United States was intended to be included in the phrase "all nations observing these rules," then any violation by the United States of "these rules" would operate as a forfeiture of its control or deprive us of its use, which can be the only penalty imposed on the nation not "observing these rules." Looking closely, let us see where such a construction would carry us. It is stipulated in the treaty that vessels of war of a belligerent shall not revictual in the canal nor embark or disembark troops in the canal nor take in munition of war or warlike material in the canal. War vessels can not be coaled in the canal or any of its harbors, and are forbidden to remain within 3 miles of either end of the canal for a longer period than 24 hours. Concede the demand made for vessels of commerce, and the ink will not dry before the demands are pressed by England for vessels of war. The United States has every right incident to sovereignty and ownership, and in making the treaty rules were made prescribing the terms on which all nations other than ourselves, the owner, might use the canal. The Navy is the Government's right arm. The passage of the proposed bill paralyzes it, if it does not amputate it. It has been stated that the canal doubled the strength of our Navy. How soon will some pro-British orator rise on this floor and with fervid appeals state that it was wrong, that the treaty did not specifically authorize such a result, and urge for the sake of our national honor that it also should be repealed? Why does not some big-hearted American negotiate a treaty placing our Navy and our coast defense at the disposal of "all nations of the earth," to be used against us, if need be.

I voted to fortify the canal, which I considered a closer question than the one at hand, and I now recall how strenuously it was then insisted by certain Members following the same line of argument in favor of fortifications then that they now use against toll exemption of coastwise commerce. If we subject ourselves to criticism for according to England less than the terms of the treaty might be construed to indicate, thereby jeopardizing our national honor, can England or any of the other foreign nations escape a greater measure of criticism for demanding more than the terms of the treaty warrant? More especially so if this demand is pressed at a time when there is an impending danger of serious complication with a neighboring government. I insist that a nation that would urge such a high sense of national honor and such a delicately poised national conscience on our part would hardly be expected to take advantage of so critical a situation to present its claims or demands at such an indelicate season.

And the question that presents itself is: Have we by terms of the treaty transferred our control and regulations of this portion of our domestic trade to England, and have those who negotiated and ratified this treaty thereby made us the wards of Great Britain? For no one can deny the indisputable fact that if "the canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce" the same is true of "vessels of war," and if we are by the terms prohibited from discriminating in the least in favor of our vessels of commerce, the same rigid construction holds true as to our vessels of war, and we have presented to England with all the compliments of our national honor the most serviceable and valuable Christmas gift she has received in all her history. Behold, what an overwhelming, staggering surprise it must have been when on July 8, 1912, the fully accredited representative of His Majesty's Government, the Hon. A. Mitchell Innes, then conceded that this present at least had some strings tied to it, for he states in his letter to our then Secretary of State, Hon. P. C. Knox, that—

> As to the proposals that exemption shall be given to vessels engaged in the coastwise trade, a more difficult question arises. If the trade could be so regulated as to make it certain that only bona fide coastwise traffic which is reserved for United States vessels would be benefited by this exemption, it may be that no objection could be taken.

That was England's view when she believed us to be sane, now it is different; and it is not surprising that following her traditions she will take the whole earth, if she can get it, especially on such favorable terms as we are now proposing to tender to her this the key to the Western Hemisphere.

Remembering that under the language of the treaty vessels of commerce and vessels of war have precisely the same status, let us see if anything else has transpired since the ratification of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty that sheds any light on the world's interpretation of subsection 1, for be it further remembered that this same subsection includes "all nations," and if any favors are shown one nation they must be extended to all nations except our own, according to the contention of those advocating the repeal of toll exemption to American vessels. The treaty negotiated with but not accepted by Colombia provides:

> The Government of Colombia shall have the right to transport over the canal its vessels, troops, and munitions of war at any time without paying charges of any kind.

This is not all that has transpired since the ratification of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. With full notice to the world, we negotiated and ratified a treaty with Panama which, among other things, stipulated that—

> The Government of the Republic of Panama shall have the right to transport over the canal its vessels and its troops and munitions of war in such vessels at all times without paying charges of any kind.

No protest has ever been registered by any nation against either of these partial constructions of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, thereby clearly demonstrating that we may be permitted to extend privileges to any other nation, but must not make any exemption in our own favor lest we mar our national honor.

If the national honor hinges on the right of Congress to exempt or not to exempt, here are two instances of exemption to be exercised when war is on; we have solemnly granted these extraordinary rights and privileges. Any protest from any source? No. Any question of national honor raised? Never dreamed of. I am talking to the self-styled defenders of the national honor, who are holding up their hands in holy horror at the thought of "exemption in favor of Americans." Admit that a declaration of war ipso facto repeals the treaty, then why the necessity of any stipulation in the treaty about war vessels? But go further and admit that it was wise to include war vessels, still in view of the Colombian and Panaman treaties the right "to exempt" still stares you in the face, because you have "exempted"—right as to war, unhallowed as to commerce. No. You can not square your actions by that rule. We can give, but we may not keep what we have nor use to our advantage what we own.

Other official actions of equal importance and like significance have been taken by those duly authorized and empowered to speak and act for and on behalf of our Government that I do not deem it necessary now to mention. Suffice it to say that the Baltimore Democratic national convention, which convened shortly after the bill exempting the interstate commerce from the canal tolls had passed the House of Representatives, declared that—

> We favor the exemption from tolls of American ships engaged in coastwise trade passing through the Panama Canal. We also favor legislation forbidding the use of the canal by ships owned and controlled by railroad carriers engaged in transportation competitive with the canal.

On August 15, 1912, the President, addressing the New Jersey farmers, featured this plank of our platform in his usual happy way. He said:

> One of the great objects in cutting that great ditch across the Isthmus of Panama is to allow farmers who are near the Atlantic to ship to the Pacific by way of the Atlantic ports; to allow all of the farmers on what I may, standing here, call this part of the continent, to find an outlet at ports of the Gulf or the ports of the Atlantic seaboard and then have coastwise steamers carry their products down around through the canal and up the Pacific coast, or down the coast of South America. Now at present there are no ships to do that, and one of the bills pending—passed, I believe, yesterday by the Senate as it had passed the House—provides for free tolls for American ships through that canal and prohibits any ship from passing through which is owned by a railroad company. You see the object of that, don't you? [Applause.] We don't want the railroads to compete with themselves, because we understand that kind of competition. We want water carriers to compete with land carriers, so as to be perfectly sure that you are going to get better rates around the canal than you would across the continent.
> The farmers of this country are, in my judgment, just as much concerned in the policy of the United States with regard to the canal as any other class of citizens of the United States. Probably they are more concerned than any other class, and what I am most desirous to see is the farmers of the country coming forward as partners in the great national undertaking and take a wide national, nay, international, view of these great matters, feeling all the pulses of the world that beat in the arteries of their own life and prosperity. Everything that is done in the interest of cheap transportation is done directly for the farmers as well as for other men, so that you are not to grudge the millions poured out for the deepening and opening of the old and new waterways.
> Our platform is not molasses to catch flies. It means business. It means what it says. It is the utterances of earnest and honest men who intend to do business along those lines, and who are not waiting to see whether they can catch votes with those promises before they determine whether they are going to act upon them or not.
> They know the American people are now taking notice in a way in which they never took notice before, and gentlemen who talk one way and vote another are going to be retired to a very quiet and private retreat.

The people may not have had a bird's-eye view of the canal situation from a diplomatic standpoint, but they did know that they had bought, paid for, and owned the canal, and they believed that the benefits resulting from its construction were to accrue to them and not to a foreign nation that had contributed nothing to its construction.

Having shown by the letter of England's own representative, as well as by the treaties negotiated and ratified with other nations without protest, which ought to be convincing that the act exempting our bona fide coastwise trade does not militate against but harmonizes with former constructions of the treaty that have been acquiesced in, the extreme solicitude concerning the national honor would appear to be unwarranted.

So much for the national-honor side of the argument. I would that other nations had kept their national honor as bright as we have kept, and will continue to keep, ours.

I pass to the subsidy side of the argument.

If the American coastwise trade was not reserved by law exclusively for American vessels and foreign vessels were permitted to participate in this trade and it was proposed to grant any exemption to American vessels that were competing with foreign vessels conducting a like business, then I grant such action would smack of subsidy; but such has not been and is not in contemplation. The coastwise trade will, as it has in the past, continue to be wholly confined to American enterprise. If any noncompetitive monopoly exists in this trade, then the Sherman antitrust law is the remedy.

No foreign vessel, under existing law, which it is not proposed to change in the least, can carry American products moving from the Atlantic to the Pacific. It therefore follows that there can be no foreign competition in transportation of our interstate commerce through the canal. This being true, how does the proposed exemption of our interstate commerce clash with the terms of the treaty and where does the great hue and cry about the violation of our plank against ship subsidy as well as the national honor come in? Neither can a railroad-owned nor a trust-owned vessel go through the canal. Only American vessels competing for American coastwise trade can go through it.

It is not proposed to repeal the existing law, which prohibits railroad-owned and trust-owned vessls from passing through the canal. So that those, if any, who have been under the impression that the toll exemption as now granted and which is now proposed to be repealed by the bill under consideration operates as a gratuity to any railroad or any trust-owned vessels can dismiss the thought from their minds.

Would it not be a more magnanimous act—in fact, are not the advocates of the repeal of the canal exemption law driven to the necessity of pulling down the bars and permitting foreign countries to engage in our coastwise trade, thereby giving both the profit derived and the labor employed in the business to foreigners, by repealing the law that now excludes them?

I have always been hopeful that this canal could be used so as to rehabilitate our merchant marine; that it would be the beginning of the restoration of American vessels on the seas. For me, at least, it will not be a source of gratification that other nations are to derive the greatest benefits from its construction.

Suppose the European Governments, as some of them have done, pass laws granting bounties equal to the toll charged their ships for going through the Panama Canal and we repeal the exemption now allowed American coastwise trading vessels, then the canal becomes a positive liability instead of an asset to us in aid of our interstate commerce.

Railroad-owned boats that always have been and are now granted free passage ever since the policy of river and harbor improvements, through the locks of our navigable streams, which locks, as the canal, were constructed at Government expense, and yet the suggesting of "subsidy" to the railroads for this free usage has never been made. The boats of the Steel Trust, in transporting its ores and other raw materials, are given absolutely free use of the Sault Ste. Marie Canal, through which greater tonnage passes than is cleared annually at the New York Harbor, which canal was constructed, paid for, and maintained just as the Panama Canal was and will be, and yet no one has raised his voice or even intimated that the Government was thereby giving the Steel Trust a subsidy.

In 1884, a Democratic year, if I am not mistaken, a section was placed in the river and harbor bill declaring that—

No tolls or operating charges whatever shall be levied upon or collected from any vessel, dredge, or other water craft for passing through any lock, canal, canalized river, or other work for the use and benefit of navigation now belonging to the United States or that may be hereafter acquired or constructed.

And this has been the steadfast policy of our Government ever since.

The Underwood tariff bill, enthusiastically indorsed, allows a reduction of 5 per cent on all custom duties on goods imported in American ships. This reduction has its warrant from the act of July 4, 1879, fathered by James Madison, granting 10 per cent reduction of the tariff duties upon imports to this country in American built and owned ships.

It requires a magnifying glass of the Nth power to detect the subsidy microbes in the act that it is proposed to repeal. But suppose there is a concealed subsidy microbe lurking behind this act? What becomes of the plank in the Baltimore platform, quoted above, placed there by men of tried and approved Democratic faith? Must this specific covenant with the American people go to the junk pile?

Just about 100 years ago, in 1815, the United States and Great Britain entered into a treaty which provided, in article 2:

No higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed in any of the ports of the United States on British vessels than those payable in the same ports by vessels of the United States nor in the ports of any of His Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe on the vessels of the United States than shall be payable in the same ports on British vessels.

Compare this with subsection 1, article 3, of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. Is there not a most striking resemblance? Now, let us see what happened. American vessels engaged in coastwise trade were exempted from certain harbor charges that were imposed on British vessels entering American harbors; she protested; she had to pay them, and an action was brought to recover these fees. Here is what the Supreme Court said:

Nor is there merit in the contention that as the vessel in question was a British vessel coming from a foreign port to the State, laws concerning pilotage are in conflict with a treaty between Great Britain and the United States, providing that no higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed in any of the ports of the United States on British vessels than those payable in the same ports by vessels of the United States. Neither the exemption of coastwise steam vessels from pilotage resulting from the law of the United States, nor any lawful exemption of coastwise vessels created by State law, concerns vessels in the foreign trade, and therefore any such exemption does not operate to produce a discrimination against British vessels engaged in such trade. In substance the proposition but asserts that because by the law of the United States steam vessels in the coastwise trade have been exempt from pilotage regulations, therefore there is no power to subject vessels in foreign trade to pilotage regulations, even although such regulations apply without discrimination to all vessels in such foreign trade, whether domestic or foreign. (Olsen v. Smith, 195 U. S., 344.)

According to this, if the views of those advocating the repeal of the act exempting coastwise trading vessels are sound, our national honor has been lost for almost 100 years, and we have been allowing subsidies for the same length of time without even the shipowners knowing it.

Mr. BROWN of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, tolls or free tolls through the Isthmian Canal primarily is not a partisan question. It is a question of political economy that should be settled by the American Government alone. The canal is the sole and exclusive property of the United States. We paid $10,000,000 for the strip of land through which it passes from the Atlantic to the Pacific. We have practically completed the canal at the expense of $400,000,000. We have fortified it at the expense of $35,000,000, every cent of which was paid by the Government of the United States and every detail worked out by American engineers. Article 3 of the treaty of purchase provides that—

The Republic of Panama grants to the United States all of the rights, power, and authority within the zone mentioned and described in article 2 of this agreement and within the limits of all auxiliary lands and water mentioned and described in said article 2 which the United States would possess and exercise if it were sovereign of the territory within which said lands and water are located to the entire exclusion of the exercise by the Republic of Panama of any sovereign rights, power, or authority.

By this clause it will be observed that the United States Government receives complete sovereignty over the Canal Zone and owns and controls it to the same extent it owns and controls any State or Territory in the Union.

In exercise of its sovereign right, in 1912 the House of Representatives and the Senate of the United States passed a law exempting coastwise ships from the payment of tolls. This bill was signed by the President of the United States, and became a law, and the right of the Government to do this was not then questioned. The issue is, Should this law be now repealed?

The right of coastwise vessels to pass free of tolls through the canal has been upheld by Theodore Roosevelt, William Howard Taft, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in two sessions; once by Secretary Olney, and again by Secretary Knox; by the Supreme Court of the United States; and by a majority of the eminent lawyers and thinkers throughout this land; and has been received and accepted by the people of the United States unchallenged until the 5th of March, 1914, when the President of the United States appeared before Congress and read his message, the concluding sentence of which reads as follows:

We ought to reverse our action without raising the question whether we are right or wrong, and so once more deserve our reputation for generosity and for the redemption of every obligation without quibble or hesitation.

President Wilson should be honored for his fearlessness and intensity of purpose and loved for his persistency in the right, as he is given to see the right; but, like other people, it is possible for him to be mistaken. In his message he asks us as a Nation to be generous. Before being generous, however, to other nations should we not be just to ourselves? Personally I have indorsed and voted for every measure promulgated by his administration, even to Government construction and ownership of railroads in Alaska; but, in May, 1912, in all good conscience, I advocated free tolls, and in that position I was not alone, for I stood with our distinguished citizen and my former colleague, Hon. John W. Davis, of the first congressional district of West Virginia. No argument has been presented since then to change my opinion. I have no quarrel with those who will vote for the repeal of the tolls bill. I concede to them the right to vote their convictions on all subjects of legislation, but claim the same right for myself.

The canal was built for two purposes; primarily to enable the United States to more quickly assemble her fleet in either the Atlantic or Pacific in case of war or necessity. It was devised as a war measure. Secondarily, and incidentally, it was intended for the cheap and expeditious transfer of the products of one section of this country to another.

The distinguished gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS], in his presentation of this bill, declared "that on questions of party doctrine our President is supreme, being the court of last resort." Can we subscribe to this doctrine? If the President can override one plank in the platform, does it not give him the right to overturn them all? He was nominated on the Baltimore platform, which declared for free tolls in the following unequivocal terms:

We favor the exemption from tolls of American ships engaged in coastwise trade passing through the Panama Canal.

He campaigned on the Baltimore platform; he advocated the Baltimore platform, and he was elected on the Baltimore platform, and in his speech while a candidate for the Presidency he said to an audience at Washington Park, N. J.:

What interest have you in opening the canal to the ships of the world? We do not own the ships of the world. One of the great objects in cutting that great ditch across the Isthmus of Panama is to allow farmers who are near the Atlantic to ship to the Pacific by way of Atlantic ports, to find an outlet at ports of the Gulf or ports of the Atlantic seaboard, and then have coastwise steamers carry their products down around through the canal and up the Pacific coast. One of the bills pending—passed, I believe, yesterday by the Senate as it had passed the House—provides for free toll for American ships through that canal, and prohibits any ship from passing through which is owned by any American railroad company. You can see the object of that, can't you? We don't want the railroads to compete with themselves, because we understand that kind of competition. We want water carriage to compete with land carriage, so as to be perfectly sure that you are going to get better rates around the canal than you would across the continent.

Hear what no less eminent authority than our Secretary of State, Mr. Bryan, has to say upon the sanctity of a platform:

As a believer in the Democratic theory of representative government I desire to announce it as a settled principle not to be questioned in this country that a platform is binding upon every honest man who runs upon that platform. I have heard it said by men after an election that they could not conscientiously support something in their platform, and it raises a very important question whether a man should violate his conscience as a public servant, and I frankly tell you that I believe that no man should violate his conscience, either as an individual or as a public servant. Far be it from me to say that any man elected to any office should as an official do a thing that his conscience condemns. But does this mean that he should violate his platform? No; it seems that his conscience should commence to work before the election and not hibernate until after the election.

Should not the party platform be a "confession of faith" by the party promulgating it, and ought it not be held sacred and inviolate? But in one breath, regardless of the Baltimore platform, those favoring the repeal maintain that they advocate the surrender of our sovereignty in the Panama Canal because of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty; that there is no threat on the part of any nation or no demand made upon us, but that it is done voluntarily on our part and as an act of generosity and fair treatment. In the next breath they tell us that England and other nations have put their interpretation upon this treaty, and that we must accede to their views or it may involve us in serious complications or even war; and, in fact, the President's message can be construed to mean nothing else.

Article 2 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, which is claimed to require tolls, reads as follows:

It is agreed that the canal may be constructed under the auspices of the Government of the United States, either directly at its own cost, or by gift or loan of money to individuals or corporations, or through subscription or purchase of stock or shares; and that, subject to the provisions of the present treaty, the said Government shall have and enjoy all the rights incident to such construction, as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal.

And section 1 of article 3 reads as follows:

The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect to the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

Reading these sections together there can be but one construction, and that is that this Government must control and govern the canal. Moreover, the laws of the United States provide that no foreign vessels shall engage or compete in carrying on its coastwise trade. Therefore what effect could it have or interest would it be to other nations whether our coastwise trade went through the canal with or without tolls? If the coastwise vessels must pay tolls by the terms of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, it is equally binding on our war vessels to pay tolls, which can not for one minute be upheld or defended. In short, England's demand is that the Panama Canal shall be an international highway over which all the nations of the world shall pass, enjoying equal rights with the United States by paying a fixed toll. If this be so, what have we to show for our $500,000,000? Why spend $35,000,000 in fortifying a canal that does not belong to us? Why build fortifications and plant cannon that we can never use?

It has been charged upon the floor of the House that those voting for free tolls were voting in the interests of ship subsidies. Everyone familiar with the history of this country knows that since the canal was first discussed all transcontinental lines of railroad bitterly fought the proposition. It was contended that the canal would lower the rates on ocean-to-ocean transportation, and therefore compel the railroads to carry freight in competition with this great waterway. Every possible obstruction and opposition was raised by the railroads, and even now you can see their hand in the management and direction of the repeal. Every ton of freight carried through the canal at $1.20 per ton will enable the railroads to charge that amount as additional freight; that is to say, that on a freight car carrying 50 tons of freight from the Atlantic to the Pacific the railroads will receive $60 more than they would if the ships went through without tolls. And it is just as fair to say that those voting against free tolls were voting in favor of a railroad subsidy as those voting for free tolls were voting in favor of a ship subsidy. It is well also not to overlook this fact, that of all transcontinental lines in North America the Canadian lines will benefit more by the tolls than any line within the limits of the United States, for the reason that being nearer the pole the distance is shorter. In this discussion criminations and recriminations should be avoided.

The Hay-Pauncefote treaty, to say the least, is open to controversy. Much authority is quoted for both sides, but the majority of eminent lawyers and statesmen have adhered to the view that the United States has the right to control the Canal Zone. In case of doubt, why not take the side of safety? Why not, all lovers of peace, invoke the Hague treaty? This would be far better than an unconditional surrender. But let us examine the precedents. Every lock and dam built by the United States within her borders is thrown open to American vessels using them free of tolls. Why should we not have the same right, should we desire it, with the Isthmian Canal?

Mr. Speaker, in this debate I do not want to overlook the interests of my own State. Rich veins of coal are cropping out of every hill and mountain side along the banks of the Monongahela and its headwaters, the Cheat, and along both shores of the Ohio and its tributaries, waiting to be mined. This can be loaded upon barges, which will pass through the locks of the Ohio and into the Mississippi and on down to New Orleans, free of tolls, there to be transferred to ocean-going vessels and carried to San Diego, Los Angeles, San Francisco, Portland, Seattle, and Tacoma, where this product is so badly needed for the coaling of the great steamships of the Pacific. With free transportation, the $1.20 which will be imposed as tolls through the canal, if the repeal passes, would be divided between the producer and the consumer. In this way the miners within the borders of the States of West Virginia, Ohio, Indiana, Kentucky, and Illinois would be furnished with a wider market, which would bring them steadier work and better pay.

My reasons for voting against the repeal can be summed up as follows:

First. I will cast my vote as my conscience and judgment dictate.

Second. I will vote against the repeal because I believe the Hay-Pauncefote treaty will justify that construction and no other.

Third. I will vote for free tolls because it was a plank in the Baltimore platform.

Fourth. I will vote with the great leaders of the party, those who have fought long and hard for the overthrow of monopoly and for the rights of the common people, and those who, by their brilliant leadership when they were in the minority in the House, made Democratic success possible.

Fifth. I will vote for free tolls because I believe it is un-American to vote otherwise.

Sixth. I would as readily vote to surrender the sovereignty of any of the great States of our Union as surrender our sovereignty to the canal which the United States bought and constructed and fortified at the cost of nearly $500,000,000.

Seventh. I do not believe in permitting other nations arbitrarily to construe the language of our treaties.

Eighth. That if we surrender to Great Britain now and concede her demands, we and our children and our children's children will forever lose control and sovereignty in this zone and can never again return to free tolls.

Ninth. If we establish our rights to free tolls now, it gives us full control, and at any time in the future by act of Congress we can levy such tolls upon our coastwise vessels as the necessity of the case demands.

Tenth. If it is true that England has made a demand upon us, I am unwilling to purchase our peace at any price. As has been so well said heretofore, we have millions for defense but not one cent for tribute. If she demands a surrender of our sovereignty and a concession of our rights in the Canal Zone or fight, I am for a fight. Uncle Sam whipped her in his infancy, he whipped her in his boyhood, and now, in the strength of his splendid manhood, inspired by the memories of Yorktown and Bunker Hill, he is not afraid to again engage her in battle.

Eleventh. I am unwilling to take the Stars and Stripes from the masthead and let them float in humiliation at half-mast along the fortifications of the canal as an everlasting evidence of our cowardly surrender to any power on earth.

Twelfth. I am an advocate of peace, but we must have peace with honor.

And, lastly, with CHAMP CLARK, OSCAR UNDERWOOD, FITZGERALD, of New York, CLAUDE KITCHIN, FRANK DOREMUS, and other great leaders, I am not afraid of having my vote or patriotism questioned. Before I would intentionally vote to concede one inch of American soil or surrender a just claim of our sovereignty to any nation on earth I would surrender my seat in Congress. I may be wrong—time alone will tell—but I will vote for what I believe to be the best interests of the American people, both in the second congressional district of West Virginia and throughout this broad land of ours, for on this question there is no common ground; it affects the honor, the integrity, and the patriotism of the whole Nation.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. Speaker, to me the subject of the repeal of the canal tolls act reduces itself to a very simple matter. Sixty-four years ago the United States and Great Britain entered into a treaty for the "constructing and maintaining of a ship communication" between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans at Panama "for the benefit of mankind, on equal terms to all." The treaty was signed for the United States by James W. Clayton, Secretary of State, and for Great Britain by the Rt. Hon. Sir Henry Lytton-Bulwer, member of the privy council and ambassador to Washington.

This was a free, voluntary act on the part of both countries, embodying the lofty purpose of promoting commerce between the oceans on the terms of equal rights for all and special privileges to none—surely a proper work for a great and growing democratic Republic dedicated to our principles.

Fifty years later the United States and Great Britain entered into another treaty, known as the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. The purpose of this new treaty was to "remove any objection which might arise out of the convention of April 19, 1850."

Secretary of State John Hay, who signed this treaty for the United States, subsequently reported to the Senate that "the whole theory of the treaty (Hay-Pauncefote) is that the canal is to be an entirely American canal. The enormous cost of constructing it is to be borne by the United States alone. When constructed it is to be exclusively the property of the United States and is to be managed and controlled and defended by it."

The central idea of this treaty, like that of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, was that the canal should be open to the use of all nations on terms of entire equality.

Presumably believing that neither of these treaties bound the United States from allowing its own coastwise commerce to enjoy a special privilege in respect to tolls, Congress passed an act exempting our coastwise ships from any charge. But as the President of the United States clearly pointed out in his message to Congress, whatever differences of opinion there may be among Americans as to the justification of this act under the treaty there is only one view of it in the eyes of the rest of the world, which is that by this act of Congress we have broken the treaty.

The world regards us as promising, in the words of the treaty, "the constructing and maintaining" of a ship communication between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans at Panama "for the benefit of mankind on equal terms to all." Surely, at the time of making this treaty we had no thought of exempting our coastwise ships from tolls that should be charged to all other ships, for if we had we could, and probably would, have made that exemption a part of the treaty. But, however that may be, the world at large considers such act of exemption now as a breaking of faith and not a devotion of the canal for the benefit of mankind "on equal terms to all."

Of course, if we do not care for the opinion of mankind, it matters not how the world differs with us; but if we seek peace and concord and progress with the nations of the world we must respect their opinions.

We show our greatness in holding to the principle of the original treaty to build and operate the canal "for the benefit of mankind on equal terms to all." And were the cost of the canal to be four thousand instead of four hundred millions, our course should be the same. I shall take joy in voting for the repeal of the act giving free tolls to American coastwise ships, feeling that we shall thereby keep faith with the world, as the world understands that faith to be set out in the treaty—building and operating the canal for the benefit of mankind on "equal terms to all."

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, our Republican friends have very severely criticized the President for his making the request of Congress that it repeal that portion of the Panama Canal act of 1912 which affords to our coastwise vessels the use of the canal free of tolls. They have seen proper to call it a surrender to Great Britain. They have seen fit to say it is a repudiation of our platform pledges, and therefore a betrayal of the American people.

Irrational patriotism is no better than a complete lack of patriotism. No nation can boast of patriotism and at the same time have its honesty impugned by the civilized nations of the earth.

Some gentlemen have flippantly asserted that there is no doubt about the right of this Nation to do as it pleases about its coastwise trade. That is absolutely true in the absence of a solemn treaty for the use of a great international waterway connecting the two oceans. But it may be well to call the attention of gentlemen who have made this assertion to the fact that the greatest diplomats, international lawyers, and publicists of the world differ with them as to our rights under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

The crux of this whole situation seems to have been lost sight of in the eagerness of both sides—or, I should say, three sides—to obtain political advantage. Exaggerated and unfounded statements have been made as to the motives of those who differ on this great question. Some gentlemen have talked at random about night conferences with the President, at which certain concessions were made to foreign countries that would not bear the white light of the noonday sun. Who believes such claptrap? Who believes that our distinguished Speaker, who bears the scars of many honorable battles for the people in their struggle for freedom from special privilege, could entertain any other than patriotic and honest views on this question? Who for a moment would question the convictions of that man who has so valiantly led the forces of the people upon the floor of this House for the last three years? No one who has a thimbleful of brains or discretion. This is a question upon which honest men may differ and differ widely. It is a question of expediency. It is a question of economic policy. Then let us look at it for a moment in that light without impugning the motives or doubting the patriotism or Americanism of any.

First, let us consider the platform of the Democratic Party as promulgated and declared at the Baltimore convention. I shall not question how the free-tolls plank for coastwise vessels got into the platform. It is there. Neither shall I question how, in the same paragraph, the solemn declaration against ship subsidy or special privilege got in there. It is also there.

In connection with the bill now before the House, and upon which I am called to express by my vote the will of my people, these two declarations are utterly irreconcilable and inconsistent. It is a human impossibility for me to remain silent and comply with both declarations, and it is also an impossibility to vote and comply with both. How, then, am I to act? What shall I do to reflect the will of my people upon the everlasting and indelible records of this Congress?

My sense of duty to those whom I represent compels me to use my best judgment and do that which will be most prudent and which will guard their interests most sacredly. So, Mr. Speaker, I shall do as I did before when this question was up for consideration—vote against any privilege to any person or number of persons that the humblest citizen I represent can not enjoy and would not enjoy by virtue of granting free tolls to our coastwise vessels.

If I should come to the forks of a road, and the signboard read, "Take the right or the left," would I violate my instructions if I took either road? So in this case I have no compunctions of conscience in taking the road I think will lead me farthest away from special privilege and national dishonor.

Some gentlemen who have given quite a good deal of study to this question say that if you withhold free tolls from our coastwise vessels you help the transcontinental railroads. Others say if we grant free tolls we hurt the transcontinental railroads. Then, in either event, the people whom we are here to represent are hurt. Where and how do they come into this fight? The American people, as I understand it, built this canal not for the benefit of the railroads or the Shipping Trust. My people entered into no such compact, and, sir, there is no platform strong enough or kangaroo pen high enough to hold me to a contract my people are not a party to and by which my people do not profit.

Talk about transcontinental railroads. Some gentlemen have been unkind enough to say that those of us who are against this ship subsidy are so voting to help these railroads. There never was a more baseless argument made on the floor of this House. Why, sir, the coastwise vessels to-day are carrying freight from the Atlantic to the Pacific, going clear around Cape Horn, for less freight charges per ton than is charged by the railroads from New York to Chicago. The coastwise vessels have all the underhold now. They have an absolute, unmolested monopoly under the law. Why hand them millions of dollars in free tolls that will not benefit a living soul but the shipowners? Shipowners are just like railroads and all other public-utility corporations; they always have charged and always will charge the people every penny they will pay for a given service unless hindered by the strong arm of the law.

We have just passed a bill appropriating $35,000,000 to build a railroad in Alaska. Would any gentleman support a measure to allow American citizens to ride free and carry their freight free over this road and charge only Canadians, Scandinavians, and Japanese? Would not this be the height of economic folly? What Congress was after in Alaska was to give people transportation facilities which they did not have or could not get and at the same time make the charges reasonable.

When we constructed the Panama Canal did we not accomplish a feat that the Shipping Trust could not do for itself? Have we not made it possible for coastwise vessels to carry every conceivable class of freight by shortening the distance of travel between the Atlantic and Pacific coasts more than 9,000 miles? Does not this great beneficence on the part of the people of this country outweigh the reasonable tolls assessed for the privileges they will enjoy? You who feel that the coastwise vessels are being outraged by the passage of this bill take notice now of the classifications of freight being carried around the Horn, and see what the classifications will be after the canal is open. This will open avenues of revenue to coastwise vessels that they never dreamed of and will add millions to their revenues.

In the last place, Mr. Speaker, why all this commotion? Why all this patriotic talk about a surrender to a foreign nation? When did the United States surrender anything when it was honorable to maintain her position? She never has and, thank God, she never will, when the people, the burden bearers of this land, are made to see that some foreign power is seeking an unfair advantage. But, sir, the people are benefited by this respectful appeal of England to stand by our contract. We, who bear the brunt of taxation, are helped, not hurt. Those who now enjoy special privileges and who were about to obtain greater privileges are those who raise this howl. We should thank England for calling this to the attention of the President. The people are indebted to their collective wisdom in selecting a President courageous enough to demand this repeal.

Is the granting of free tolls to our coastwise vessels a discrimination against foreign nations, therefore a violation of the treaty?

I respectfully submit that the Supreme Court did not settle this question in the Galveston case, in which pilotage charges imposed by the State of Texas on all foreign vessels was the issue. This law of Texas was a State law. It applied to the vessels of all nations alike. The contention being that under that law Texas could not exempt American vessels engaged in coastwise trade, as it was a discrimination against foreign vessels.

The Supreme Court said to the foreigner, "You can not complain, for under the laws of the Federal Government you can not compete with American coastwise vessels, therefore it can be no discrimination. You foreign nations, so far as Texas is concerned, are afforded equal treatment." This is in no manner applicable to England's contention as to our agreement expressed in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

Suppose, for the sake of illustration, two foreign vessels, one starting from Bremen, Germany, and the other from Liverpool, England, both starting at the same time to load each with 50,000 boxes of California oranges. The English vessel passes through the canal, paying tolls both ways, and takes on her cargo at, say, San Francisco; the German vessel made an agreement with the American coastwise vessels to assemble in the port of New York her 50,000 boxes of oranges. The German vessel takes on her cargo in New York. The coastwise vessels assembling under secret agreement go through the canal free, go to San Francisco and take on her cargo, pass back to New York free of tolls, and deliver to the German ship. Will any thoughtful man say this transaction would not amount to a discrimination against England by our coastwise vessels to the exact amount of the tolls it cost the English to make the round trip through the canal? Mr. Speaker, I submit that a statement of this proposition is an answer in the affirmative to England's contention.

The coastwise vessels of this country could almost destroy the earning capacity of the Panama Canal. They could and probably would deprive the people of millions of dollars that they would otherwise obtain if all ships were treated alike. This may be behind the Shipping Trust's motives to defeat this bill. I won't say. But I will assert that it would amount to a discrimination against a foreign nation, and, in the words of our great President, I conclude:

"The large thing to do is the only thing we can afford to do—a voluntary withdrawal from a position everywhere questioned and misunderstood."

[Mr. CARLIN addressed the House. See Appendix.]

[Mr. FIELDS addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. ADAIR. Mr. Speaker, one gentleman speaking on this bill—who, it would seem has but little respect for our national honor and apparently no interest whatever in the taxpayers of the country—has designated those of us who are standing by the President as rubber-stamp Congressmen. Let me say to the misguided and misinformed gentleman that his charge does not apply to me. I voted against free tolls two years ago and I am going to vote the same way to-day. When I first voted upon this question Woodrow Wilson had not even been nominated for the Presidency, and his position on the question was unknown to me as well as to others. When I first declared myself upon this question the position of Great Britain was unknown to the American people; therefore it can not be contended with the slightest degree of fairness or truthfulness that my vote on this bill is based upon anything other than my judgment and my conscience. However, I am glad to say that it is a pleasure for me to be a follower and supporter of the administration of Woodrow Wilson—one of the greatest Presidents we have ever had—an administration in which graft, corruption, and special privilege have not been a part.

Mr. Speaker, I have been a Member of the House for eight years, during which time I have persistently fought every form of special privilege intended to enrich the few at the expense of the many. Time and again I have been denounced by the trust-owned newspapers of the East as a demagogue because I had the courage to stand upon this floor and fight for the rights of the plain people. More than once have I been threatened with defeat for reelection because of the opposition I have made to those who, through legislation, were seeking a special privilege that would enable them to rifle the pockets of the American people. I stand to-day where I have stood in the past; and as I regard free tolls to the Ship Trust as one of the worst forms of special privilege, I shall vote for this bill. It cost $400,000,000 to build the Panama Canal. Who built it? The Government built it; and the American people were taxed to pay for it. Those who insist upon free tolls argue that it is our canal, and therefore our ships should go through without paying tolls. It is "our canal"; but the ships engaged in coastwise trade are not "our" ships. They belong to the Ship Trust and the transcontinental railroads. Government-owned ships will go through the canal free of tolls. Even if the Government did pay tolls, the money would go back into the Treasury of the United States. Why should the people be taxed $400,000,000 to build a canal for the benefit of one of the most heartless trusts our country has ever known? It will cost $45,000,000 to fortify the canal and about $15,000,000 annually to maintain it, and the people must be taxed to keep up this enormous expense. The Ship Trust, by going through the canal, will save thousands of tons of coal as well as the time it takes to travel 8,000 miles around the Horn, and why should it not pay to the Government a small tonnage tax, to be used in maintaining the canal, and by so doing lift a burden of at least $2,000,000 each year from the shoulders of the American taxpayers?

Mr. Speaker, I represent as loyal and patriotic a constituency as any man on this floor, and those I represent are willing to be taxed for the benefit of the Government they love, but they are not willing to be taxed solely for the benefit of a monopoly whose charges for transportation have already reached the point of extortion, and who, if given free tolls, would still have a monopoly and could not be forced to lower freight rates a single penny. In other words, by giving free tolls to the Ship Trust the Government would lose $2,000,000 annually, no part of which would ever reach the people in the way of cheaper freight rates. For a while the advocates of free tolls tried to boost their cause by pretending to believe there was a fight on between the transcontinental railroads and the Ship Trust, but an investigation has disclosed the fact that 94 per cent of the coastwise ships are owned by the railroads and the Ship Trust, and that they are operating together in maintaining the present high freight rates. The fact is, the proposition to give free tolls is nothing more nor less than a ship subsidy. The Democratic Party has always opposed ship-subsidy legislation in every form. Time and again we have declared against it in our national platforms and have condemned the Republican Party in bitter terms for trying to fasten such a burden on the American people. It is true that the granting of free tolls is not direct ship-subsidy legislation, but indirectly it is, as the result is exactly the same. I am at a loss to understand how any Democrat who believes in the principles of Democracy and who for years has been fighting ship-subsidy legislation can vote against this bill. I am sure no Democrat can do so without turning his back on his past record and the record of his party.

Mr. Speaker, I not only oppose free tolls because it is a special privilege and an indirect subsidy to a vicious trust, but also because I believe it to be a violation of a binding treaty entered into between this country and Great Britain on November 18, 1901. On March 5, 1914, the President of the United States delivered at a joint session of the two Houses of Congress a message in the following words:

Gentlemen of the Congress, I have come to you upon an errand which can be very briefly performed, but I beg that you will not measure its importance by the number of sentences in which I state it. No communication I have addressed to the Congress carried with it graver or more far-reaching implications as to the interest of the country, and I come now to speak upon a matter with regard to which I am charged in a peculiar degree, by the Constitution itself, with personal responsibility.

I have come to ask you for the repeal of that provision of the Panama Canal act of August 24, 1912, which exempts vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States from payment of tolls, and to urge upon you the justice, the wisdom, and the large policy of such a repeal with the utmost earnestness of which I am capable.

In my own judgment, very fully considered and maturely formed, that exemption constitutes a mistaken economic policy from every point of view, and is, moreover, in plain contravention of the treaty with Great Britain concerning the canal concluded on November 18, 1901. But I have not come to urge upon you my personal views. I have come to state to you a fact and a situation. Whatever may be our own differences of opinion concerning this much-debated measure, its meaning is not debated outside the United States. Everywhere else the language of the treaty is given but one interpretation, and that interpretation precludes the exemption I am asking you to repeal. We consented to the treaty; its language we accepted. If we did not originate it, and we are too big, too powerful, too self-respecting a nation to interpret with a too strained or refined reading the words of our own promises just because we have power enough to give us leave to read them as we please. The large thing to do is the only thing we can afford to do, a voluntary withdrawal from a position everywhere questioned and misunderstood. We ought to reverse our action without raising the question whether we were right or wrong, and so once more deserve our reputation for generosity and for the redemption of every obligation without quibble or hesitation.

I ask this of you in support of the foreign policy of the administration. I shall not know how to deal with other matters of even greater delicacy and nearer consequence if you do not grant it to me in ungrudging measure.

WOODROW WILSON.

Mr. Speaker, it will be observed that in the judgment of the President the exemption of coastwise vessels from payment of tolls is not only a mistaken economic policy but is also a violation of our treaty with Great Britain. Not only is it his opinion but it is also the opinion of the ablest international lawyers in our own country as well as the opinion of all the other nations of the world. Can we afford to quibble about a technicality and have our honesty and integrity as a nation questioned by all the Governments of the earth? As the President says, the large thing to do and the right thing to do is to repeal the law and once more deserve our reputation for the redemption of our obligations without quibble or hesitation.

The President has asked this of us in support of his foreign policy and has clearly stated that he will not know how to deal with other matters of greater delicacy and nearer consequence if his request is denied. The President is charged under our Constitution with responsibility for foreign affairs, and he knows better than anyone else the delicacy of the situation and the needs of the hour. It is not patriotic for any Member to question his veracity, honesty, or integrity and embarrass him in dealing with our foreign affairs. Can anyone forget the day when the martyr McKinley simply indicated in a general way that the foreign relations of the Government were in jeopardy when this House immediately and unanimously voted $50,000,000 and placed it in his hands without asking any questions or calling for a bill of particulars. Is not Woodrow Wilson entitled to the same consideration and the same treatment at the hands of this House? He has told us that in order to insure successful conduct of our foreign affairs this repeal should be made at once. During the year he has occupied the White House he has earned and deserves the confidence and support of every patriotic American citizen. His loyalty to our Government is beyond suspicion and his clearness of thought and ability to deal with questions of stupendous importance is beyond question. Let us take him at his word and show our loyalty to him and our devotion to our country by holding up his hands in preserving our national honor and in doing full justice to all the nations of the world.

Mr. Speaker, those who are opposed to repeal argue that because the Baltimore platform declared in favor of free tolls to our coastwise ships that we should therefore vote against repeal. If there is a man in this House who believes in the redemption of platform pledges it is myself. But in the preparation and adoption of the Baltimore platform two conflicting provisions were included, and it is an impossibility for any man to vote on this bill without violating one or the other of these declarations. I am free to confess that a provision for free tolls for coastwise ships is in our platform, and if it contained no other declaration on the subject the situation would be entirely different, but on examination of the platform adopted at Baltimore you will also find, under the head of "Merchant marine," the following:

We believe in fostering, by constitutional regulation of commerce, the growth of a merchant marine which shall develop and strengthen the commercial ties which bind us to our sister Republics of the south, but without imposing additional burdens upon the people and without bounties or subsidies from the Public Treasury.

That the remission of tolls is a subsidy no one will dispute. Mr. Speaker, no longer than last Friday, the 27th day of March, 1914, in the Senate of the United States, the distinguished leader of the Republican minority in that body, Hon. JACOB H. GALLINGER, of New Hampshire, in the course of a colloquy with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], admitted as much. Senator OWEN asked the question:

Mr. OWEN. The Senator, of course, will concede that the remission of tolls is the same thing as a subsidy, will he not?

Mr. GALLINGER. Why, it is exactly the same thing.

Mr. Speaker, as I have already stated, I believe in the redemption of platform pledges, and have but little respect for those who willfully violate them. But in this case I am confronted with two platform pledges, and it is not possible to keep both of them—in living up to one I must violate the other—it is an easy matter, however, to determine which one I will live up to. I shall stand by the one declaring for a policy that will protect the American people against the extortion of a vicious monopoly—the one that declares against subsidies and special privilege in every form.

Mr. Speaker, all this talk about a surrender to Great Britain is too silly and too idle for a moment's consideration. No one here would surrender any part of our control of the Panama Canal to Great Britain or to any other nation of the world. We built it at our own expense. We built it on American soil. It is ours. I would rather see it filled up from ocean to ocean than to see England have any control over it. The Irish blood coursing through my veins would not permit me to yield in the slightest degree to Great Britain. But, Mr. Speaker, we are not asked to yield to England. We are only asked to live up to our sacred and binding obligation as set forth in the treaty of November 18, 1901, between the United States and Great Britain, in which section 1 of article 3 of this contract provides:

The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect to the conditions or charges of traffic, or otherwise. Such conditions and charges shall be just and equitable.

Mr. Speaker, there is no room for doubt as to the meaning of this language. It is binding on the United States both in honor and in law. The world construes it to mean exactly what it says, and we can not afford to sacrifice our national honor and violate a binding treaty to satisfy the greed of a powerful trust. To give free tolls to the Ship Trust means a tax of $2,000,000 annually on the American people. You ask me to vote this tax on the farmer behind the plow, on the laborer in the mill, and on the working girls in the factories and behind the counters for the benefit of a monopoly whose past record is one of robbery and extortion. I positively refuse to do it. I shall stand with the President in protecting the rights of the people and in preserving for future generations the honor, honesty, and integrity of the American Republic.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. What is the object of all these requests for recognition when the rule governs the extension of remarks.

Mr. ADAMSON. They have five legislative days to print remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. All Members?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Then there is no sense in asking for recognition.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, under the rule all Members who speak have five legislative days.

The SPEAKER. That was the impression of the Chair.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, the rule provides that all gentlemen speaking shall have permission to extend and revise their remarks in the RECORD, and that all Members shall have permission to extend remarks for five legislative days.

Mr. ADAMSON. That is my understanding.

Mr. MANN. Do you not think we had better get the President to construe this rule? [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Taking the rule altogether, it gives everybody permission to print in the RECORD. The only distinction is that Members who address the House, or by fiction are supposed to address the House, get their speeches printed in the proceedings regularly in the place where they made the request.

If they are not in the list, then their speeches go to the back of the RECORD.

The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. MANN. And on that, Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 247, nays 160, answered "present" 1, not voting 24, as follows:

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call my name.

The Clerk called the name of Mr. CLARK of Missouri, and he answered "No."

So the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

The Clerk announced the following pairs:

Until further notice:

Mr. GOLDFOGLE with Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota.

Mr. HOBSON with Mr. ROBERTS of Nevada.

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama with Mr. HUGHES of West Virginia.

On the vote:

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas (for engrossment and third reading) with Mr. REILLY of Connecticut (against).

Mr. KENT (for engrossment and third reading) with Mr. FORDNEY (against).

Mr. BORLAND (for engrossment and third reading) with Mr. MCLAUGHLIN (against).

Mr. BLACKMON (for engrossment and third reading) with Mr. L'ENGLE (against).

Mr. GRAY (for engrossment and third reading) with Mr. TOWNER (against).

Mr. MOON (for engrossment and third reading) with Mr. CLARK of Florida (against).

Mr. CRISP (for engrossment and third reading) with Mr. MERRITT (against).

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I would inquire whether the gentleman from Georgia, Mr. CRISP, is recorded?

The SPEAKER. No; the gentleman from Georgia, Mr. CRISP, is paired. He is at present in Colorado.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The bill was read a third time.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following motion to recommit, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

I move to recommit the bill H. R. 14385 to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce with directions to that committee to report said bill back to the House forthwith with the following amendment:

Strike out all of section 2 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 2. And Congress hereby declares that in its judgment the United States, which at enormous cost has built and fortified and owns the canal without any expectation of pecuniary profit to itself from its ownership, and which has the duty and expense of protecting the canal with its troops and warships and by proper sanitation, may, as the owner and defender of the canal and by virtue of its rights of sovereignty, rightfully provide preferential tolls or no tolls for its own war vessels and for vessels of commerce belonging to it or its citizens flying its flag, so long as the conditions and charges of traffic established by it for vessels of foreign nations are just and equitable, and may rightfully in time of war, as well as in time of peace, maintain its Army and Navy in the Canal Zone, including all necessary warlike materials, both for defense and offense, and may rightfully provide preferential tolls or no tolls for the vessels of the Republic of Panama, from which Republic the right to construct the canal was obtained, and as authorized in the act of June 28, 1902, providing for the construction of the canal."

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the previous question.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Speaker, I was on my feet before the gentleman from Rhode Island, and I desire to inquire as to the rule in respect to the minority having preference in a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. That does not mean the political minority. It means a minority on the question pending.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Then I desire to offer the following motion.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman from Rhode Island has demanded the previous question.

Mr. LAFFERTY. I hope that that will be voted down.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SHERLEY. Under the rule is not the previous question already ordered on the motion to recommit?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I think it plainly is not.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that it is not.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, the rule provides that the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill to final passage, without intervening motion, except one motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think that that includes the motion for the previous question on the motion to recommit.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, the adoption of the motion for the previous question then prevents further amendments?

The SPEAKER. It does.

Mr. SHERLEY. It prevents any amendment to the motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. Yes. The rule about that is this, that where a motion is made to recommit and the previous question is not demanded, or, having been demanded, is voted down, then an amendment or substitute is in order, but if the previous question be ordered, of course that is the end of the matter, so far as the motion to recommit is concerned.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Speaker, before the Chair rules I will ask if he will give his attention to the rule which provides that the previous question is ordered on the bill to its final passage. The motion to recommit comes before the vote on the final passage, and it seems to me that the motion for the previous question made by the gentleman from Rhode Island is superfluous.

Mr. SHERLEY. That was the point I desired to make.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, the uniform practice of the House is to adopt the previous question on a bill and pending amendments to final passage. When the motion to recommit is then offered the previous question operates so as to cut off debate, but the uniform practice has been to admit amendments unless the previous question be separately ordered upon the motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. That is undoubtedly true, and the present occupant of the chair has held it two or three times and half a dozen of his predecessors have so held. It seems to the Chair that the matter is no longer debatable. The question is on ordering the previous question.

The question was taken.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, I demand a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 241, noes 41.

So the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recommit.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois demands the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 176, nays 231, answered "present" 3, not voting 22, as follows:

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call my name.

The name of Mr. CLARK of Missouri was called, and he voted "nay."

So the bill was passed.

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:

On the vote:

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas (for repeal) with Mr. REILLY of Connecticut (against).

Mr. CRISP (for repeal) with Mr. MERRITT (against).

Mr. MOON (for repeal) with Mr. CLARK of Florida (against).

Mr. GRAY (for repeal) with Mr. TOWNER (against).

Mr. BLACKMON (for repeal) with Mr. L'ENGLE (against).

Mr. KORBLY (for repeal) with Mr. FORDNEY (against).

Mr. BORLAND (for repeal) with Mr. MCLAUGHLIN (against).

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

On motion of Mr. ADAMSON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, there is a typographical error in the caption of the bill by the omission of the two words "and government," describing the title of the old act. I wish to correct that.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the title will be amended accordingly.

There was no objection.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a copy of the substitute I desired to offer to the motion to recommit, which is very short.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oregon [Mr. LAFFERTY] asks unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the substitute which he intended to offer to his motion to recommit. Is there objection?

Mr. HEFLIN. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] objects.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. ASHBROOK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found duly enrolled bills of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 8683. An act to authorize and direct the Secretary of the Treasury to relinquish the rights of the United States in and to a part of a certain alley in the city of Marshalltown, Iowa;

H. R. 2733. An act authorizing J. A. Matheny, of Colony, Wyo., to make homestead entry;

H. R. 1262. An act for the relief of Hugh P. Strong;

H. R. 4618. An act to increase the limit of cost for increased quarantine facilities at the port of Portland, Me.; and

H. R. 11102. An act providing that the marriage of a homestead entryman to a homestead entrywoman shall not impair the right of either to a patent, after compliance with the law a year, to apply to existing entries.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on certain amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13612) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1914 and for prior years, and for other purposes.

URGENT DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the urgent deficiency bill (H. R. 13612) and ask unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] calls up the conference report on the urgent deficiency bill and asks that the statement be read in lieu of the report. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The conference report is as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 470).

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on certain amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13612) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1914 and for prior years, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 42, 43, and 44.

FRED'K H. GILLETT,
Managers on the part of the House.
THOMAS S. MARTIN,
N. P. BRYAN,
F. E. WARREN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, the one amendment that was actually in conference was the Senate amendment numbered 34, in which the Senate proposed to strike out $30,000 for printing for the Department of Labor and insert $8,000. The Senate yielded on its amendment, and the bill carries $30,000 for that purpose. I move the adoption of the conference report.

The SPEAKER. Is this a complete report?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; this is a complete report.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion for the adoption of the conference report.

The motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. FITZGERALD, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the conference report was adopted was laid on the table.

THE ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 13453, the Army appropriation bill, disagree to all the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the Army appropriation bill, disagree to all the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

H. R. 13543. An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915.

The SPEAKER. The Chair announces the following conferees on the part of the House: Mr. HAY, Mr. DENT, and Mr. KAHN.

MILITARY ACADEMY BILL.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 13765, the Military Academy appropriation bill, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] asks unanimous consent to take from the Spaker's table the Military Academy bill, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference. Is there objection?

The SPEAKER. The Chair announces the following conferees on the part of the House: Mr. HAY, Mr. MCKELLAR, and Mr. ANTHONY.

DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVE RICHARDSON, OF ALABAMA.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, it is my sad duty to announce to the House the death of my colleague, the Hon. WILLIAM RICHARDSON, of Alabama, who died this afternoon at 3 o'clock at Atlantic City, N. J.

At another time I shall ask the House to set aside a day upon which to hold services in respect to his memory. I now offer a resolution, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] offers a resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 454.

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. WILLIAM RICHARDSON, a Representative from the State of Alabama.

Resolved, That a committee of 20 Members of the House, with such Members of the Senate as may be joined, be appointed to attend the funeral.

Resolved, That the Sergeant at Arms of the House be authorized and directed to take such steps as may be necessary for carrying out the provisions of these resolutions, and that the necessary expense in connection therewith be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was unanimously agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair announces the following committee on the part of the House to attend the funeral: Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama, Mr. BURNETT, Mr. DENT, Mr. BLACKMON, Mr. ABERCROMBIE, Mr. ADAMSON, Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky, Mr. CARR, Mr. KEY of Ohio, Mr. STEDMAN, Mr. WALSH, Mr. DUPRÉ, Mr. MANN, Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota, Mr. ESCH, Mr. J. SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, April 1, 1914.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, Thou hast made of one blood all men who dwell on the face of the earth, and Thou hast fixed the bounds of their habitation and hast said, thus far shalt thou go and no farther. Thus Thou hast taught us the essential unity of the race, and out of it Thou dost give to us the larger interests of humanity and the higher oneness of life among all men. Thus Thou dost form us into the great brotherhood of mankind, into the world democracy. Yet Thou dost hold within Thy hand our governmental life, and hast fixed the bounds of our habitation, and surrounded us with Thy providence as a people and as a Nation. We recognize our dependence upon Thee. Grant, we pray, that in our relation to all men and in the higher and more intimate circle of responsibility within our own national life we may have the interest of every man at heart and do the will of God in promoting the happiness of all. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

RAILWAY LAND GRANT IN IOWA.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, stating, in further response to a resolution of August 19, 1913, requesting the Secretary of the Interior, the Secretary of War, and the Attorney General to furnish as soon as practicable copies of all letters and copies of other documents found in their respective departments and not included in Senate Document No. 144, Forty-ninth Congress, second session, in any matter relating to the land-grant act of Congress of 1864; that a further and careful search has been made for letters of May 4, 1866, from James Wright, of Des Moines, Iowa, and Hon. William M. Stone, governor of Iowa, and that the department has been unable to locate them; that a further search will be made, and, if found, copies will be forwarded to the Senate, which was referred to the Committee on Printing.

DISCONTINUANCE OF STAR ROUTES (S. DOC. NO. 460).

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Postmaster General, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 12th ultimo, detailed information as to the star routes discontinued and curtailed during the present fiscal year, also as to the discontinuance and curtailment of service determined upon for the ensuing fiscal year.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I ask that the communication and accompanying paper may lie on the table. It is certain information I desired to obtain, and I may ask later to have it printed, but perhaps not.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The communication will lie on the table.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming subsequently said: I ask that the communication from the Postmaster General in reply to Senate resolution of March 12 last and accompanying paper may be printed as a Senate document and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection?

Mr. WILLIAMS. What is the request?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Some time ago the Senate adopted a resolution calling on the Postmaster General for information as to star routes discontinued and curtailed or proposed to be discontinued. The reply thereto is what I desire to have printed as a Senate document.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have no objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The communication will be printed and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its chief clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill

(H. R. 14385) to amend section 5 of "An act to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal and the sanitation and government of the Canal Zone," approved August 24, 1912, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13612) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1914 and for prior years, and for other purposes.

The message further announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13453) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915; asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. HAY, Mr. DENT, and Mr. KAHN managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13765) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, and for other purposes; asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. HAY, Mr. MCKELLAR, and Mr. ANTHONY managers at the conference on the part of the House.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 13612) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1914 and for prior years, and for other purposes, and it was thereupon signed by the Vice President.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE ON CLAIMS.

Mr. ROBINSON, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (S. 1089) for the relief of the estate of T. J. Semmes, deceased, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 397) thereon.

Mr. OVERMAN, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (S. 4060) for the relief of Elizabeth Muhleman, widow, and the heirs at law of Samuel A. Muhleman, deceased, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 398) thereon.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am directed by the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (S. 3437) for the relief of H. Clay Howard, to submit an adverse report (No. 400) thereon. I ask that the bill be placed on the calendar.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

Mr. JOHNSON, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (S. 802) for the relief of F. W. Tyler, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 399) thereon.

TRADE WITH SOUTH AMERICA.

Mr. LODGE. From the Committee on Naval Affairs I report back favorably, with an amendment in the form of a new draft, Senate resolution 317, making certain inquiries in regard to the use of ships of the Navy for postal and commercial purposes, and I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

Mr. OVERMAN. Let the proposed substitute be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

Whereas it is desirable to develop and extend commercial relations between the United States and the countries of South America by the establishment of direct lines of communication for carrying the United States mail and for the transportation of passengers and freight; and

Whereas private capital has not engaged in this service to a sufficient extent to furnish facilities comparable to those enjoyed by the people of other countries having trade relations with South America: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, directed to cause to be prepared in detail a plan for the establishment of a line or lines of ships to run between ports of the United States and of South America, such line or lines of ships to consist of vessels of the Navy not required for immediate military service, and which in the opinion of the department are best adapted for postal and commercial purposes.

First. The time required by these ships to make a round trip between the various ports of the United States and the various ports of South America.

Second. The number of passengers which could be carried in each ship as now equipped, or with any changes that would not impair their usefulness if required in the naval service.

Third. The amount of freight that each ship could carry under similar conditions; this estimate to include mail as well as freight.

Fourth. The number of naval officers and seamen required to man the ships engaged in the service which is proposed.

Fifth. The probable cost of the service, including the pay of the officers and men employed in connection with it, and all other necessary elements, such as wharfage in the cities where the ships would touch, fuel, repairs, and maintenance of every description.

Sixth. The cost of such necessary changes as may be required to put such ships in condition for such service, in removing unnecessary military equipment, and any other changes necessary in order to carry passengers and freight safely and to adequately perform the service proposed in this resolution.

Seventh. An expression of opinion by the department as to whether any of the ships of the United States Navy can be used for such purposes without impairing their usefulness for naval purposes should their prompt return to the naval service be required.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is a substitute for the resolution submitted by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS]?

Mr. LODGE. It is a substitute for that resolution, which was simply a resolution of inquiry. The committee have merely modified the original resolution by taking out the specification of ships and ports, so as to make the inquiry cover any and all ports, and allow the department the entire range over all the ships for their recommendation as to what, if any, could be used to advantage.

Mr. OVERMAN. I have no objection to the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Massachusetts—I did not gather from the reading of the proposed substitute all of its context—whether it provides in the first instance for the use of these ships for commercial purposes or whether the Secretary of the Navy is only required to report whether they could be so used?

Mr. LODGE. It is only a resolution of inquiry, to have a full report from the Navy Department whether ships in the Navy can be used for such purposes, and to inform the Senate what ships, if any, can be so used. It is merely the first step toward getting the facts before the Senate.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I feel like congratulating the committee for the report they have made on this resolution, and I feel that, coming from this great committee, there will be no doubt as to its passage. I hope that ultimately, if the plan is found by the Secretary of the Navy to be a practical one, it will be put in active operation.

Some time ago, when the Alaska coal bill was before the Senate, I proposed an amendment which provided for the building by the Government of ships to be loaned or leased to the Panama Railway Co., a corporation entirely owned by the United States, and to be used in trade between the Pacific coast of the United States and the Atlantic coast of the United States, and the east and west coasts of South America. That amendment excited a great deal of opposition and a great deal of criticism, and seemed to be looked upon with suspicion. This resolution, going, I think, even a little further than my amendment, and putting the Government directly into the business, instead of using the instrumentality of the Panama Railway Co., having a different origin, will command a great many more votes than did my amendment, and perhaps a great deal more respect. Feeling that this resolution, originating in the old State of Massachusetts, going even a step further toward Government ownership and Government operation for the purpose of developing our trade with South America, will undoubtedly receive the approval of all the statesmen of the country, and certainly will receive the approval of those who believe, as I do, that we ought to have taken a step some time ago by the use of the Panama Railway Co. in developing our trade with South America. I believe we can safely and properly congratulate Massachusetts and her Senators, one of whom introduced the original resolution in relation to this matter and the other who reported with a favorable recommendation a still better resolution, upon this great step toward the development of our commerce with South America.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, the Senator from Nebraska said he thought this would meet with the approbation of all statesmen. It may. I do not know; I am not a statesman. It does not meet with my approbation. I have no objection to the passage of this resolution, which is merely for information; but since the Senator has gone into the merits of the case somewhat I want to say that, in the first place, I am opposed to the United States Government engaging in the freighting and passenger business whether at sea or on land, and, in the next place, perhaps my pride, more than my opinion, is opposed to making deckhands, freight handlers, and stevedores out of our sailors. I do not think they are enlisted for that purpose, and I do not think it is treating them properly to turn them into that sort of a force after they have enlisted with an understanding that they are to wear the uniform of their country for the purpose of taking care of naval vessels and for the purpose of fighting. A great many of them would not have enlisted had they known that they were to serve as stevedores and freight handlers at sea.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the merits of the question are not involved here at all. Many of us are opposed to Government ownership, but I think it entirely proper that we should make this inquiry and ascertain exactly the conditions which the original resolution asked to have explained to the Senate. I think it is very proper that the resolution of inquiry should be adopted.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I am heartily in favor of the resolution. It is looking in the direction toward which some of us have been turning our eyes for years. I trust that when we get a report we will not commit the ridiculous folly of compelling these ships, owned by the United States Government, when they pass through a canal which has been built by the United States Government, to pay tolls for the use of it.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I am induced to say, in reference to the remarks of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], that some of those who voted against his amendment to the Alaska railroad bill did not do so because they were suspicious of it, as the Senator suggests, or because they were opposed to it. In my own case, for instance, I will say that I would have favored the amendment if it had been introduced as a separate measure. I am heartily in favor of the proposal of the Senator as a general proposition, but I felt then, and I feel now, that it ought to be embraced in a separate, independent statute. I heartily favor the pending resolution for the purpose of getting all the information we can on the subject.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, in view of what has just been said by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW], I suggest that, pending the report, the lawyers of the body undertake to ascertain how the Government of the United States can charge itself and pay itself for the sending of its ships through the Panama Canal?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Any bookkeeper could answer that question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment, in the nature of a substitute, reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. ROBINSON:

A bill (S. 5122) to regulate the use of franking privileges by Members of Congress; to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

By Mr. JONES:

A bill (S. 5123) to establish in the District of Columbia a laboratory for the study of the criminal, pauper, and defective classes; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey (for Mr. HUGHES):

A bill (S. 5124) to grant all employees in the District of Columbia one day of rest in each seven days of employment; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

A bill (S. 5125) to provide for the survey of Pensauken Creek, N. J.; to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. LODGE:

A bill (S. 5126) granting an increase of pension to Edwin H. Glidden (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

THE INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I introduce a bill for reference. It is very short. I ask to have it read, and then I request that it lie on the table until to-morrow, when, if opportunity offers, I desire to submit some remarks upon it, and to give some evidences of a proceeding that is under way in this country which I believe to be the most serious of anything that has ever before been witnessed in its prejudicial effect upon the work of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

The bill (S. 5127) making it unlawful to attempt to influence the determination of any proceeding pending before the Interstate Commerce Commission excepting under the rules and regulations of the commission governing its proceedings in the orderly administration of the interstate-commerce law and the acts amendatory thereof, was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 13 of the act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, as amended by section 11 of the act entitled "An act to create a commerce court," approved June 18, 1910, be, and is hereby, amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"Every person who attempts to influence the action of the Interstate Commerc Commission or any member thereof in making or refraining from making any ruling, conclusion, finding, recommendation, report, or order in the determination of any proceeding pending before the commission by writing or sending to the commission or any member thereof any letter or any written or printed communication, circular, or paper, or by writing, or printing and circulating or causing to be printed and circulated any communication, matter, or thing addressed to the commission or any member thereof, or by communicating with the commission or any member thereof in any other manner, with like purpose and intent in relation to such ruling, conclusion, finding, recommendation, report, order, or proceeding pending before said commission, excepting under the rules and regulations of the commission governing its proceedings in the orderly administration of the interstate-commerce law and the acts amendatory thereof, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be punishable by a fine of not more than $2,000 or imprisonment for a term not exceeding one year, or by both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the bill will lie on the table and be printed.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. BRYAN (for Mr. FLETCHER) submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $10,000 for an investigation looking toward the discovery of a means of eradication of the cigarette beetle, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Agricultural appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed.

Mr. O'GORMAN submitted an amendment providing for the continuing and carrying to completion of the work begun on Governor's Island, N. Y., etc., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was ordered to be printed and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. SAULSBURY submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

DISCRIMINATION IN PRICES.

Mr. CLAPP submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 13305) to prevent discrimination in prices and to provide for publicity of prices to dealers and to the public, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce and ordered to be printed.

PANAMA CANAL TOLLS.

Mr. NORRIS. I submit a proposed amendment to the so-called Panama Canal repeal bill, and inasmuch as it is short I ask that it be read.

There being no objection, the amendment was read and referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals, as follows:

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. Norris to the bill (H. R. 14385) to amend section 5 of "An act to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal and the sanitation of the Canal Zone," approved August 24, 1912, viz: Amend the bill by adding thereto a new section as follows:

"SEC. 3. The passage of this act shall not be construed as a surrender of the right claimed by the United States Government to regulate the traffic passing through the Panama Canal by giving to vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States and other vessels of the United States and its citizens either partial or total exemption from the payment of tolls when passing through said canal. The protest heretofore filed with the Government of the United States by the Government of Great Britain against such a construction of the treaty of November 18, 1901, between said Governments, commonly known as the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, is hereby recognized as presenting an international question suitable and proper for settlement by arbitration, and the President of the United States is hereby authorized and directed to begin negotiations with the Government of Great Britain for the determination of said question by arbitration."

THE ROCKEFELLER FOUNDATION.

Mr. KENYON. I offer a resolution which I send to the desk, and if it does not arouse any discussion I shall ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 324) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby requested and directed to furnish the Senate information concerning the relation, if any, of the organization known as the general education board of the Rockefeller Foundation to the work of the Department of Agriculture; also a statement showing the names and positions of all employees, if any, of the department whose salaries are paid in whole or in part with funds contributed by the Rockefeller Foundation; also the names and positions of all administrative officers, if any, of the department who are in any way connected with the work of the general education board of the Rockefeller Foundation; and salaries, if any, received by them from the said Rockefeller Foundation.

PANAMA CANAL TOLLS.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I submit a resolution, and ask that it may be read and go over, under the rule, until to-morrow.

The resolution (S. Res. 323) was read, as follows:

Whereas the British embassy to the United States has formally, in writing, admitted that we have a right to exempt our coastwise trade from Panama Canal tolls, and the British minister of foreign affairs has officially, in writing, declared that many of the material provisions of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty do not apply to the Panama Canal, because that canal was constructed under conditions not contemplated by either party at the time the treaty was made; and

Whereas the "particular object" of both the Clayton-Bulwer and the Hay-Pauncefote treaties was the construction of a canal at Nicaragua, and the "general principle" referred to in said treaties contemplated and expressly stated that a treaty should be made with reference to a particular canal, and no such treaty has been made with reference to Panama; and

Whereas the United States acquired the Panama Railway and the Panama Canal wholly from the Republic of Colombia, the French Canal Co., and the Republic of Panama, and not from Great Britain, and that Great Britain had no rights, titles, or claims of any kind whatsoever in or to said Panama Railway or Panama Canal or the country in which the same were built, and never asserted any such claim or interest either to said French Canal Co., the Republic of Colombia, or the Republic of Panama, and has no such interest or legal right now, either by treaty or otherwise; and

Whereas our policy as to canal tolls was settled by act of Congress and by the official statement of the last administration made to the British Government; and

Whereas notwithstanding the aforesaid formal admissions of the British embassy and the British minister of state for foreign affairs, and notwithstanding, after full consideration, the question was solemnly settled by both the executive and legislative branches of this Government, the President, on the 5th of March last, appeared in person before the Congress, and "urged with the utmost earnestness of which he was capable," upon the ground of his own "personal responsibility" that the position so deliberately taken by this Government be reversed, and that his request be granted "in ungrudging measure," without "raising the question of whether we were right or wrong," and no reasons are given by the President for his conclusions, and the request is based especially on the ground that he "shall not know how to deal with other matters of even greater delicacy and nearer consequence" unless it shall be granted; and

Whereas no statement has been made to Congress what these matters are, and in order to act advisedly on said request, it is essential that the Senate shall be informed thereon, and if they are of such near consequence and great delicacy as to require a surrender to foreign opinion without question as to whether we were right or wrong, the Senate can not properly consider the question submitted, and many other vital questions before it, without being advised as to the nature and identity of said matters referred to by the President, and it is the desire of the Senate to give thorough consideration to the views of the President: Therefore it is

Resolved by the Senate, That the President is hereby respectfully requested to inform the Senate, in confidence if he so desires, what are the unnamed matters of "nearer consequence and greater delicacy" referred to in said message; and

Resolved further, That action on the bill for the repeal of the tolls exemption clause of the Panama Canal act, and all consideration thereof by the Senate or by the Senate Committee on Interoceanic Canals, be deferred until the information called for by this resolution can be obtained.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will lie over under the rule.

EFFECT OF PANAMA CANAL ON SEA TRAFFIC.

Mr. WORKS. I have here a short article by Russell L. Dunn, of San Francisco, on the subject of Panama Canal tolls, which contains valuable data and information from a commercial standpoint. I ask that the article may be printed in the RECORD. I also ask that it may be printed as a public document, and for that purpose move that it be referred to the Committee on Printing.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EFFECT OF PANAMA CANAL ON SEA TRAFFIC.

[Written by Russell L. Dunn, of San Francisco.]

The Robert Dollar Co., a shipping business of San Francisco, operating both coastwise and foreign lines, last week contracted to carry 24,000,000 feet of pine lumber from Victoria, British Columbia, via the Panama Canal to Toronto, Ontario, for a freight charge of $6 per 1,000 feet.

As 1,000 feet of British Columbia lumber weighs about 1⅞ tons, the freight charge is at the rate of approximately $3.60 per short ton. dead weight. If it be assumed, as is reasonable, that, this traffic not being coastwise and thus toll exempt, the freight rate covers the Panama Canal toll of $1.20 per registered ton of the carrying vessel, then the net freight charge—the charge for the transportation—is about $2.90 per ton by dead weight.

Lumber is a staple article of commerce produced nowhere on earth in an equal area so largely or so cheaply as in the Pacific Coast States of California, Oregon, and Washington, and in the Canadian Province of British Columbia. The fact that it is shipped into Ontario, itself a great lumber-producing Province of Canada, is conclusive as to the comparative cheapness of Pacific coast lumber production over Atlantic coast lumber production. The magnitude of the shipment—40,000 tons dead weight—the grade of the lumber, which is rated as "common," and the amount of the freight charge—$144,000—take the estimation of the effect of the Panama Canal on sea traffic out of the domain of uncertain speculation and into to-day's business of the actual, which may be figured in advance with reasonable certainty and exactness.

CARRIERS OF LUMBER ARE PETROLEUM-BURNING STEAMSHIPS.

The ships which will carry this lumber are petroleum-burning steamships. They are very much cheaper to operate than coal-burning steamships and carry freight at a correspondingly lower ton rate per sea mile. California is the great world producer of this fuel petroleum, and, with the Panama Canal outlet into the Atlantic, its production seems certain to largely replace coal for steamship fuel on Atlantic lines, as well as for all the ship lines engaged in traffic through the canal to and by California seaports. California petroleum is thus certain of becoming a great staple export through the canal in addition to being a commodity of home consumption, already amounting to 17,000,000 tons annually.

CANAL CARRIERS TO BE PETROLEUM-BURNING DIESEL MOTOR SHIPS.

The petroleum-burning steamship is not now the cheapest freight carrier. It is in course of being displaced in that respect by the petroleum-burning Diesel motor ship. The first vessel of this new type to be built on the Pacific coast was launched on March 14 of this year from a San Francisco shipbuilding yard. A considerable number of this type of vessel are already in service on the Atlantic, burning petroleum obtained from Sumatra and Russia, both more costly than will be the California petroleum. As compared with the petroleum-burning steamship, the petroleum-burning motor ship of the same net carrying capacity is about a third less costly to operate and maintain. It will, of course, ultimately displace the petroleum-burning steamship, just as the latter is displacing the coal-burning steamship.

SEA DISTANCES OF FOREIGN PORTS.

The sea distance by the Panama Canal between Victoria, British Columbia, and Toronto, Ontario, is almost precisely the sea distance by the canal between San Francisco, Cal., and Liverpool, England. It may be assumed that the freight rate between San Francisco and Liverpool will be no more than and probably less than between Victoria and Toronto. We have thus a fairly precise basis of estimation for Panama Canal freight rates between San Francisco and the principal European seaports, using the actual rate contracted by "the Robert Dollar Co." for carrying lumber from Victoria to Toronto. The sea distances to any of the principal European seaports from San Francisco are not greatly different, as may be seen on reference to the following table of the comparative distances:

	Miles.
Victoria, British Columbia, to Toronto, Ontario	7,864
San Francisco to Liverpool, England	7,866
San Francisco to Southampton, England	7,800
San Francisco to London, England	7,965
San Francisco to Havre, France	7,795
San Francisco to Bordeaux, France	7,650
San Francisco to Marseille, France	8,530
San Francisco to Antwerp, Belgium	8,030
San Francisco to Hamburg, Germany	8,320
San Francisco to Naples, Italy	8,830
San Francisco to Genoa, Italy	8,800
San Francisco to Palermo, Italy	8,770
San Francisco to Trieste, Austria	9,770

SEA DISTANCES OF COASTWISE PORTS.

New York is 2,568 miles nearer San Francisco through the Panama Canal than Liverpool, and the other principal Atlantic coastwise ports are still nearer, as indicated by the following table of comparative sea distances between the ports:

	Miles.
San Francisco to New York	5,298
San Francisco to Philadelphia	5,265
San Francisco to Baltimore	5,250
San Francisco to Mobile	4,720
San Francisco to New Orleans	4,723
San Francisco to Galveston	4,500

Practically whatever sea freight rate through the canal will be made for the ports of New York and San Francisco will be made for traffic between the other Atlantic and Gulf ports and San Francisco.

DIESEL MOTOR SHIP FREIGHT RATES.

A foreign-built and foreign-operated Diesel motor ship making 12 knots an hour and carrying 10,000 tons dead weight of freight can be run between San Francisco and Liverpool, paying 8 per cent return on investment, on total fixed charges and running expenses aggregating about $20,000 a trip, more or less than this sum, as the price of fuel oil in California varies from $1 per barrel, assumed in this estimate. This is equal to a mean freight rate of about $2 per ton dead weight, which sum can be estimated as the mean rate at which staples will ultimately be moved between San Francisco and all the principal ports of Europe.

A similar American-built and American-operated Diesel motor ship can be run between San Francisco and New York, paying 8 per cent return on investment, on total fixed charges and running expenses aggregating about $20,000 a trip, or about the same sum as the foreign-built and foreign-operated Diesel motor ship run between San Francisco and Liverpool. The reasons are well known why this will be so—higher cost of American shipbuilding, higher salaries, higher wages for sailors, and higher overhead charges, counterbalancing the shorter trip period and correspondingly less fuel consumption.

As between similar petroleum-burning steamships of 10,000 tons dead weight carrying capacity, the foreign-built ship on the longer Liverpool trip would likely run on a less aggregate trip cost, which would be about $30,000, than the American-built ship on the shorter coastwise New York trip. As between 10,000-ton coal-burning steamships the foreign ship on the longer Liverpool trip would be run on a very much less aggregate trip cost than the American-built steamship on the coastwise New York trip.

PANAMA CANAL WILL EFFECT DIVERSION OF PACIFIC COAST TRADE.

With substantially the same Panama Canal freight rates between San Francisco and European ports as between San Francisco and New York it can be foreseen that all Pacific coast imports from Europe will come direct to San Francisco through the canal, this being a diversion of the same foreign trade of the Pacific coast now conducted through the port of New York. Also, it can be foreseen that a large, if not the larger, part of the present Pacific coast imports from the Mississippi Valley and North Atlantic States will be brought instead from Europe, this being a diversion of trade from our American States to foreign countries.

It can be foreseen, too, that exports of the Pacific coast will, through the canal, enter the Atlantic and Gulf coasts' ports and markets, excluding more or less of the present imports into them from the Mississippi Valley and north central Atlantic States, this being a diversion of trade from these interior States to the Pacific Coast States. Also, that exports of the Pacific coast will enter the European markets, excluding more or less of their home productions and of their imports from our Atlantic States and the countries of eastern Europe and of Asia, this being a diversion, and in the aggregate a very large diversion, of trade from these States and countries to the Pacific Coast States and Provinces.

PANAMA CANAL TOLL NO BAR ON PACIFIC COAST FOREIGN TRADE.

Payment of the present Panama Canal toll imposed on foreign trade of our States, if it should be found constitutional, would be avoided in the Pacific coast traffic by making Colon, at the Atlantic end of the canal, the port of export for Pacific Coast States' products brought to it in coastwise traffic, and the port of import of the Pacific Coast States for foreign imports. Practically the foreign ships and coastwise ships would interchange cargoes at Colon, both exports and imports of the foreign trade going through the canal in coastwise shipping and thus exempt from toll, the cost of interchanging cargoes being very much less than the present $1.20 per ton toll charge.

If no more than the present toll be imposed on foreign trade ships and coastwise ships alike, it would lessen the volumes of both foreign and coastwise trade, more of the foreign than coastwise, in low-priced staples, the toll being equivalent to a specific export duty on Pacific Coast States products and equivalent to a specific import duty on foreign and Atlantic States products consumed in the Pacific Coast States. The Pacific Coast States producers of the exports and the Pacific Coast States consumers of the imports would pay the tolls in higher prices for what they would import and in lower net profits on what they would export. Practically the Pacific Coast States producers of exports and consumers of imports by paying the Panama Canal toll would pay the fixed charges and operating costs of the canal, and if there be any surplus collected would be paying the cost of the canal. In other words, the Panama Canal built by the credit—not money—of the people of the United (48) States, through toll imposition would come to be operated and paid for by the people of only seven of the States—the Pacific Coast States, who would be compelled to make use of it.

GREAT EXPANSION OF PACIFIC COAST TRADE AN EFFECT OF PANAMA CANAL.

The Pacific coast, besides lumber and petroleum, has enormous and cheaply minable deposits of many useful minerals, great undepleted fisheries, and can cheaply increase manyfold its present production of fruits, vegetables, and grains. The low freight rate through the canal opens the markets on both shores of the Atlantic to these products on more favorable than even terms.

No estimate of this new export traffic made now can be more than tentative. The present traffic movement from the Pacific coast has been estimated at about 3,500,000 tons annually, 85 per cent of it by the transcontinental railroads overland. It is probable that two-thirds of the rail-carried tonnage will become diverted through the Panama Canal. Assuming this diversion of trade from rail to sea carriers, the annual freight tonnage exported from the Pacific coast through the canal after the new trade adjustments become made may be something about as follows:

	Tons.
Present export tonnage by sea routes	500,000
Probable diversion from railroads	2,000,000
Lumber, 1,000,000,000 feet	1,650,000
Petroleum, 25,000,000 barrels	4,000,000
Borax, soda, potash, and nonmetallic minerals	1,500,000
Metal ores and metals	500,000
Green fruits and vegetables	800,000
Prunes, raisins, canned and dried fruits, wine	400,000
Grain and hay	500,000
Fish, fresh and cured	250,000
Wood pulp paper and other manufactures	400,000
Total annual exports through canal	12,500,000

Surprising though this total may appear in comparison with the present annual export tonnage of 3,500,000 tons, it is, nevertheless, conservative. A very large petroleum producer is my authority for the statement that those best informed in that business, figuring on a canal freight rate of 30 cents a barrel, equivalent to $2 per ton by weight, with no toll, anticipate exports of petroleum through the canal of 100,000,000 barrels (17,000,000 tons) annually within the fifth year following the canal opening.

The estimate has been made that the annual imports of the Pacific coast aggregate about 3,500,000 tons, 85 per cent of it being by rail overland. It may be estimated that practically all of this tonnage will reach the Pacific coast through the canal. With it there will be imported iron, steel, cement, and brick, principally from European centers of their manufacture, and the many varied articles which the rapid settlement of a great immigrant population in the Pacific Coast States and Provinces will require. The Pacific coast is so abundantly supplied with the staple raw materials that it is unlikely that the tonnage of its annual imports will equal that of its exports for very many years.

The balance of this Panama Canal trade seems certain to be largely in favor of the Pacific coast for more years ahead than can now be counted. Possessing cheap hydroelectric power, cheap petroleum fuel, cheap raw materials, and an exceptionally favoring climate, the Pacific coast will be independent of imports for many manufactures consumed by it. On the other side, the Pacific coast will have, in addition to the income from its great surplus tonnage of exports, another income from the petroleum fuel consumed by the ships carrying its commerce both ways. Practically one-quarter of its freight payments on exports and imports will come back in payment of the cost of the petroleum fuel.

PANAMA CANAL EFFECT ON RAILROADS.

The Panama Canal will have comparatively little effect on the Atlantic Coast States railroads. The coast-to-coast traffic of freight they will lose is but a small part of their total traffic. They will lose some of their present freight carrying east from the Mississippi Valley and North Central Atlantic States. They will gain some freight carrying of Pacific coast exports through the canal, coastwise, going inland from Atlantic ports. It can not be foreseen that the net change of income made incident by the Panama Canal will be very much.

The Panama Canal would now seem certain to materially lessen the freight traffic of the railroads between the Alleghany and Rocky Mountain Ranges. These railroads are certain to lose all their present westbound coast-to-coast freight and two-thirds of their present eastbound coast-to-coast freight. They are also certain to lose most of the westbound Pacific coast freight originating in their territory. The greater part of this last-described freight will become diverted to new points of origin in the Atlantic States and Europe, and the remainder will, as near as practicable, take the all-waterway route to the Pacific coast by the Mississippi River to New Orleans and thence by the canal.

The Panama Canal will have the effect of enormously increasing the traffic over railroads west of the Rocky Mountains—the Pacific coast railroads. These lines losing their proportion of the present westbound overland freight to the canal, would nevertheless take most of it back again as east or inland-bound local traffic from Pacific coast ports, making probably a larger net earning from it as all-local traffic than they are now making from it as part of the coast-to-coast traffic. They will lose about 2,000,000 tons of their present annual eastbound freight movement, recovering some of it as local traffic from inland points of origin to coast seaports.

All of their net loss by diversion of their traffic will, however, be very much more than counterbalanced by the increased Pacific coast exports, over 5,000,000 tons of which have to be moved by railroads from inland points of origin to coast ports; by the increased tonnage of Pacific coast imports through the canal, over half of which will have to be carried by rail inland from the seaports; and by the increased local freight carrying of Pacific coast products from producers to consumers. It is doubtful, indeed, if the present railroads in Pacific coast territory are able now to carry the greater tonnage which will be the effect of the Panama Canal. It would seem as if many more new lines must be built and many existing lines double-tracked.

With a possible $2 a ton sea freight rate between San Francisco and New York, overland competition of railroads is simply annihilated. There will be no transcontinental railroads within the meaning of the term as we have become accustomed to it. There can be no political questions over transcontinental freight rates, because freight will simply cease going over the railroads that way. The Central Pacific Railroad, least of all the present so-called transcontinental railroads, will be one of them. It will, instead, become a great tributary railroad system to the port of San Francisco, distributing imports and collecting exports for it in western Montana, Wyoming, Colorado, and New Mexico, as well as in the seven Pacific Coast States. In this respect it will occupy much the same traffic situation to San Francisco, in a vastly greater territory, that the New York Central Railroad system occupies to New York.

PANAMA CANAL EFFECT ON POPULATION MOVEMENTS.

It goes without saying that the population of the Pacific coast will become enormously increased by immigration within a short period as an effect of the Panama Canal. The mere expansion of the Pacific coast exports estimated—10,000,000 tons annually—will require a great addition to the present population to accomplish the production. But, independent of this trade condition inviting settlement by immigrant population, the Panama Canal is the opening through of an hitherto impassable barrier to the emigration of millions of the peoples of European nations. Among the classes of Europeans most anxious to better their material conditions by emigration, the idea of California being the land where the yellow gold is had for the picking of it from the ground persists as an inspiration to go there from the time, more than 60 years ago, when its first discovery in California was published to them.

The canal offers these people the cheap, direct way to this land of wonderful opportunity. The ship passage to San Francisco from European seaports for emigrants will be very little, if any, more than passage fare for emigrants has been from the same European seaports to New York. Both work and land will be ready to be taken by these European emigrants when they come. It will be surprising indeed if, in the first three years following the opening of the canal, there do not come through it to the Pacific coast more than 500,000 immigrants yearly from European countries. This, however, will not be the only immigration into the Pacific coast consequent on the canal. It seems probable that there will be a diversion overland of the present emigration from the Mississippi Valley States into the Canadian Provinces east of the Rocky Mountains to the Pacific Coast States and Provinces, increased from the same States by emigrants who are impelled to move through the effect on their industries of the diversion of the present Pacific coast trade from them by the canal.

PANAMA CANAL EFFECT ON THE EUROPEAN-ASIATIC TRADE.

Whether "toll" or "free" will be determinative of the effect of the Panama Canal on the present European-Asiatic trade conducted by the sea route through the Suez Canal. This ship-carried commerce through the Suez Canal is largely a carrying of freight between ports along the route between the terminals of the lines on the Atlantic coast of Europe and the Pacific coast of Asia. Yokohama and Vladivostok are, respectively, in Japan and Siberia, the farthest east and north terminals of the through Suez Canal lines. On the Panama route to these last-mentioned ports there is no such succession of way ports furnishing freight traffic between them. Comparative distances by the alternative canal routes to the great ports of eastern Asia are as follows:

Liverpool to—	Via Panama and San Francisco.	Via Suez.	Difference of distance against Panama route.
	Miles.	Miles.	Miles.
Yokohama	12,400	11,678	722
Vladivostok	13,010	11,760	1,250
Shanghai	13,452	10,607	2,745
Hongkong	13,892	9,785	4,107

If toll is collected on the Panama route as on the Suez, and the same toll on our coastwise traffic, it does not appear as if there would result any diversion of the present Suez Canal traffic to the Panama Canal route. There would be nothing to be gained by the change. No freight movement, from even Japan, not now carried by trans-Pacific steamship lines from the Pacific coast from San Francisco north would be diverted from the Suez Canal route, on which to base the establishment of European-Asiatic ship lines through the Panama Canal.

If, on the other hand, the Panama Canal be made toll free, the differential—$1.20 per registered ton under the present regulation—thereby created against traffic by the Suez Canal lines, and the Pacific coast north from Panama requiring less ship-tonnage capacity for its imports from Europe than for its exports to Europe, make probable the diversion of some European-Asiatic traffic from the Suez Canal route. Freight from Europe to Japan, Siberia, and China would be carried to San Francisco from Europe by the ships engaged in the Pacific coast traffic, and at San Francisco transferred to ships engaged in the Pacific coast traffic with Asia. There is reason for the opinion that with the largely increased population and commercial activity in Pacific coast territory following on the opening of the canal its imports from Asiatic countries will very largely exceed American exports to them, thus leaving clear cargo capacity for the westbound European-Asiatic freight.

Sea freight by coal-burning steamships from New York by the Suez Canal to Vladivostok, Siberia, or to Yokohama, Japan, is $10 per ton. Reduced to Diesel motor-ship transportation basis assumed for comparison, the freight rate would be about $5.25 per ton, inclusive of the Suez Canal toll, fuel petroleum being estimated to cost $1.50 per barrel—$1 cost f. o. b. in California, plus 30 cents freight, 17 cents Panama Canal toll, and 3 cents carrying interest charge—and the freight rate from Liverpool to Yokohama, 2,000 miles less distance, would be about $4.75 a ton.

From Liverpool to Yokohama by the Panama Canal, including the cost of transshipment at San Francisco, the Diesel motor-ship freight rate, not including a Panama Canal toll, would be about $3.75 a ton. Toll free, the Panama Canal route would have about $1 per ton advantage of the Suez Canal route, which includes a toll payment of $1.20 per registered ship tonnage. This $1 per ton advantage at Yokohama would make Hongkong, in southern China, the port at which rates would be substantially equal either way around the world. With a Panama Canal toll the freight routes by either route would equalize at Yokohama, so that no present European-Asiatic freight traffic through the Suez Canal would become diverted to the Panama Canal route. This would apply to traffic of our Atlantic States with China, Japan, and Siberia also. With a Panama Canal toll on coastwise traffic all the trade of the Atlantic States with eastern Asiatic ports, excepting only Yokohama, will have lower freight rates by the Suez Canal in foreign ships than by the Panama Canal in our own ships. Freight rates from New York to Yokohama by the Suez Canal will be about the same as freight rates between the same ports by the Panama Canal with toll included.

PANAMA CANAL EFFECT ON THE PORT OF SAN FRANCISCO.

San Francisco will inevitably become the Pacific coast terminal of all the ship lines through the Panama Canal and of all the trans-Pacific ship lines. Three causes will contribute to produce this effect.

First. Our American coastwise navigation laws, which tend to make it unprofitable for foreign ships to enter more than one port of our States.

Second. The cheap petroleum fuel of which San Francisco has a natural monopoly for the supplying of ships which will engage in the Panama Canal and trans-Pacific trade. In this respect its position is unique among ports of the world which are centers of great ship-carried commerce. For the new Diesel motor-ship type of ship the port of San Francisco can supply, and the ship can take on, fuel petroleum sufficient for its round trip from San Francisco to any port of the world while the ship is discharging and taking on cargo. None other of the great ports of the world can equal this facility at the price.

Third. The fast passenger ships from European ports will be able to get export freight to Europe on better terms and in larger and surer supply at San Francisco than at any other Pacific coast seaport. These fast passenger liners will move fresh fruits and vegetables and the higher classes of exports—those requiring quick transit to market and paying the highest charges. There is no other Pacific coast territory which can equal the Sacramento and San Joaquin Valleys, close to San Francisco, in the production of these classes of exports.

Becoming the terminal for the Panama Canal and trans-Pacific ship lines, San Francisco will necessarily become the collecting center and the distributing center of the Pacific coast local-freight traffic by rail inland and coastwise to the other Pacific coast ports. It will, too, become a point of assemblage of enormous quantities of raw materials and the port of entry of a constantly renewed stream of immigration, supplying cheap labor during the period of its adjustment to its new conditions of life. Having already cheap petroleum fuel and cheap hydroelectric power, its development as a great manufacturing center seems inevitable. Both in commerce and population the limit of its future development can not at this time be measured.

SUMMARY OF PANAMA CANAL EFFECT ON SEA TRAFFIC.

Petroleum-burning Diesel motor ships will become the ship-freight carriers on both oceans through California petroleum becoming available for such use on the Atlantic Ocean.

The basic freight rate for staples through the canal between the Pacific coast and either New York, Liverpool, or other European ports will be about $2 per ton dead weight, exclusive of canal toll.

Pacific coast foreign trade with Europe will become diverted from the overland New York route to the all-sea route through the canal.

The present Pacific coast trade overland with the Mississippi Valley and North Central Atlantic States will become largely diverted into direct trade by the all-sea route through the canal with the Atlantic States and European countries—more largely the latter than the former.

The trade of the Pacific coast will become enormously expanded through the cheapness and availability of the all-sea route through the canal as an outlet for products hitherto unmarketable on the Pacific coast.

The Atlantic coast railroads will be very little affected; the railroads between the Allegheny and Rocky Mountains will lose practically all of their Pacific coast traffic; and the railroads of the Pacific coast will gain enormously in traffic from the handling to and from the seaports of the new exports and imports. Transcontinental railroads as such will cease to be. Transcontinental freight rates can not be made competitively with an open all-sea freight rate of $2 per ton.

The Pacific coast will gain rapidly and enormously in population by immigration from European countries through the canal and by immigration from our Mississippi Valley States by rail overland, and this new population will increase the all-sea-route trade between the Pacific coast and Europe.

If the canal be toll free, there will result a diversion of present all-sea traffic between our Atlantic States and European countries through the Suez Canal with China, Japan, and Siberia to the new all-sea route by the Panama Canal and San Francisco.

If a canal toll be charged, the present all-sea traffic of our Atlantic States and European countries with eastern Asia will continue to take the Suez route as being the cheaper.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The article will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

INSPECTION AND GRADING OF GRAIN.

Mr. STERLING. I have a letter from W. J. Ray, secretary of the National Council of Farmers' Cooperative Associations and secretary of the Farmers' Grain Dealers' Association of Iowa, relative to Federal grain inspection. I should like to have the letter read.

There being no objection, the letter was read and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

NATIONAL COUNCIL
FARMERS' COOPERATIVE ASSOCIATIONS,
OFFICE OF SECRETARY-TREASURER,
Colo, Iowa, March 21, 1914.

Senator THOMAS STERLING,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: The United States Department of Agriculture has, I believe, presented a bill to the National Congress for such body to act upon and enact a law governing the grading of all grains, at all markets, to conform with the standards of corn grades as are formulated by the Government and other grains as standardized or may be.

I, as secretary of the National Council of Farmers' Cooperative Associations and secretary of the Farmers' Grain Dealers' Association of Iowa, appeal to you to use due wisdom in this matter of grain inspection. Of seven States I represent as secretary of the National Council—Iowa, Kansas, Nebraska, South Dakota, North Dakota, Minnesota, and Illinois—there are approximately 1,800 farmers' elevators or grain companies. This represents approximately 245,000 stockholders, generally producers of grain. Three hundred and sixty companies of Iowa, 48,000 members, are shippers and producers of grain.

Through correspondence and filing of information documents by these local companies to these separate secretaries and the centralization of them all, I find that they almost unanimously request, desire, and appeal for Federal inspection of grains under civil service. We think this will be the most perfect, proper, and just method of handling the grain-inspection department of all terminal markets, making them governmental departments of inspection, appointed or elected by the Government or Department of Agriculture.

If such a law can be legitimately enacted, I appeal to you to use your powers of influence in the National Congress to procure the enactment of such law. If you find that the above is impossible to be instituted in conformity with the good policy of the Department of Agriculture and National Government, we will further appeal to your honorable body, the National Congress, to use every possible investigation in the matter of grain inspection and conform and formulate such laws as will ultimately lead specifically and thoroughly to Federal inspection under civil service of all grains in all markets.

We firmly believe that this will be the only and final means of establishing a just and uniform conformity of grading of grains.

Yours, very respectfully,

W. J. RAY, Secretary.

INTERSTATE TRANSPORTATION OF CONVICT-MADE GOODS.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I have here a letter concerning House bill 1933, which is a bill dealing with interstate commerce in convict-made goods. The letter is from Mr. E. J. Fogarty, warden of the Indiana State prison. I ask that it may be read from the desk and inserted in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Mississippi I think every Senator has received a copy of that letter. I have, however, no objection to it being put into the RECORD, if the Senator will not ask that it be read from the desk.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will ask the Secretary to return it to me and I will read it myself.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator insists upon having the letter read, I will not object. I merely made the suggestion in the interest of conserving the time of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

DEAR SIR: Relative to H. R. 1933, a bill introduced in the second session of the Sixty-third Congress to limit the effect of the regulation of interstate commerce between the States in goods made wholly or in part by convict labor, I beg to submit the following reasons against its enactment into law:

The bill in its entirety reads as follows:

"Be it enacted, etc., That all goods, wares, and merchandise manufactured or produced or mined wholly or in part by convict labor, or in any prison or reformatory, transported into any State or Territory of the United States, or remaining therein for use, consumption, sale, or storage, shall, upon arrival and delivery in such State or Territory, be subject to the operation and effect of the laws of such State or Territory to the same extent and in the same manner as though such goods, wares, and merchandise had been manufactured, produced, or mined in such State or Territory, and shall not be exempt therefrom by reason of being introduced in the original package or otherwise." (Passed by the House of Representatives Mar. 4, 1914.)

It is very evident from the reading of this short bill that its sponsors have meant to do many things with the use of but very few words. The purpose of its framers was, and is, to limit the effect of the regulation of commerce between the States as is provided by our National Constitution. Article I, section 8, of the Constitution reads: "Congress shall have power * * * to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes."

While a State may regulate the sale of goods within its own borders, made by its own convicts, or may prohibit the letting of convicts for manufacturing articles for general commerce, it appears, under our system of government, that a State can not prohibit the importation of convict-made goods from another State, for when goods are thus shipped it becomes an act of interstate commerce, and they are under the protecting hand of the United States Congress; hence, the reading of this bill: "That all goods * * * upon arrival and delivery in such State * * * shall be subject to the operation and effect of the laws * * * as though such goods * * * had been manufactured * * * in such State."

To put the thought in other words, the purpose of this bill is to empower the several States to govern the sale of imported prison or convict made goods just as it has the power to control the goods made by the convicts of its own State.

We are told that in the United States there are, in round numbers, 50,000 convicts in continuous confinement. Publicists, organized labor, employers of free labor, every one conversant with prison life even in small degree will readily admit that it would be physical deterioration, mental ruination, and moral degradation to permit, or compel rather, these 50,000 persons to while their prison terms away in utter idleness. In fact, the question is not even debatable; it is settled in all fair minds that labor is the salvation of prison life, and dare not be abolished. Then, what shall the argument be?

Is it helping matters to prevent Indiana-made goods selling in Illinois or Ohio-made goods selling in Indiana, or Pennsylvania-made goods selling in New York and New York-made goods selling in Pennsylvania? "Yes," one will say, "let every State take care of the goods made by its own prisoners." Suppose we do, what then? Indiana will have more than 2,000 men either idle or making goods that must take the place of goods in the markets of this State made by free labor. "Put the convict labor to making supplies for the State, county, and township use—brooms, desks, brushes, mops, etc." Very well, then the employers of free labor who make desks, brooms, brushes, and mops must go out of business or compete with convict labor.

Under the law as we have it to-day 48 States are using the product of the 50,000 convicts without apportionment; under the proposed law each State would have its convict product only and would be required to keep it all. There would not necessarily be a less amount of convict-made goods on the market, but the law would undoubtedly cause a different class of goods to be made and would regulate, or permit the States to regulate, the sale of the same; each State compelling the others to sell their goods within their own borders.

We are hearing a great deal about the ruinous effect of convict-made goods upon the market. I believe the conditions are magnified. Capital is everywhere seeking profitable investment. Men are not allowing bonanzas to pass along unseized. Competition does not begin in the market place always, and very often the man who fights the competition he is bound to meet with convict labor is a man who competed for that labor and lost because his competitor overbid him. If fortunes are waiting for the men who are accused of exploiting convict labor, why must the prison boards of this country advertise and readvertise before bids are received justifying the sale of such labor? Why is the field not full of representatives of capital just as all promising fields are full?

We have in Indiana 2,700,000 people, and about 2,300 convicts in our two institutions—1 convict for every 1,000 people. Is it reasonable that the labor of this man thrown on the market is going to be demoralizing to that market or noticeably injurious to the cause of free labor? What is true of Indiana is, no doubt, true in other States. Our combined population is practically 100,000,000 people; our penal population 50,000 people; 1 convict's labor in the market with that of 2,000 free laborers; the product of 1 man's labor thrown into the market with the product of the labor of 2,000 men. Who would contend that as a whole it is or can be ruinous?

Labor, like every commodity, is in the market, and it is attracted by the highest bidder. Capital seeks to find the lowest labor possible, considering, of course, efficiency and skill. Because a mighty industry is carried on by the labor of foreigners, who send practically all their earnings to foreign lands, and who manage to live on half the expenditure required by the American laborer, we do not classify the product of their labor and advocate discrimination against it as "alien labor-made goods." When great combinations of capital carry on their business and produce their wares by the cheaper labor of women and children we sometimes decry against the unreasonable wage they are compelled to accept, but we have never advocated the branding of their goods "Made by women and children," nor has there been any agitation in our Congress looking to the modification of our interstate-commerce laws and conferring upon the several States the right to discriminate against such goods.

The State of Indiana, and every other State in the Union, by sequence becomes the guardian, and therefore the protector of the citizenship that it convicts of crime. It assumes the task of reforming that body of men or protecting society against them; it assumes the burden of feeding and clothing and guarding them while they are in prison; for this purpose alone the State of Indiana expends practically $350,000 through its two penal institutions annually. Its wards are not physically disabled; they are not objects of simple charity; they do not and dare not ask to be supported in idleness, and nobody asks it; they can and should be compelled to labor diligently and with some reward, not only that the State may be relieved of the expense of supporting and guarding them, but that their dependent families may have some benefit from their toil.

And suppose Indiana should attempt to employ its convict population in making such articles as are consumed by public institutions; what would be the first step necessary? For brushes we would require a brush factory; for brooms, a broom factory; for chairs, a chair factory; for furniture, a furniture factory; for desks, a carpenter shop and a foundry; for tinware, a tinnery; for shoes, a shoe factory; for mops, a mop factory, and so on and on ad infinitum. Would any private citizen be justified in equipping a factory with machinery and appliances necessary to the manufacture of brushes when his market must be limited to the public institutions of this State only? Would any chair or furniture manufacturer think of equipping a chair or furniture factory when he knew his output must be limited to the needs of the State institutions? Then what of a shoe factory, a mop factory, a foundry? Is not a business policy that is objectionable to the individual manufacturer objectionable to the State as well? And shall we eventually attempt to compel our township, county, and State institutions to expend the people's money for goods made in our penal institutions, made in such small quantities and at such disadvantages that they can not possibly compete with goods made in large factories fully equipped, and allow anything like a wage commensurate with the labor performed? Suppose we could profitably and diligently employ our entire population in this way; would not every dollar's worth of wares sold to our many public institutions shut out just so many dollars' worth of the wares of free labor? And while the protest against contract prison-made goods seems to come from shoe, chair, and shirt manufacturers to-day, would the protest be less from the manufacturers of those classes of goods used in public institutions when the whole system is changed and all States make their own supplies?

By the proposed law the several States will be compelled to support their convicts in idleness or to place the product of their labor arbitrarily in the market, forcing manufacturers of State, county, and township supplies out of the field. Under the present law it is a question of competition from beginning to end, and capital is placed at no disadvantage anywhere along the line.

Let me cite a concrete example which fairly illustrates the whole matter. The Indiana State prison has 200 men unemployed; able-bodied men, fully capable of more than self-support. It owes these men, it owes the taxpayers of the State their profitable and diligent employment. That employment may be had, it advertises broadly the day and date the labor is to be let. Contractors visit the institution; capital sends its representatives into the field; the situation is canvassed, and each submits the bid for the labor that he feels he is justified in making. Competition begins there, and the highest bidder is awarded the labor. The State hires its inmates for the best price offered, just as a father hires his children to the employer of free labor. Does the competitor who employs free labor object to the sale of goods made by children only because his competitor secured their services at a better price than he was willing to pay? Would not such an objection be taken with much salt if it were made?

Then why make a distinction against the prisoner and the man who offered most for his labor? Why protect a man against the competition of a class of labor for which he competed in the open market or for which he was privileged to compete? We do not discriminate against goods made by women, or by children, or by Chinamen, or Japanese, or Italians, or Hungarians, be the cost of their labor what it may, and while convicts are peculiarly distinguished they are none the less human beings, living in the relationship of wards of the State. That the State should be hampered or discriminated against in its endeavor to let the labor of these wards to its own profit and to their physical, mental, and moral advantage seems unjust and without warrant, especially when this labor is let publicly and in open competition. Any individual of the very many in the manufacturing business who refuses to buy this labor or to pay the price offered by the man who does buy it, and then goes about agitating the discrimination this law permits, reminds one very much of the "dog in the manger." Nor do I believe that the rank and file of the men who actually labor for a livelihood in this and other States will object to the product of one man's labor selling alongside the product of the labor of a thousand free men, especially when they are informed that the labor making that product was paid the highest price that could be obtained in the open market, and that a portion of that price went to the support of a needy wife and family who were in no wise to blame for the unfortunate conditions surrounding them.

Eight of the 48 States in this Union are employing their convict population in the manufacture of binder twine. In Indiana we use on an average 9,000,000 pounds of binder twine each year. Before this State and her sister States began making twine farmers everywhere were paying all the way from 12 to 18 cents for twine. Last year they paid the retailer but 10 and 11 cents and could have bought it here for 9 cents. This year they can buy it here for 8¼ cents, being lowered but 3 cents per pound, which is a very liberal estimate. The saving to Indiana farmers yearly has been $270,000, to say nothing of the saving to the farmers of other States whether they have a State factory or not. Forty States of the Union have no State twine factories. We are selling twine to a number of them, as are the other States which manufacture twine. I am of the very strong opinion that farmers of Pennsylvania, Ohio, Illinois, Iowa, Kentucky, and the many other States having no State factories will call to account Representatives and Senators who would deprive them of this and other inviting markets and place them again at the mercy of the mighty trust that has fattened to great proportions in the past at their expense. In fact, if I were looking for a "nigger in the woodpile" who is powerfully, however mysteriously, behind this harmless looking measure, I would turn my searchlight upon the controllers of vast wealth who see a chance to eliminate an avowed enemy by the glove-handed methods so characteristic of their work. I believe that an awakened intelligence will consider well the cause as well as the effect of a law whose origin and whose purpose can but invite the most acute suspicion of ulterior motives. And should this law pass the general Congress the work of securing State legislation conforming to it will be small. The power that has thwarted every move to establish a binder twine factory in Illinois, and which is not supposed to be sleeping while this bill is pending, would bring the many forces at its command into play upon the State legislatures; and Illinois farmers, Ohio farmers, Iowa farmers, all farmers in States without twine factories, would soon be again at the mercy of the combination now employing itself in the task that will remove the heaviest obstruction—the passage of this bill.

I have said that I do not believe the thousands of laborers of my own State will object to the labor of the other single man in their market since that labor comes at the very highest price obtainable. I wish to say now that I believe the multitude of taxpayers in my State will object to a public policy that must throw its penal class into idleness and make them an added burden to be supported wholly by taxation. There are other considerations than the man who hires free labor; the rank and file of our common people will demand a reason for throwing thousands of idle boarders upon them when their labor can be let with so little hurt to the laboring masses. Tens and hundreds of thousands of farmers will demand explanation of a national policy that puts them at the mercy of the great trust which already largely controls farm supplies.

We are not prepared for a policy which mollycoddles our prison population and makes them idlers while they serve their sentences. We want active, lucrative employment for them. They require it, the people desire it, and common sense demands it. This bill will work great injury and will disorganize and demoralize the power vested in the National Congress to regulate interstate commerce, being an entering wedge, for why may not a State refuse to permit the sale of goods made by children or by unnaturalized men or by negroes or by unorganized labor if it may do this thing now proposed?

The awakening will come eventually, and the sponsors of such a policy will sooner or later answer to the people whose taxes they disregard and whose interests they seem so willing to subvert to a policy of theorists and to plans of unscrupulous designers.

Respectfully, yours,

E. J. FOGARTY,
Warden Indiana State Prison.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The communication will be referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

PANAMA CANAL TOLLS.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I desire to enter upon the calendar a notice. I wish to preface the notice with the statement that on the 5th day of March, 1914, the President of the United States delivered a very brief message to both branches of Congress, in which he stated:

> In my own judgment, very fully considered and maturely formed, that exemption—

Referring to the exemption of our coastwise vessels from the payment of tolls—> constitutes a mistaken economic policy from every point of view.

In a further declaration in that very short message he says that this exemption from the payment of tolls—> is, moreover, in plain contravention of the treaty with Great Britain concerning the canal, concluded on November 18, 1901.

The President therefore presented to the Congress two clear-cut, simple propositions for its judicial or legislative direction.

I desire to give notice that, with the permission of the Senate, immediately after the close of the morning business on next Monday, April 6, I shall discuss these two propositions.

PANAMA PACIFIC INTERNATIONAL EXPOSITION.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Appropriations:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a report by the Secretary of State recommending an appropriation of $500,000 for the erection of a building within which to install, display, and safeguard at the Panama Pacific International Exposition at San Francisco the Government exhibit authorized by the sundry civil appropriation act of June 23, 1913.

As pointed out by the Secretary of State, many of the Governments officially invited by the United States to participate in the exposition are erecting buildings within which to house their exhibits at the exposition. The Government of the United States should not be behind these in appropriately providing for its national exhibit.

I commend the recommendation to the favorable consideration of Congress.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE, March 3, 1914.

ARMY APPROPRIATIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13453) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, agree to the conference asked for by the House, and that the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, Mr. LEA of Tennessee, and Mr. DU PONT conferees on the part of the Senate.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13765) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, and for other purposes, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, agree to the conference asked for by the House, and that the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, Mr. HITCHCOCK, and Mr. WARREN conferees on the part of the Senate.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 14385. An act to amend section 5 of "An act to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal and the sanitation and government of the Canal Zone," approved August 24, 1912, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals.

MINING ON THE PUBLIC DOMAIN—PANAMA CANAL TOLLS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a preceding day, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Motion by the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] to discharge the Committee on Mines and Mining from the further consideration of the bill (S. 4898) to encourage and promote the mining of coal, phosphate, oil, gas, potassium, and sodium on the public domain, and that it be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, on account of the illness of the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] he is unable to be in the Senate to-day. For that reason, and that reason only, I ask that the matter may go over for a day without prejudice.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, for the present, at any rate, I desire to object; and in connection with the consideration of the resolution I have some suggestions that I desire to submit to the Senate with reference to a resolution that I introduced some time ago, and that was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations—a resolution calling for information from the President that I consider of very great importance that the Senate shall have. I had a faint hope that possibly the Foreign Relations Committee would report that resolution favorably to-day, but I have heard nothing from the committee.

Mr. President, early in the session a bill was introduced to repeal the provision of the Panama Canal act exempting American vessels engaged in the coastwise trade from the payment of tolls. It was introduced by a gentleman who had always been violently opposed to this exemption. But little was thought of it. The Democratic platform had approved this exemption, the President had rejoiced in its passage, not a Democrat in the Senate of the United States had voted against it. The representative of the British Government had practically admitted in writing that we had the right to do it. Great writers on international law in foreign countries had declared that there was no doubt about it. The waterway had been built by American money under the direction of American genius and through American territory, and the people felt sure that they had secured for all time a free and untrammeled waterway competitor of the great transcontinental railways of the country. This exemption was passed in the interest of competition and against monopoly and for the benefit of all the people.

Slowly, quietly, subtly conditions changed. The Mexican situation became more gloomy. For some unaccountable reason Huerta held on. He would not let go. In some way he continued in charge of the only organized government in Mexico. Property was being destroyed, lives were being taken, insurgency was devastating one part of Mexico but making no progress toward a stable government. We would not recognize either nor recognize the belligerency of both. Governments that had recognized Huerta were getting impatient at our waiting policy. Visits to the White House of foreign ministers and agents, and especially of England, became more and more frequent. Representatives of the transcontinental railroads visited Washington and conferred with Cabinet officers.

An Englishman was wantonly murdered by the insurgents, and immediately something was doing. All plans were changed. The administration's policy of "one thing at a time" was thrown to the winds. Trust problems were thrust aside, forgotten. The newspapers in veiled words and by covert insinuations suggested that England's aid in sustaining the Monroe doctrine, in deposing Huerta, and in pacifying Mexico was to be secured by the repeal of the tolls exemption, and suddenly it was announced that the President had decided to appear again before Congress and urge its repeal.

Again the summons came for Congress to assemble and listen to the decree of "the ruler," to use the language of my friend the Senator from Illinois, delivered after the manner of an address from the English Crown. Like obedient schoolboys, we—most of us—marched arm in arm in solemn, stately fashion through the corridors of this historic Capitol to the hall of instruction. In childlike simplicity and humble meekness, the ambassadors from sovereign States and the representatives of a supposedly self-governing people waited for the message. An escort was duly appointed. It retired, and with due solemnity returned. The President of the United States ascended in majesty and graciously read to us in matchless English his commands.

Some of us came expecting facts and information, weighty and convincing; we returned disappointed. Some expected reasons and argument, cogent and overwhelming; they heard dogmatic assertions, imperative commands, and abject confessions of incapacity. Congress, a President, and the people were, in effect, charged with having deliberately dishonored the Nation by violating the plain terms of a solemn treaty. Right or wrong, we were requested to reverse our action regarding a domestic matter because it was necessary in support of a foreign policy which he did not deign to disclose to us. There, in the presence of foreign ministers and foreign ambassadors, we were told that unless we did this ungrudgingly our President, the people's Executive, would not know how to deal with them in matters of more delicacy and greater concern. That was all. No facts, no reasons, no information, no argument.

We returned to our Chamber, not wiser but sadder men. If it had not been so serious, it would have been laughable. If it had not been humiliating, it would have been ridiculous. Amazement displaced curiosity, indignation supplanted acquiescence, and shame o'ershadowed conscious integrity.

Immediate steps were taken by those more heedful of the President's commands than of the people's will. Intimations that debate should be limited and amendments prohibited were followed as commands. In feverish haste a "gag" rule was adopted by those who had secured the votes of the people by denouncing such methods. Twenty hours were allowed 430 Members of the House of Representatives, or an average of less than three minutes to each one, in which to debate the most momentous and far-reaching question that has been considered by Congress during the last 50 years. No amendments could be offered, and "gag" rule in all its glory and power was restored in order to insure the Nation's dishonor and thwart the people's will.

March 6 I introduced the following resolution in the Senate:

Resolved, That the President be, and he is, requested, if not incompatible with the public interests, to advise the Senate what nations have protested against the passage of coastwise vessels through the Panama Canal free of tolls, what representations have been made regarding the same, and copies of all communications received from foreign countries relating thereto, together with copies of answers submitted by the United States.

What objection can be urged to this resolution? It is respectful and courteous. It calls for information that we are entitled to and that we ought to have. We are officers of the Government and a part of the lawmaking body. Without us legislation can not be had. We are derelict in our duty if we do not secure this information. The people whose interests we are supposed to guard and represent are entitled to know the facts called for. Without being charged with questioning the President's integrity, sincerity, or patriotism, we have the right to ask him for the information upon which his requests for legislation are based, in order to determine whether we, as legislators and representatives, are justified in doing what he asks. We can not shirk our responsibility. We can not hide behind the President and his ipse dixit. The word of the President may be enough for the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN]. It is passing strange, however, that he, whose burning philippics in behalf of the people and popular government have thrilled this Chamber, should now so complacently thrust aside the people's voice and the people's will.

It is again suggested in the press that the President wants hasty action in the Senate. A hint from him is a command. The Senator from Oklahoma has been selected to push this legislation through. He wants no information; some of us do. He cares naught for the people's wishes; some of us do.

This legislation will have full and careful consideration here, if it takes all summer. No "gag" rule will be applied. This is one place where the people's voice can be heard and their interests discussed, and mere force of numbers can not prevent it.

Mr. President, the Committee on Interoceanic Canals ought to have this information before it acts on this legislation. With all due deference to the Senator from Oklahoma, that committee can not act intelligently, and the Senate can not act intelligently, upon this legislation without this information. No one can give us the information but the President. I have followed the debates in the House. None of this information is given. I read the speech of the Senator from Oklahoma, delivered the other day, expecting that he would give us some information that we did not already possess. He did not. He presented nothing new. All the argument he presented was gone over and over again two years ago, before the law was passed which he now says, echoing the words of the President, is in plain violation of the terms of our treaty. He did not tell us that two years ago. The Nation's honor did not trouble him then. His clarion voice was not heard in its defense. He did not consider it of sufficient importance to demand his vote, and he is recorded, not at the head of those who would preserve his country's honor, but among those not voting.

My most good friend the eloquent, learned, and patriotic Senator from my native State of Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] demonstrated absolutely the necessity of passing this resolution and passing it without delay. He "is seein' things" even in the daytime. Until he spoke none of us even suspected that war clouds obscure the horizon all around. Until he spoke the bay of the war dogs thundered not in our ears from every direction. He says he has not been taken into the confidence of the President. When he says it I must believe it, but it is strange, strange indeed, that the President's personal representative—and a most worthy one—at the maritime conference recently held in London, and the Senator who has been chosen by the unanimous voice of his colleagues to fill the high and responsible position of Democratic whip in the United States Senate, should not be intrusted with these weighty secrets. Is it possible that these startling prophesies of wars are but the products of an excited imagination? Only the President can tell. If the mysterious suggestion contained in the President's message conjures up such warlike visions, is it not time that we should be advised of the real situation? For the peace of mind of my genial friend, if not for my own enlightenment, I beg of you to pass this resolution. If no such terrible dangers exist as my friend fears, his anxiety should be relieved and his fears dispelled. If they do exist, then the Nation should be advised and the proper measures of defense will be taken. I may be blind, but I see no dangers to this country and to this people except from themselves and their own servants. We are at peace with all the world. Diplomatic relations are threatened with none. I know of no controversy with Germany, none with France, none with Russia, none with any country on the face of the earth that can lead to anything serious if we insist firmly upon our just rights.

Is the Senator trying to scare us? Such argument should defeat this bill rather than promote its passage. The American people can not be driven or scared to give up what they believe to be justly theirs. We do not want war. We want peace, but we do not want peace at the expense of our sovereignty over an inch of our territory. We want peace, but we will not buy it at the expense of our rights and our honor.

Mr. President, are they afraid to pass this legislation? Do they fear that it will disclose that there is no basis for the fears of my friend from Illinois and no basis for the demand of the President that this legislation is necessary for the proper solution of our foreign affairs? Have foreign governments made protests of any kind against our action regarding the Panama Canal? We know that Great Britain has, but do we know all of these representations? If we do, then there is nothing to fear from her. If we do not, then we should know them and know what they are, and it will be for us to judge whether they are fair and just and such as we should consider. Has Germany made any representations, or France, or Austria, or Russia? If so, let us know and let the people know. What are these questions of greater moment and delicacy which confront the President? We are entitled to know. We are as much interested in the welfare and peace of our beloved country as he is. Maybe we can assist him in meeting these difficulties. We want to help him. We want to assist him with advice, counsel, and in every proper way. We want to help him, but we want to do it as equals and coworkers and not as dummies. We want to share in the responsibilities and not act as puppets. We want to do our part as men and patriots. We do not want to be used as pawns on the chessboard of inexperienced diplomacy or treated as innocent, confiding children.

Mr. President, when this resolution was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations I expressed the hope that the committee would act promptly and report it. What I took for an affirmative nod of the head by my friend the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] led me to think that probably prompt action would be taken. I was mistaken.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I desire to ask the Senator if he does not know that I am not upon the Committee on Foreign Relations?

Mr. JONES. I supposed from the activity the Senator seemed to manifest in connection with the resolution that he was a member; but, at any rate, whether a member or not, I knew he could influence them and lead them to act promptly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I certainly gave no nod and no indication. The Senator simply creates the whole matter out of his own imagination.

Mr. JONES. I may have been mistaken. It was not a vigorous nod, I admit. I thought it was just a mild nod, but I may have been mistaken.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And, Mr. President, the Senator knows he resisted the reference.

Mr. JONES. Yes; I certainly did resist the reference. I wanted to have it passed. It ought to have been passed, and I still think so. The Senator, I take it, does not think it should be passed.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have not an opinion on it; but I have an opinion that the Committee on Foreign Relations, which is more familiar with the subject, ought to consider it and pass on it.

Mr. JONES. I hope the Senator will form an opinion with reference to it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will wait until the Committee on Foreign Relations acts.

Mr. JONES. I am afraid the Senator will never have an opinion then.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I certainly will not form an opinion from anything I hear from the Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES. The committee is not going to report it. It will not be passed. You confess that there is no fact or condition that will justify the position of the President. If there was, you would be glad to present it. If it were passed and answer made, what would be shown? I am going to tell you a part of what would be shown.

It would be shown that no nation on the face of the earth has protested against our action exempting our coastwise ships from paying tolls except Great Britain, and that she practically admitted our right to do this but feared we would not be able to enforce our laws. It might show—I fear it would—that taking advantage of the situation our diplomacy has gotten us into in relation to Mexico, she is exacting this as a part of the price for her assistance in extricating ourselves from the embarrassments of our own making. We will stand by the President in his treatment of the Mexican situation, whether we believe he is taking the wise course or not, but we will not buy England's assistance at any price or the assistance of any other nation.

It is said that other nations have not protested because they are not parties to the treaty, and therefore have no right to protest. Every nation has exactly the same rights as England. We have agreed with England to give every nation exactly the same treatment that we give her, and if they feel that we are not giving them the treatment they are entitled to they can very properly protest to us directly, just as B could sue me directly for failure to carry out a written contract made with A in B's interest.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. JONES. For a question.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the Senator state which resolution now before the Committee on Foreign Relations he is referring to?

Mr. JONES. I read the resolution near the beginning of my remarks. It is Senate resolution 309, calling on the President for information in reference to what representations have been made to him with regard to our action on the Panama Canal tolls.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is the one the Senator presented?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Is that the one he is discussing now?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Then I make the point of order that that resolution——

Mr. JONES. That is not the resolution I am discussing. I am discussing the resolution that has been handed down from the table by the Chair and which is now before the Senate.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator said he was discussing the resolution which he introduced.

Mr. JONES. I thought the Senator wanted information in reference to the resolution I introduced.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I make the point of order that that resolution is not before the Senate.

Mr. JONES. I object to an interruption by the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. In connection with the point of order——

Mr. JONES. I do not yield, Mr. President, for that purpose.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I desire to call the attention of the Chair to page 93 of Jefferson's Manual, which is a part of the rules of the Senate where not changed by a specific rule of the Senate. I submit that unless the Senator in good faith states that he is addressing himself to the resolution before the Senate he can not proceed.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, this is not the first time I have heard a point of order made against a Senator that he was not discussing the question before the Senate. But the point of order has never been sustained. It has been ruled upon over and over again.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair, early in the experience of the present incumbent, was very desirous of ruling that Senators should talk upon the matter that was before the Senate, but learned that the history of the United States Senate from the beginning was that a Senator could talk about anything, whether it was applicable to the matter before the Senate or not.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. If the Chair will permit me, I desire to make this point. I laid the ground——

Mr. JONES. I make the point of order that a point of order is not debatable, and especially that it is not debatable after the Vice President has ruled upon it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. A point of order is debatable, and I desire to call the attention of the Chair to this fact——

Mr. JONES. I make the point of order, and I ask for a ruling of the Chair upon it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has ruled that the Senator from Washington, under the unanimous precedents of the United States Senate, may talk about anything he pleases, regardless of the subject matter that is before the Senate.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the Chair permit me to make a parliamentary inquiry?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Certainly.

Mr. JONES. I do not yield for a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Washington refuses to yield, and the Senator from Washington has the floor.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Chair has yielded to me for a point of order and has recognized me for a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has ruled on the point of order.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Chair recognized me for a parliamentary inquiry, and I have the floor for that purpose.

Mr. JONES. I do not yield for that purpose.

Mr. GALLINGER. Regular order!

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I desire to inquire of the Chair whether the Chair heard the Senator from Washington state that he was discussing the resolution which had been referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes; the Chair heard that; and the Chair has heard the same statement made half a dozen times since the chair has been occupied by the present incumbent when a like inquiry has been made, and the Chair has been compelled to rule, much against the desire of the Chair, that in accordance with the custom of the Senate a Senator can talk about anything he pleases, regardless of what may be pending before the Senate of the United States.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Is not that done under color of discussing a pending matter and not by the admission of a Senator that he is discussing something else?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has not been so construed by the Senate of the United States, and the Chair knows of no way to prevent it except to amend the rules. The Senator from Washington has the floor.

Mr. JONES. I am not surprised that our friends seem to want to cut off discussion with reference to this very important matter.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair must insist that improper motives can not be charged against Senators of the United States.

Mr. JONES. I did not suppose that it was suggesting an improper motive to suggest that they would like to cut off debate and hasten the passage of the bill. I know they want to do that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is very close to a suggestion of that kind.

Mr. JONES. I certainly desire to withdraw it, if any remark of that kind would be considered improper. I would not impute any improper motive to my friends on the other side, even in their great anxiety to get this measure passed.

If this resolution were passed and answered, it would appear that no criticism of our course has been made in any country save Great Britain, except through some newspapers, and very few of them, and by a few individuals, and in every such country an equal number of equal authority and reputation have conceded our right to do as we have done. If the opinions of a few newspapers and individuals are going to cause us to give away our just rights and our very sovereignty itself, then indeed is our foreign policy deplorable and our diplomacy shameful.

If this resolution were passed and answered, it would show that no question confronts us as a Nation that endangers our peace or threatens our security or requires any other treatment than that of firmness, tact, and a strict adherence to justice.

It would show no serious problems except those arising out of the mistakes of the administration, and which would have been avoided if Congress had been taken into the confidence of the Executive.

We are told that even the South American countries are questioning our disposition to live up to our treaty obligations. Upon what is such a statement based? The President says that the newspapers so charge. Is that all? He claims the newspapers have been misrepresenting him in regard to this question. May not these newspapers misrepresent their people? Is not it possible that some sinister influence is behind them? Does he not know that English capital and English interests control and influence many of the papers of South America? Sidney Story, a member of the New Orleans Association of Commerce, resided in Brazil several years, and he gave an interview to the Anniston Star, Anniston, Ala., a few days ago that throws a good deal of light on this subject, and I shall ask to print it as a part of my remarks, but I want to quote here one paragraph showing the President what he may expect from some of the papers of these countries. He says:

When the Lodge resolution was adopted by the United States Senate protesting against the acquirement of territory by foreign nations in the Western Hemisphere a cable dispatch from London to the Journal do Commercio, Brazil, stated that "the American Senate has passed a resolution forbidding any foreigner from acquiring property in Latin America." "The dispatch," he says, "then went on with a terrific diatribe against American arrogance, insolence, and the Monroe doctrine."

Again, he says:

Recently President Wilson's "mobile declaration and liberal and patient policy toward Mexico" have been denounced in the Diario de Noticia (Brazil), a publication recently acquired by English interests, as Pirataria Norte Americano, or North American Piracy, the President's policy being denounced in this Portuguese, but English-owned, paper as "puritanical hypocrisy."

Mr. President, I ask permission to print as a part of my remarks this interview.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The interview referred to is as follows:

[From the Anniston Star, Anniston, Ala., March 23, 1914.]

PERNICIOUS ENGLISH ACTIVITY WORKS MISCHIEF THROUGH THE NEWS AGENCIES—SIDNEY STORY TELLS HOW UNITED STATES AND SOUTH AMERICAN COUNTRIES ARE KEPT APART BY FALSE STATEMENTS SENT OUT BY FOREIGN-CONTROLLED NEWS SOURCES.

Sidney Story, a member of the New Orleans Association of Commerce, who spent some time in Anniston last summer as the guest of his friend, Proprietor Foute, of the Anniston Hotel, contributes to the Star to-day an article which is worthy of thorough consideration. Mr. Story for years resided in Brazil and is thoroughly conversant with conditions in that wonderful new country; and being a close observer and a deep thinker, his charges against European nations, while very grave, must be considered as being based on something more than mere opinion.

Mr. Story charges that Europeans, and especially the English, control the sources of information and the press reports between America and Latin America, and that these foreign influences are doing everything possible to stir up unpleasantness between the United States and the South American countries, citing examples of matter published in newspapers there and showing the absurdity of some of the dispatches transmitted to the American papers.

In his communication to the Star Mr. Story says:

EXAGGERATED STATEMENTS.

"We read in the press of so-called revolutions and martial law in Brazil. As one who knows Brazil and her people, and who has made a careful study of conditions—social, political, and commercial—in that great South Equatorial Republic, let me assure my countrymen that there is as much truth in these exaggerated statements as there was in recent dispatches from London which stated that ex-President Roosevelt, while in Brazil, after receiving princely hospitality, had been charging for his speeches and had aroused indignation and caustic criticism in Rio de Janeiro.

"This statement of the English news service was a day later branded as false by direct cables from Brazil.

"To quote a high Brazilian official in the United States: 'I am in receipt of cable from Rio stating absolute peace prevails, not only in that city but also in the whole of Brazil, except the State of Ceara, where, on account of certain local political parties, there has been violent opposition, which has no serious importance and soon will be brought to a favorable end.'"

ABUSING UNITED STATES.

If one was to pick up certain English-controlled papers published in Brazil and Spanish America at this time, he would, no doubt, read many abusive things said about us in re Mexico, canal tolls, and the great army of revolutionists under Commander Kelly marching from California on Washington.

In other words, the dispatches purporting to be news that come to us via London must always be taken "cum grano salis."

This system of exaggeration and misrepresentation of North and South America by Europe has been in vogue for years.

The Europeans not only own the monopoly of ocean transportation, which wrings annual tribute out of American commerce to the tune of hundreds of millions, but control the cables and the news service to Latin America. Besides, all European nations doing business in South America not only control newspapers published in their own languages but also control certain native newspapers that every day of the year lambast America and everything American.

WATCH PRACTICAL SIDE.

The older nations of Europe, whilst preaching peace and good will among men, don't overlook the practical side of things. They know from experience that transportation, cables, and news service are a mighty trinity of power, which is necessary to keep down North American prestige and increasing commercial influences. Europe is overcrowded with millions and burdened with an industrial overproduction. South America offers the only field for her to expand. She has had this field in undisputed possession in the past and is now excited over our commercial conquests, and nations are exercising all their wits to check the North American peril.

For this reason we note how the net of international intrigues are closing in on us. If we opened our eyes, we would discover that those who many of us think are our friends are in reality our worst enemies. They are pulling the diplomatic strings to embarrass us and to make us relinquish advantages that we possess.

MIGHTY COMBINE FORMED.

To him who will investigate these facts the conclusion must be reached that there has been formed a mighty combine on the part of European nations to checkmate the foreign commercial expansion of the United States before it elbows them out of the Latin-American field.

The news service in the hands of the Europeans merely supports the war which European transportation monopoly of the seas carries on against our international, commercial, and financial interests.

The control of newspapers in Latin America by English and other nations is used to sow the seeds of suspicion and hatred against North America. The English-controlled Latin-American news service scatters broadcast throughout our land exaggerated accounts of revolutions, etc., in South America. The scheme is to keep the North and South Americans apart, and thereby conserve the Latin-American fields for English European exploitation.

A FEW ILLUSTRATIONS.

To illustrate, let me quote a few excerpts from English-controlled Latin-American papers, viz:

The Standard, of Buenos Aires (an English publication), says:

"History, especially disreputable history, is about to repeat itself. North Americans are bent on making trouble for the Mexicans, as they did in 1846. This they can afford to do, for the Mexicans, standing alone and unhelped by the rest of the Latin Americas, would be unable to cope with their gigantic neighbor; but it might happen that the Latin races in the south would combine to help Mexico in a life-and-death struggle with the Yankees, because the southerners would know that the conquest of Mexico by the Yankee Nation would only be a prelude to the eventual overrunning of the whole of the Latins on the American Continent, which would be as great a curse as any that could fall upon the civilized world of to-day. It does not seem an impossible dream or a thing beyond the range of practical politics that ere long an offenseive and defensive alliance may be entered into by all the Latin races, and any trouble that may arise between the Yankees and the Mexicans may tend toward bringing this about."

THE A. B. C. ALLIANCE.

As a matter of fact, English diplomacy is responsible for the A. B. C. alliance, which is aimed against the United States, which has no reason to exist, but which English intrigue has forced politicians of Argentina, Brazil, and Chile to form.

We read in the Gazetta de Noticies of Brazil a telegram from Buenos Aires (emanating from this English European news service) "that North America was aiding the revolution in Ecuador because Uncle Sam is trying to steal the Gallapagos Islands, off the Pacific entrance to the Panama Canal."

We know that Japan and England have coveted these islands, which would enable England to mount at the Pacific entrance of our canal her frowning guns, such as she has commanding the Atlantic terminus of the Panama Canal.

FOMENT TROUBLE.

The Correa de Manha, a Portugese paper published in Brazil and influenced financially by English interests, said that "the American minister to Argentina had secured by questionable methods the contract from the Argentine Government for the construction in American yards of the Argentine battleships, and in so doing has promised to Argentina the loan of United States dreadnoughts to attack Brazil."

This infamous scandal, said the publication in bold headlines, "was discovered in Europe. France, England, and Germany were going to call Uncle Sam to account."

This was intended to inflame the Brazilian mind against the United States. When the Lodge resolution was adopted by the United States Senate, protesting against the acquirement of territory by foreign nations in the Western Hemisphere, a cable dispatch from London to the Journal de Commercio, Brazil, stated that "the American Senate had passed a resolution forbidding any foreigner from acquiring property in Latin America." The dispatch then went on with a terrific diatribe against American arrogance, insolence, and the Monroe doctrine.

DENOUNCE WILSON'S POLICY.

Recently President Wilson's "mobile declaration and liberal and patient policy toward Mexico have been denounced in the Diaro de Noticia, Brazil, a publication recently acquired by English interests, as Pirataria North Americano, or North American Piracy, the President's policy being denounced in this Portugese, but English-owned, paper as "puritanical hypocrisy." These are merely samples of the thousands of villainous things said by English-controlled newspapers in South America about us, while at this end we are asked to believe England is our best friend and the only power who will keep the Japanese buggaboo from terrorizing us.

CONTENDING FOR SUPREMACY.

Volumes could be written by one who will analyze things in South America by going to the core. He will find that it's the field where the nations are contesting for supremacy. It's war; the war of commerce which is being waged with as much venom, hatred, and duplicity as were the wars of the sword.

America must open her eyes and learn how to play the game or be elbowed out of advantageous positions which we will not be able to regain later, when we grow wiser, except at an immense cost of blood and treasure.

For this we will surely have to do when necessity compells us to find markets for our surplus production in order to keep our factories working and our millions employed, so as to maintain our prosperity and more domestic tranquillity.

Mr. JONES. Surely the President will not allow himself to be deceived by these papers. Surely he will not allow their utterances to lead him to think that they express the real sentiments of the people of those countries or, if they do that, he can get their good will and respect by such a humiliating surrender of our rights as is involved in this legislation.

"But," you say, "trust the President. Do as we have done before," and you point to the fact that Congress placed $50,000,000 in the hands of President McKinley without any restrictions or without ever asking him to account, and that is cited as an argument in favor of this action. No, Mr. President, the cases are not parallel. We knew what dangers confronted us then. We knew what that money was for. War with Spain was hourly expected by everybody. This money was to prepare for it, and Congress knew that as well as the President. That did not involve a surrender of the Nation's rights, the Nation's sovereignty, and the Nation's honor at the behest of another power. It made an appropriation to prepare for the Nation's defense and to equip her armies in defense of humanity. If President Wilson wants money for the national defense, we will give it to him ungrudgingly, but if he were to ask us to cede away a foot of our territory to placate a foreign power we would not do it until we were prostrate and helpless at the foot of our foe.

"But," you say, "the President must have had some good reason for urging us to do this thing. Why can you not trust him? He would not urge us to do this on the basis he does without good and substantial reasons. If you think no serious matters confront us, how do you account for the President's suggestion?" In this way:

I have the very highest regard for the President. I admire him in many respects. I know his motives are the purest and the best. His honesty, sincerity, and patriotism are not open to question. His life, character, and achievements are an inspiration. I want his administration to be a success, and I shall do all in my power to make it a success, and I shall gladly support every measure that he may propose that appeals to my judgment, and I know that he will not count it lese majesty if I question the wisdom of his judgment. Here is the trouble, and I say it in the greatest respect:

I myself taught school for 10 years. In teaching I was confident and sure of my ground. I seemed to be quite successful when dealing with children who accepted my judgment without question and who were expected to obey my orders without asking the reason why. My will was law, and I acted on that theory. My mind and my will were trained in that way. With my pupils I was confident, self-reliant, unyielding, withal considerate. I was unfitted, however, to deal with others, and especially in other lines of work. Brought into controversy with independent, self-reliant, strong, experienced men in connection with other work, I was fearful, hesitating, and wholly unfitted to deal with them. As a result, I was willing to yield to their views as the easiest way out of difficulties and controversies that I was wholly unfitted to meet.

President Wilson has been a school-teacher all his life. His word has been law. He could give his reasons for his decisions or withhold them, as he saw fit. The problems he is dealing with now are not those of the schoolmaster. The men with whom he comes in contact are neither school children nor school-teachers. They are men with their own opinions, men of wide experience in practical affairs, and men determined to gain their ends and protect the interests intrusted to them. They are well versed in the game of "bluff."

Is it any wonder that the President lacks confidence in his ability to deal with these men in regard to the problems that they will have in hand? Is it any wonder that he says he will not know how to deal with them unless he can give them all they ask? He will not know how to do it, but that is no good reason why Congress should reverse itself. It is a good reason, however, for the President to confide in Congress and ask its advice and get its help and cooperation.

Mr. President, I am not the only one who wants information before taking action that appears to be most humiliating and entirely unnecessary. The people are asking for the information. The press is asking for it, and the press that gets right down to the thoughts and hearts and consciences of the people. I have here an editorial from the Washington Herald, a supporter of the President in the very matter at issue. It says, under date of March 26:

CRISIS IN THE TOLLS FIGHT.

President Wilson has it in his power to clinch the victory in his fight for repeal of the exemption of American coastwise ships from payment of canal tolls. * * * Should the President appear before the two Houses of Congress again and supplement his original appeal for the legislation he deems so necessary with a presentation of arguments in support of his position all opposition would take wings. It is not necessary that he take the people into his confidence regarding any delicate diplomatic negotiations now pending. He has said that, since the Baltimore convention and presidential campaign, he has discovered that repeal of the exemption is just and right; that the honor of the Nation demands it. Without question he has weighty arguments to explain his change of view. Should he place them before Senate and House his cause will certainly triumph.

Mr. President, there is not any question that if reasons sound, cogent, and convincing were presented to the Senate and to the other House they would have great influence, and that the Senate and the House would act willingly, cheerfully, and promptly so long as such action did not involve a cession of our sovereignty over our own territory or the giving up of sovereign rights and principles.

In the Washington Post of March 27 I find an editorial headed "Let the people have light." It reads as follows:

LET THE PEOPLE HAVE LIGHT.

President Wilson is not personally applying the whip and spur to Democrats in Congress in an effort to force them to abandon their convictions and support him on the canal-tolls question. But some of his ardent supporters are resorting to bluff, bluster, and intimidation in a frenzied desire to rush the repeal bill through Congress. If the country were on the brink of war and repeal were the only thing that could avert a clash, these overeager supporters of the President could not be more active and vehement.

As the President has repeatedly declared that there is no special emergency requiring instant action, the question naturally arises, Why this headlong haste? Why should Congress rush this bill through before the people can be heard from? What is the reason behind this effort to reverse the popular will without giving the people a chance to express themselves?

The public is absolutely in the dark as to the real reasons why the repeal bill should be passed. Not only that, but Congress itself is equally in the dark.

On no other great question has Congress been lashed into action without proper inquiry and deliberation.

The tariff bill was pushed with vigor, but there was opportunity to debate it, and Congress acted with full knowledge of what it was doing.

The currency bill was also pressed to a vote in record time, but the bill was subjected to scrutiny and amendments which greatly improved it. The bill as introduced and the law as passed were very different pieces of work. Every hour of debate on the currency bill proved to be of value to the people.

Now it is proposed to railroad an act through Congress which involves our relations with the outside world; which raises the question whether the United States is master of the mighty work it has constructed at Panama; which affects the movements of our Navy in time of war; which deals with the commerce of our three coasts and the internal commerce that will swell the traffic through the canal; which disturbs our treaty relations with the Republic of Panama; which draws into controversy the problem of regulating transcontinental railroad rates; and which attempts to take from Congress the sole power to regulate interstate and foreign commerce, and to permit a foreign nation through a treaty to share in this power of regulating our own commerce.

The American people, so far as they have expressed themselves, have declared that their domestic commerce shall pass through their own canal free of tolls. Their last expression was through the great political parties, which made strong declarations in favor of untaxed domestic shipping.

All of the candidates for President, including the present incumbent, approved of this position.

What has occurred since the election to justify an attempt to reverse the popular will? What overshadowing peril confronts the country which requires the administration to disregard the popular will and command Congress to act instantly with its eyes closed and its lips sealed?

If a question of war should confront this country, the people would demand full particulars before authorizing their representatives in Congress to say the word that would bring our arms into action. The people would have a right to expect perfect frankness on the part of the Government, and they would not tolerate anything less.

Is the Panama tolls question so important, so secret, so big with danger, that its ins and outs can not be confided to the American people? Is it more dangerous than a question of war itself? Has it behind it such direful possibilities that no hint of them can be confided to the people whose interests are imperiled?

Never before in the history of the United States, we venture to say, has Congress been asked to act upon a matter of such consequence without having been furnished with the reason why it should act. Certainly no demand has ever before been made for a reversal of the popular will without giving a reason for the demand.

As the Post has already observed, there is no reason for haste if it is true that the majority in favor of repeal is assured. The fortunes of the administration are not in the balance in that event. If there is not a majority in favor of repeal, perhaps it is because Congress and the people are in the dark. Possibly if the reasons for repeal were laid before them there would be no dissenting votes. But it is too much to expect that Congress will surrender absolutely its judgment to the eager partisans of the President, who are themselves in the dark.

Let the people have light on this question, in order that Congress may act according to the popular will.

Mr. President, I have another editorial from the Washington Post and also one taken from the Cincinnati Enquirer, which I ask to have inserted as a part of my remarks without reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there is no objection, that may be done.

The editorials referred to are as follows:

[From the Washington Post, March 26, 1914.]

WHY HASTEN TOLL ACTION?

The House of Representatives to-day will vote on a special rule under which it is proposed to put the bill to repeal the toll-exemption clause of the Panama Canal act to a final vote upon the expiration of 15 hours of discussion. This rule also will provide that no amendment shall be in order. Members of that body will be required to vote on the proposition as submitted by the committee and in no other way. The Post believes it is questionable whether the country at large will approve of this hasty manner of dealing with this subject, which, looked upon from any point of view, is of vital importance to the people of the United States.

The Post believes that President Wilson is big enough and broad enough in dealing with this great question to await the sober judgment of the American people. We believe that the President and Congress will lose nothing by permitting the people to be heard.

No Government, republican in form, can retain power when it acts contrary to the will of the electorate. It becomes more strongly intrenched than ever when supported by the electorate after the settlement of a debatable problem; there stands the majority of the people. The proper settlement of this canal problem would seem to be one in which the voters themselves have a right to be heard, because their votes in the last election were dependent upon definite pledges which to-day, in some quarters, are held to have not been binding.

Congress and the country are entitled to relief from hasty legislation, which sometimes might easily become ill-advised and dangerous. President Wilson asked Congress to remain here and pass a tariff law and reform the currency. This was ungrudgingly done, although it involved great inconvenience and physical discomfort. The country now faces a situation in Mexico that is trying and, at times, irritating. Committees of both House of Congress now are wrestling with the trust question in response to the urgent request of the President that remedial legislation along those lines be enacted during this session. All these things have kept Congress busy and the country disturbed. It may well be asked, and is being asked throughout the country, whether it is wise to proceed with undue haste to repeal legislation, previously considered with great care in both Houses of Congress, and thereby, as some public men assert, nullify a well-established domestic policy. Scores of Democratic Congressmen desire to voice the sentiments of their constituents, and should have time to consult them.

The Post believes President Wilson is honest and sincere in his recommendations to Congress on this subject.

Already there are indications of an aroused public sentiment. The country may be in error and the President may be in the right in the position he has taken. If he is in the right and public sentiment is wrong, a little time in which to think the question over will bring the country to the President's support. Many public men are of the opinion there is no need for haste.

If the President thinks he has the majority of the House with him, the more reason for showing no undue haste.

Firmly convinced that it is the duty of this country to repeal the canal law as he is, President Wilson can afford to defer to the public wish for a little delay. Such acquiescence, the Post believes, will not reflect in the least upon the President. On the contrary, it will emphasize the broadmindedness of the man and the higher character of a statesmanship that represents not the will of one man but of the entire American people.

[From the Cincinnati Enquirer.]

PUT NO CANAL TOLL ON OUR COMMERCE.

It is to be hoped that President Wilson will soon be in position that he can take the people of the United States into his confidence, and give them his reasons for the change of the opinion which he held as a candidate and as a Democrat upon the question of Panama tolls exemption.

His reference to matters of great delicacy and near consequence, which he will not know how to deal with unless Congress grants its support in ungrudging measure to his request for repeal of the law may clearly point the way to obedient Congressmen, but it gives no reasons to the people for his change of judgment or opinion since 1912.

If a former Republican administration entered into a treaty with any foreign power by which our coastwise trade—a part, and an important part, of our domestic commerce—was made subject to any degree of control by such foreign power the country should be plainly told of this and its support requested for abrogation of such treaty.

No administration should have made such a treaty; no United States Senate that ever convened would knowingly have approved of such a treaty.

No administration can secure a verdict of approval from the people if it recognizes the existence of any such control by a foreign power over our domestic commerce.

Neither Great Britain nor any other power can, by treaty or by any other means, secure the right to demand that impost, tax, tolls, or any other costs be levied upon any branch of our domestic commerce if the people are to pass upon such issue.

The honor of this country is safe with our people in their unanimous rejection of any such claim if put forth by any foreign power on the globe.

There is no partisanship in the consideration of such an issue as this.

There was no difference of opinion among the voters of the Democratic, the Progressive, nor of the Republican Parties in 1912 as to the freedom of our coastwise vessels from tolls at the Panama Canal.

There is no difference in their opinions now.

The voters of the Democratic, the Progressive, and the Republican Parties are equally patriotic, and they will not consider for a moment the claim of any foreign power that we must place tolls upon that part of our domestic commerce which passes through our own canal, or upon any part, portion, or class of our domestic commerce at any point.

The British undersecretary of foreign affairs, in a letter written in 1912 to Secretary of State Knox, is quoted as follows:

"If the trade should be so regulated as to make certain that only bona fide coastwise traffic which was reserved for United States vessels would be benefited by this exemption, it may be that no objection could be taken."

Great Britain, Germany, France, or other great powers would not discuss for a moment the claim of any power to hold a treaty right to demand that tolls be placed upon their coastwise trade in the waterways they own, control, or have built.

The American people will submit to no such assumption of power by any foreign nation that has existence, and their wrath will be felt at the polls by those who would vote repeal of the tolls-exemption law.

Our coastwise trade is domestic commerce, and is no more subject to foreign control or interference than is the Capital of our Nation or the land of our States, Territories, and possessions.

Let our Senators and Representatives hearken to the voice of their constituents; let them listen to the deepening tones of patriotic opposition to this repeal, tones which will rise in thunders of nation-wide resentment to those who would concede to any foreign power any right to regulate or control the domestic commerce of this Republic.

Mr. JONES. I also have an editorial from the North American, of Philadelphia, of March 25, under the title "The Nation wounded," which I ask to have printed and put into my remarks without reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission is granted.

The editorial referred to is as follows:

THE NATION WOUNDED.

The bitterest enemy of The North American would hardly accuse it, we think, of any leaning toward jingoism. That policy, in our judgment, is the meanest possible counterfeit of true nationalism. Too often it is the device of the unscrupulous, who would sacrifice even human life to gain personal or political advantage. It is that false presentment of patriotism which Dr. Johnson said was "the last refuge of a scoundrel."

It is in the nature of man to admire physical courage and martial ardor, and the nation which does not honor such qualities is beginning to decay. We say this despite our belief that a rarer and finer spirit is that moral courage which stands firm for principle against the grinding pressure of circumstance, without hope of reward and without the stimulating thrill of the battle field.

Yet if there is one hurt more grievous than another that can be inflicted upon a nation, it is the wounding and weakening of its national pride. No country can be truly great whose people have been led to doubt its honor or its ability to command just and respectful treatment from the world.

This seems to us an obvious truth, yet we fear that it has not impressed itself upon the mind of President Wilson, for upon no other hypothesis can his undoubted patriotism be reconciled with his course in the Panama Canal tolls controversy.

It is not our present purpose to discuss the legal and diplomatic merits of the question, but, rather, the manner and the method of the President in dealing with it. We shall simply say, so that our readers may know our position, that we believe the United States has the fullest right, morally and under the terms of existing treaties, to pass its domestic commerce free through its own canal.

We believe, moreover, that Great Britain's demand for repeal of the exemption clause was dictated less by sentiments of exact justice than by her policy of fighting for every inch of commercial advantage obtainable, and that the present application of pressure from London is due to the favorable opportunity offered by our embarrassing situation in regard to Mexican affairs. Furthermore, if it were clear, as it is not, that Great Britain sincerely believed in the justice of her case, and that there was a genuine ground for dispute, we should favor its reference to the international court of arbitration at The Hague.

For to-day, however, we put all these questions aside. Our concern is wholly with the course pursued by President Wilson in handling the problem. And in this we see results deplorable to his good name and gravely hurtful to the American Nation.

His unfortunate act can be described in few words. On March 5 he appeared before the Houses of Congress and read an address in which he characterized the exemption of American coastwise vessels from payment of tolls as an economic blunder and a violation of international agreement which reflected upon our good faith, and demanded a speedy reversal of policy in order to assist him in dealing with certain foreign affairs. These were his words:

"We ought to reverse our action without raising the question whether we were right or wrong, and so once more deserve our reputation for generosity and the redemption of our obligation without quibble or hesitation. I ask this of you in support of the foreign policy of the administration. I shall not know how to deal with other matters of even greater delicacy and nearer consequence if you do not grant it to me in ungrudging measure."

These are startling assertions. If President Wilson has discovered that the exemption of American coastwise vessels would be an economic mistake, and also that such concession to our domestic commerce in our own waterway would be an international breach of faith, surely it is his duty to acquaint the American people with those unanswerable arguments for his recently formed decision. American citizens are intelligent and open minded enough to be counted upon to support their President loyally, if he can advance sound and conclusive reasons for his unusual course.

But when, without argument or explanation, he demands repudiation, "right or wrong," of a policy adopted by the preceding administration, upheld by former Presidents Taft and Roosevelt, enacted by a Democratic House and a Republican Senate, indorsed by the Democratic and Progressive platforms, supported by the Democratic Speaker, the Democratic House leader, and by Mr. Wilson himself when a candidate; sustained by competent British authority and approved by the majority of the American people—and when the most conspicuous of his supporters are the interests back of the transcontinental railroads—in these conditions, we submit, the President asks more than he has any right to ask, and more than patriotism can give.

This much we should say, if the President's extraordinary demand had been made in less objectionable terms—if he had not seen fit, in a public and formal utterance, to charge the American people with a deliberate act of bad faith.

But he was not content merely to state his own convictions and prefer his remarkable plea against the judgment of the Nation and Congress. He urged that, "right or wrong," without considering evidence, precedents, or related facts, we should yield to the demands of a foreign nation, lest he "should not know how to deal with other matters of greater delicacy."

The other statements and implications of his address were unusual; but this, we say, was unnatural and lamentable. For it furnished the first instance in which a personage of influence has advised that the United States should yield to foreign pressure, "right or wrong"; that this Nation should, in effect, pay tribute to another power, lest, in default of that, it be placed in a position where it could not meet other international problems. Surely a more astounding utterance never emanated from a President of the United States.

Friends of President Wilson and his administration deceive themselves if they believe that this humiliating incident has not sunk deep into the patriotic soul of the average American citizen. They are woefully mistaken if they think, because the murmurs have not grown loud enough to reach their ears, that there is widespread acquiescence in the course adopted. The truth is that the President has put his heel upon the patriotic nerve of this Nation; and, though there may be no outcry, that nerve is bruised and quivering.

If those close to the administration could "dictagraph" the editorial councils being held daily in the offices even of friendly newspapers, if they could get the innermost judgment of men free from partisan basis, they would be convinced that, even if the president drives his policy through, the question will by no means be closed. For it is perfectly clear to everyone familiar with political controversies that this issue is one which will not die; that the President has raised a ghost which will be at his shoulder as long as he holds his exalted office.

It is needless to say that we do not attribute his action to railroad influence or to lack of the purest patriotism. Our belief is simply that he has lost his perspective. His vision is so intent upon our Mexican entanglements that he can not see the broader issues that touch the very life and future of the Nation. The immediate difficulties seem to him the overshadowing problem, and their solution the most vital task of his administration. Yet greater far than these things, outweighing them immeasurably in importance and far-reaching influence, is the preservation of the national spirit, which he has weakened by his intemperate and unjustifiable utterance.

President Wilson might profitably study the record of his Democratic predecessor, Grover Cleveland. That President's policies touching economic problems are remembered chiefly by historians; but what he did toward the assertion of national honor and the elevation of national prestige lives in the mind of every American. The one outstanding act of his two administrations was his message to Great Britain and the world at a time when this country was ill prepared to enforce his decrees:

"To-day the United States is practically sovereign upon this continent, and its fiat is law upon the subjects to which it confines its interposition."

Europe sneered at this move as "shirtsleeve diplomacy," but Europe obeyed the mandate; and the utterance of Grover Cleveland did more to upbuild Americanism abroad and at home than the work of any other Executive since Lincoln.

The North American is no partisan critic of President Wilson. We recognize his patriotic purpose and sincerely desire the success of his administration. But, however admirable his intent and however great his services in other directions, we must deplore his manner of handling this Panama question.

To charge the Nation and its representatives with deliberate bad faith, to demand the reversal of a well-considered policy, "right or wrong," and to urge that the United States purchase foreign friendship by yielding tribute under pressure—such a course is more than a political blunder; it is an insidious peril to this country's prestige and to that spirit of nationalism which is the very soul of the American people.

Mr. JONES. I also ask unanimous consent that there may be inserted as part of my remarks, without reading, the portions of two editorials in the Washington Post of March 28, which I have marked.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that may be done.

The matter referred to is as follows:

It was recognized as such a national affair in 1912 that the Democratic and the Progressive Parties gave their pledges to the people that our coastwise commerce should be free from tolls, and the Republican candidate, for himself and his party, made his position clear as distinctly in favor of such freedom.

Less than two years ago this freedom from tolls of our coastwise commerce was the creed of the Nation, the profession of faith of the three candidates for the Presidency, and was ratified by the votes of more than 13,500,000 of our citizens.

Freedom from tolls for our coastwise vessels was thereby made a national policy in a most positive and unmistakable manner.

* * * * * * *

With all due respect to the President, believing that he is convinced he is right in his change of opinion, we can not accept his conclusions without being advised of his reasons for such a complete reversal of his own position upon this subject.

* * * * * * *

If there is a commanding reason why the United States should surrender its rights to control the Panama Canal and its coastwise shipping, the people and Congress have a right to know it. Perhaps every man in the country would favor the President's side if this reason were known.

* * * * * * *

Since it is evident that this mysterious reason is not to be confided to Congress or the people, since Congress is expected to vote "sight unseen" on this question, it must act in the light of the reasons before it. It has no right to surrender its judgment to anyone. The people did not elect Congress to act as the mere puppet of the administration any more than it elected Woodrow Wilson to be the mere puppet of Congress.

What, then, are the reasons why Congress should refuse to surrender control of the Panama Canal and domestic shipping?

Because the American people decreed that a canal should be built, to be owned and controlled by the United States, for the purpose of promoting the welfare of the country in peace and defending it in war. For this purpose they taxed themselves $400,000,000, out of the pockets of capital and labor, industry and commerce, trade and agriculture, rich and poor.

It was for the purpose of getting absolute control of this canal that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was superseded. The people did not want any partner in this canal. They did not have any quarrel with Great Britain, and they have no quarrel with her now. They did what they would have expected Great Britain herself to do—they looked out for themselves and their own country.

If France had built the canal at Panama, she would have been entitled to operate it to the advantage of French commerce and French war vessels, and no country would have objected.

The United States has not bound itself to Great Britain or any other country to share in the operation of the canal. It violates no treaty obligation when it treats all nations alike, so long as they observe the rules laid down by it—and not by them—for the operation of the canal.

The people remembered their agony of suspense while the Oregon was hurrying around South America, and they determined that there should be a canal that would permit the passage of American warships from one ocean to the other.

They will not now tolerate a pusillanimous policy that would rob the United States of the advantages of the canal in time of war. They will not support the theory that this country must treat an enemy's ships on an equality with our own in time of war.

The people will not approve any action by Congress or the President, or both, that will turn the Panama Canal over to our commercial rivals and permit foreign nations to dictate the terms upon which American ships shall pass from one of our coasts to the other through an American canal paid for by American money.

These are reasons why the American people expect Members of Congress to defend the honor and interests of the United States. They are watching every vote cast on this question, and every man in casting his vote must determine for himself whether he will heed the people's will or try to hide behind the personality of the President of the United States.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, in 1912 Congress passed the law it is now sought to repeal. It was discussed for months. Every economic question and every political question, foreign and domestic, was considered in all its bearings. When the question came to a vote in this body 44 Senators voted for the exemption and only 11 against, and it is a most significant fact, in view of the present conditions, that not a single Democrat voted against the exemption, and some of the Republicans who voted against it expressly stated that they believed we had the right to make the exemption, but thought we should not do it, for economic reasons. Nothing new has arisen since that action was taken. We are asked to change this waterway from a national to an international waterway; to surrender our sovereignty over our own territory and our own property; to place our coastwise shipping at the mercy of that nation that from the foundation of our Government has used every possible means, from piracy, war, discriminations, and subsidies, treaties, and conventions, to hamper and destroy our shipping; to destroy the competitive value of this great waterway and assist the transcontinental railways in exacting higher freight rates from the people who had hoped for so much from this great enterprise and to place ourselves and our ships upon an absolute inequality with all other nations of the earth, while bearing all the burdens of construction, operation, and maintenance of the canal; and with all this we are asked to confess abjectly that we deliberately dishonored ourselves by violating the plain obligations of a treaty. Mr. President, I will not vote to do all this until the American people have had a chance to express themselves upon it and direct me to do so. What their verdict will be I have not the least doubt. They have never yet retreated in dishonor; they have never yet preserved peace by purchase.

Mr. President, the Senate will demonstrate that it is the tribune of the people and not the satrapy of the Executive.

Now, Mr. President, I withdraw my objection to the request of the Senator from Utah.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, then, the resolution will go over without prejudice.

THE CALENDAR.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Morning business is closed. The calendar, under Rule VIII, is in order.

The bill (S. 1240) to establish the legislative reference bureau of the Library of Congress was announced as first in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 655) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to survey the lands of the abandoned Fort Assinniboine Military Reservation and open the same to settlement was announced as next in order.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let that bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The joint resolution (S J. Res. 41) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to sell or lease certain public lands to the Republic Coal Co., a corporation, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2242) making it unlawful for any Member of Congress to serve on or solicit funds for any political committee, club, or organization was announced as next in order.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let that bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 3112) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to acquire certain right of way near Engle, N. Mex., was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2651) providing for the purchase and disposal of certain lands containing kaolin, kaolinite, fuller's earth, and other minerals within portions of Indian reservations heretofore opened to settlement and entry was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that that bill may be passed over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

TELEGRAMS OF SENATORS.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I inquire if the Senate is now considering the calendar under Rule VIII?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then, under Rule VIII, I move to continue the consideration of Senate resolution 156.

Mr. GALLINGER. We have just reached that on the calendar.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That resolution is the next business on the calendar.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Very well.

The resolution (S. Res. 156) limiting expenditures for telegrams sent or received by Senators was announced as next in order, and the Senate resumed its consideration.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that, after the expiration of 20 minutes, or before that, we vote upon the pending amendment and upon the resolution.

Mr. SMOOT. I hope the Senator will not make that request, because we go into executive session at 1.45 o'clock to-day under a unanimous-consent agreement, and we could not have the roll called by the time we would have to go into executive session.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then I ask unanimous consent that we take a vote now upon the pending amendment and the resolution.

Mr. SMOOT. It would be necessary to have a roll call in order to do so.

Mr. SHAFROTH. It may be that it will not be necessary to call the roll.

Mr. SMOOT. Under the rules of the Senate we should be obliged to do so in view of the procedure of yesterday.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is a request for unanimous consent pending.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, when the Senate adjourned on yesterday we were taking the vote on a substitute for the resolution.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is the reason why I want to have the resolution voted upon now.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think we can vote upon the amendment now.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think so. There was the lack of a quorum disclosed when we had the roll call.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll, as that is where we were on yesterday.

Mr. GALLINGER. We were voting yesterday on the substitute offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON].

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the substitute offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON], and the yeas and nays were proceeding when the Senate adjourned.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON].

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll on the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON].

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KERN (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BRADLEY]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. LEWIS (when his name was called). I desire to be recorded as present. I was not present during the debate on the subject, and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS]. He is absent on account of sickness. I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. SAULSBURY (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] to the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE], who is absent. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT]. As he is absent, I withhold my vote.

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. WEST] and will vote. I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BRADLEY]. He has a general pair with the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN.]

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] and the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF]. They are paired. I ask that this announcement may stand on all votes for the day.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I wish to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. CULBERSON] on account of illness. He is paired with the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT]. This announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. JAMES. I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] to the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS], and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE]. In the absence of that Senator I withhold my vote.

Mr. DU PONT. I am paired with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. As he is absent, I withhold my vote.

Mr. WORKS. I announce the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. PERKINS], on account of sickness.

Mr. KERN. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. SHIVELY], and also the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON].

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I desire to announce a pair existing between my colleague [Mr. HUGHES] and the junior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CATRON].

The result was announced—yeas 47, nays 4, as follows:

YEAS—47.

Ashurst	Gallinger	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Ga.
Borah	Gore	Nelson	Smoot
Brady	Gronna	Norris	Stephenson

So Mr. KENYON's substitute was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I wish to say just a word upon the subject, but I suppose the time has arrived when we must go into executive session. Am I wrong about the time?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Under our agreement I rise to make the motion at this time.

Mr. LODGE. Very well.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 2 hours and 45 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVE RICHARDSON, OF ALABAMA.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, communicated to the Senate the intelligence of the death of Hon. WILLIAM RICHARDSON, late a Representative from the State of Alabama, and transmitted resolutions of the House thereon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEA of Tennessee) laid before the Senate the following resolutions of the House of Representatives, which were read:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
March 31, 1914.

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. WILLIAM RICHARDSON, a Representative from the State of Alabama.

Resolved, That a committee of 20 Members of the House, with such Members of the Senate as may be joined, be appointed to attend the funeral.

Resolved, That the Sergeant at Arms of the House be authorized and directed to take such steps as may be necessary for carrying out the provisions of these resolutions, and that the necessary expense in connection therewith be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I offer the resolutions which I send to the desk, and ask that they may be read.

The resolutions (S. Res. 325) were read, considered by unanimous consent, and unanimously agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of the Hon. WILLIAM RICHARDSON, late a Representative from the State of Alabama.

Resolved, That a committee of six Senators be appointed by the presiding officer, to join the committee appointed on the part of the House of Representatives, to attend the funeral of the deceased Representative.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

The PRESIDING OFFICER appointed under the second resolution as the committee on the part of the Senate Mr. BANKHEAD, Mr. THORNTON, Mr. ROBINSON, Mr. GRONNA, Mr. POINDEXTER, and Mr. CRAWFORD.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I move as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased Representative that the Senate take a recess until to-morrow at 11 o'clock and 50 minutes a. m.

The motion was unanimously agreed to, and (at 4 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Thursday, April 2, 1914, at 11 o'clock and 50 minutes a. m.

CONFIRMATIONS.

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate April 1, 1914.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSIONER.

Winthrop More Daniels to be an interstate commerce commissioner.

UNITED STATES MARSHAL.

Stephen J. Doyle to be United States marshal, district of North Dakota.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, April 1, 1914.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou infinite, eternal source of life and light and love, we bless Thee for the profound faith which brings us to Thee for consolation in sorrow and grief, for the hope which penetrates the veil and gives us a glimpse of the bright beyond. Questions of great moment pertaining to the now may divide us in honest judgment, but the death of one of our number unites us in sorrow and sympathy. A picturesque, sturdy, noble, patriotic soul has been called from the scenes of this life to the realms of eternity. His work is done, and well done. He leaves behind him a worthy record, which has well fitted him for a place of usefulness in a sphere of activities beyond. We bless Thee for his life, his work, his example. May his memory live in our hearts and inspire us to faithful service. Comfort us, his many friends, and the dear children he leaves behind him, with the blessed hope of the immortality of the soul, where in a brighter realm love will meet love, to dwell together forever; and Thine be the praise, through Him who taught us to put our trust in Thee, our God and our Father. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, there is on the Speaker's table a House bill with Senate amendments. If the Speaker will kindly lay it before the House, I will ask unanimous consent to disagree to the Senate amendments and send it to conference.

The SPEAKER. What is the bill?

Mr. ADAMSON. It is a bill to improve the Public Health Service.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk reports that it is not at the desk.

Mr. ADAMSON. Then I will call it up later.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported the bill (H. R. 15279) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, and for other purposes, which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report (No. 485), ordered to be printed.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I reserve all points of order on the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois reserves all points of order.

PENSIONS APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BARTLETT, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported the bill (H. R. 15280) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, and for other purposes, which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report (No. 486) ordered to be printed.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I reserve all points of order on the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois reserves all points of order on the bill.

LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, during the consideration of the immigration bill I made several brief speeches, but owing to a great deal of important business it has been absolutely impossible for me to revise my remarks. I ask unanimous consent for the privilege of revising and extending my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

FORTIFICATIONS APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the fortifications appropriation bill, H. R. 12235, and to disagree to the Senate amendments and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the fortifications appropriation bill, to disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference. Is there objection?

There was no objection; and the Speaker appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. SHERLEY, Mr. WHITE, and Mr. CALDER.

SPANISH-AMERICAN WAR PENSIONS.

The SPEAKER. This is Calendar Wednesday, and the unfinished business is the Key pension bill (H. R. 13044) to pension widow and minor children of any officer or enlisted man who served in the War with Spain or the Philippine insurrection. The House automatically resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union——

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, pending that, I ask unanimous consent that general debate on this bill close in one hour.

The SPEAKER. Pending the automatic resolving of the House into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, the gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that debate on this bill be limited to one hour. Is there objection?

Mr. DIES. I object.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I move that general debate on this bill be limited to one hour.

Mr. MANN. Make it an hour and a half.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Then I modify my motion and move that general debate on this bill close in one hour and a half.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEY] moves that general debate on this bill be limited to one hour and a half.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. DIES. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of no quorum present. Evidently there is none.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I think under the rule there is an automatic call of the House in connection with the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. That is correct. The Doorkeeper will lock the doors. The Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees. Those in favor of limiting the debate to one hour and a half will, as their names are called, say "aye"; those opposed, "no"; and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 271, nays 79, answered "present" 4, not voting 77, as follows:

Mr. KREIDER. Mr. Speaker, I voted "aye." I have a general pair with the gentleman from Florida, Mr. CLARK, and I wish to withdraw that vote and answer "present."

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. LINTHICUM in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill of which the Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 13044) to pension widows and minor children of any officer or enlisted man who served in the War with Spain or the Philippine insurrection.

Mr. ANSBERRY was recognized, and yielded 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. LOGUE].

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FOWLER. Under the rule, who will have control of the time in this debate?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ANSBERRY] was recognized, and he will have control of one hour.

Mr. FOWLER. Under the rule, will he have the right to yield that time to any Member he may see fit?

The CHAIRMAN. He will.

Mr. LOGUE. Mr. Chairman, I feel that this pension bill is entitled to our support. That in the case of the death of a soldier leaving a widow or a minor child or children where the income of the widow does not exceed the sum of $250 a year the pension mentioned in the bill shall be paid.

I am a firm believer that in the event of the misfortune of death overcoming one who has in time of trouble contributed the best that is in him in defense of the country there shall be no condition permitted to exist that will allow the wife, child, or children to be dependent upon public charity.

The limitation placed on the income of the wife, $250, is but the sum of $5 a week, and with children under 16 years of age, as provided for in the bill, it is manifest to all of us that with only such income there would be a condition of dependency either upon the relatives or those charitably inclined or those engaged in charitable institutional work. True, the bill does not connect the death of the soldier with any disease or injury contracted in the service, but it was well stated last week by Members of this House who have served in the Spanish War that as a result of typhoid they were to-day suffering from poor physical condition, and many of us have had brought to our attention similar cases amongst our friends or relatives.

I am one who does not believe, when the wife or minor child or children of a deceased soldier are dependent for maintenance and support, that they should be put to the difficulty or the trouble of trying to connect the death of the husband and father with some injury or disease contracted in the service. I believe that proper recognition should be given at all times to those who have contributed on the field of battle or in military or naval service for the advancement, protection, or betterment of our great Republic. It strikes me, Mr. Chairman, that in our day, when we notice the breadth and scope of a feeling more human than in the past, when great industries are considering the welfare of their employees in the advanced progressive work of the hour, when we are seeking to provide comfort and aid and relief to those injured in the ordinary everyday calling, it is not going too far to extend that principle to the one who in the hour of trouble offered his life in defense of his country or in the extension of its principles. I consider that it would be a pitiful condition for the orphan boy or the girl of an American soldier to be at any time a dependent on charitable institutions. I believe that it is the place of the Government to aid and assist upon the arising of any such unfortunate conditions.

There is in this bill something which, to my mind, should be made a little clearer. I refer to the following language, to be found on page 2:

Leaving a widow, without means of support other than her daily labor, and an actual net income not exceeding $250 per year, or leaving a minor child or children under the age of 16 years, such widow shall, upon due proof of her husband's death, without proving his death to be the result of his Army or Navy service, be placed on the pension roll from the date of the filing of her application therefor under this act at the rate of $12 per month during her widowhood, and shall also be paid $2 per month for each child of such officer or enlisted man under 16 years of age, and in case of the death or remarriage of the widow, leaving a child or children of such officer or enlisted man under the age of 16 years, such pension shall be paid such child or children until the age of 16.

Permit me to illustrate. In the case of a widow with three children under the age of 16 that would mean $18 a month for their support?

Mr. ANSBERRY. That is true.

Mr. LOGUE. That would be the interpretation of that language?

Mr. ANSBERRY. Yes.

Mr. LOGUE. I only want to make it clear. In the event of the death of the wife or in the event of her remarriage, what sum would then go to the children?

Mr. ANSBERRY. Two dollars apiece per month. I will say to the gentleman that this is the exact language, as I understand it, copied verbatim from the existing law, which takes care of the minor children of the Civil War veterans, and which has been so construed in the Pension Office.

Mr. LOGUE. Then it has been the subject of construction and has been passed on in that way?

Mr. ANSBERRY. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman says Civil War veterans. It is not only Civil War veterans but the children of veterans of all wars.

Mr. ANSBERRY. The gentleman is correct in that, but it probably has practical application now only to Civil War veterans.

Mr. LOGUE. Then, Mr. Chairman, under the interpretation that is given to this provision we would, therefore, have this condition, that in the event of four or, say, five minor children being left, upon the death of the widow, there would be given to these five minor children the pittance of $10 a month for their maintenance, support, and supposed education, these being the offspring of one who offered the best that was in him in his country's cause. It appears to me, therefore, that the smallness of the sum manifests fully the necessity for our passing this law.

The best work that we can possibly do is to try to hold together the remnants of any American home, to try to hold together the boy and the girl, instead of making them dependents upon some institution, instead of having them scattered around, instead of having them distributed, perchance, to kindly neighbors or considerate relatives; and if we would do the great work of aiding to hold together the members of the family, the dependents of the father who contributed so much to his country, we would help to inculcate in those young men and women a feeling of love of country and of patriotism that would make for good for them and for us in the future. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I am of opinion that this bill should receive the support of the Members of this House as a tribute to those who have contributed to the cause of their country, as a means of keeping their children from being objects of charitable consideration, and for the preservation of the home which, perchance, was left bereft solely through the service that the soldier gave to his country. [Applause.]

Mr. ANSBERRY. Mr. Chairman, we have an understanding with reference to the time that is to be controlled by the opposition to this measure. As I understand it, the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ELDER] is to have half an hour.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is not informed as to any understanding as to time.

Mr. ANSBERRY. If there is no objection, we will have that understanding.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can yield so much of his time as he desires.

Mr. ANSBERRY. The point is this: The proponents of any measure are entitled to the opening and closing.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, let me make a suggestion to the gentleman from Ohio. If he will reserve the balance of his time, then some one in opposition to the bill will be entitled to recognition for the other half hour.

Mr. ANSBERRY. That is what we expected to do. We had reached that understanding, but we thought, in fairness to the other Members of the House, that it should be an hour.

I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. ELDER rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the gentleman from Louisiana against the bill?

Mr. ELDER. Yes. I understand the Chair had agreed to recognize me for half an hour, and, with that understanding, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON].

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair wishes to state the understanding in regard to time. The gentleman from Ohio was recognized for an hour and used 10 minutes of his time, leaving 50 minutes remaining. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ELDER] is now recognized for half an hour and yields 10 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON], who is recognized.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, there has been put into the RECORD here and presented to this House a great deal of misinformation upon the subject of this bill which I think in fairness to the Members who are to vote upon it and justice to the country should be corrected. The acting chairman of the committee in his presentation of the bill one week ago to-day was interrogated upon the subject of the amount of money involved in the bill. He was asked this question, or, rather, he stated in opening debate upon it:

This bill is not lavish. It is not generous. It is simply ordinary justice. It merely puts the widows of the Spanish and Philippine Wars on the same footing with those of the Civil, Indian, and Mexican Wars. The United States Government has always maintained a high plane of financial honor, and has never considered the size of its debts, but only the question of whether they were just. If just, they should be paid at any cost. The sum required is comparatively insignificant for so great and wealthy a Nation as ours. At the outside, the estimated cost would not be over $2,500,000.

Now, for the information of the committee, I will say that the report to which he refers contains an estimate from the Interior Department made by the present and preceding administrations in which the cost of this bill is estimated to be $2,500,000 the first year, and that the amount will continue to increase for an indefinite number of years. There is a very great difference between that proposition and the one stated by the acting chairman of this committee.

Mr. ANSBERRY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GORDON. Yes, sir.

Mr. ANSBERRY. Did the gentleman understand from the statement made by the acting chairman and by other gentlemen on the floor in reference to that same question that $2,500,000 would be all that this Government would be called upon to expend——

Mr. GORDON. Yes.

Mr. ANSBERRY. In the case of 300,000 men who served in the Spanish-American War?

Mr. GORDON. I am going to point out why that is not true.

Mr. ANSBERRY. I know there was not another man on the floor who took that view of it, except the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GORDON. Let me read what the acting chairman said——

Mr. LANGLEY. Nobody else in the House understood it that way.

Mr. GORDON. On page 5832 of the RECORD is this dialogue. Mr. KEY of Ohio was asked this question by Mr. HARRISON:

Mr. HARRISON. Under this bill, what does the gentleman estimate the appropriation will have to be?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. At the very outside, not exceeding $2,500,000.

Mr. BARTLETT. The first year?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. No. Gentlemen will note, in reading from the report, that that matter is set out clearly.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Yes.

Mr. SABATH. Can the gentleman inform me how many men who served in the Spanish-American War would be affected by this act?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. About 434,000, all told. That would include those in the Spanish-American War, the Philippine insurrection, and the Boxer uprising.

Mr. SABATH. It would include all of those?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Yes; those serving between April 21, 1898, and the close of the war, July 4, 1902.

Mr. SABATH. And I understand the gentleman to say that all it would cost would be about $2,500,000?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Yes. This is a widows' bill.

Mr. SABATH. That will be about the first year?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GORDON. Not until I get through reading this dialogue.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. No; that matter is all set out in the report. In about three years we figure the number of claims that would be adjudicated would run into $2,500,000.

Now, as a matter of fact, the estimates of the Interior Department, both under Mr. Taft and the present administration, estimated the cost of this bill to the country the first year at $2,500,000 and say that it will constantly increase annually for an indefinite time in the future.

Mr. LANGLEY. Will the gentelman yield there?

Mr. GORDON. Yes.

Mr. LANGLEY. The gentleman understands, does he not, that these estimates are all annual estimates?

Mr. GORDON. All but Mr. KEY's.

Mr. LANGLEY. And the Interior Department made an estimate on this bill, and I think everybody in the House understood it——

Mr. GORDON. I understand it, but I am trying to get the House to understand it.

Mr. LANGLEY. The House understood it and everybody else so understood but the gentleman now addressing the committee.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. KEY did not understand it or he would not have said what he did.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GORDON. Yes.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. I took it for granted that every one understood at that time that this was an annual appropriation.

Mr. GORDON. Why did the gentleman say at the outset that the cost of this bill to the country would be only $2,500,000?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Per annum.

Mr. GORDON. But the gentleman did not say that. I have just read what the gentleman said.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Well, I say it now.

Mr. GORDON. All right; I accept the correction.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. I took it for granted that all the Members on the floor of the House so understood it.

Mr. GORDON. I do not think there is any ambiguity about the statement here.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. I did not intend to misrepresent anything, and I know I could not have misrepresented it in that respect if I wanted to.

Mr. LAZARO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GORDON. Yes.

Mr. LAZARO. Did I understand the gentleman to say he was opposed to this pension bill?

Mr. GORDON. The gentleman did not as yet, but if he will listen he will.

Mr. LAZARO. Has not the gentleman voted for a pension bill before?

Mr. GORDON. Not yet; I have been here but a year.

Mr. LAZARO. In this House, the other day?

Mr. GORDON. Probably; I do not know; I do not recall to what the gentleman refers.

Mr. LAZARO. What is the difference between soldiers who have served in this war and soldiers who have served in the other wars?

Mr. GORDON. Why, this bill does not grant any pension to any soldier who served in the war——

Mr. LAZARO. Those who are dependent, then. What is the difference?

Mr. GORDON. There is this difference——

Mr. LAZARO. I ask just for information.

Mr. GORDON. No dependents of veterans of the Civil War, the greatest war in all history, were granted any such pension as is provided in this bill until 1890, 25 years after the war closed.

Mr. ANSBERRY. Just a moment. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GORDON. Yes, sir.

Mr. ANSBERRY. Is it your notion of the logic of this situation that because the dependent children and the other dependents of Civil War veterans did not get their due until the time you have stated, because of this tardy justice, gives us a sufficient reason to delay doing substantial justice to the dependents of the Spanish War veterans? Does my friend contend we should permit 25 years to elapse? Is that your notion of it?

Mr. GORDON. My notion of this bill is stated in the manuscript which I will read, if you will listen.

Mr. ANSBERRY. Answer the question directly.

Mr. GORDON. I will answer it in my address.

Mr. ANSBERRY. Nobody will hear it or read it, either.

Mr. GORDON. I stated them to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. LAZARO], who wished to know the difference between this bill and the present pension law. I am giving my views on this legislation. I am not responsible for past pension legislation. I am responsible for the pension legislation of this House to the extent of my vote.

Mr. ANSBERRY. But for the purpose of comparison, the gentleman states the injustice that was done to Civil War veterans' dependents and thinks——

Mr. GORDON. Do not state what I think. I know what I think; you do not. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. ANSBERRY. Judging from what the gentleman has said in the past on several measures, I would not attempt to state what the gentleman may think on any question.

Mr. GORDON. All right. Then let me state it. [Laughter.]

This bill presents to every living man who enlisted in the United States Army, Navy, and Marine Corps, volunteer and regular, and who was enrolled for 90 days between April 21, 1898, and July 4, 1902, a paid-up contract of life insurance, which obligates the United States to pay upon his death to his widow, if her net income is less than $250 per annum, the sum of $12 per month for the remainder of her natural life or until she remarries, and to each of his children the sum of $2 per month until they become 16 years of age. He may have been home on a furlough during the entire period of his enlistment, but he gets the contract just the same if he was enrolled for 90 days. In case the child is insane, idiotic, or otherwise permanently helpless, the pension continues during the child's life or disability.

I believe that the financial obligation which the Government incurs to the men who enlist in its Army and Navy, both in war and in peace, outside of the contract of enlistment, is to indemnify them and their dependents for the money loss which results from such service, and this the Government has already done by general laws.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ANSBERRY. Mr. Chairman, I yield a minute to the gentleman, in view of the fact that I interrupted him.

Mr. GORDON. Can not you give me five minutes more?

Mr. ANSBERRY. Well, I will give the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. GORDON. Thank you very much.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio will proceed for five minutes.

Mr. GORDON. To undertake to pay in money for the risk assumed and for deeds of valor and heroism, or even for pain and suffering resulting from disease and injury which did not impair the earning power of the soldier, is to embark upon a sea of expenditures which has no limit except the uncontrolled discretion of Members of Congress, who are under the constant pressure of influential constituents whose political support they are naturally desirous of obtaining, and this subjects Members to the ever-present temptation of trading their votes on the floor of this House for political support in their districts; in other words, exchanging public money for votes.

When this bill was under consideration a week ago to-day, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox] prefaced his remarks in opposition to the bill by the statement that there were a large number of Spanish War veterans in his district, and that he could probably best promote his political fortunes by remaining silent, whereupon the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] inquired, sotto voce, "Why don't you keep still, then?" to which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox] replied in effect that he was constrained by a sense of public duty to oppose the bill.

Mr. Chairman, if this bill is brought in here as a mere vote-catching device, and support of it is urged on that ground, regardless of public considerations, then we ought to amend it by including all persons who have served in the Regular or Volunteer Army for any period of time, or by including within the purview of its benefits every qualified elector. I have too much respect for the Members of this House to believe that they are so regardless of their oaths of office, so lost to all sense of propriety and decency, as to disregard public considerations in appropriating money out of the Public Treasury; if the Members of this House are unwilling to assume the responsibility of enacting into law a bill granting a pension to any officer or enlisted man during the period covered by the bill, other than those who incurred permanent injury or disease in the service, they can not justify their votes for this bill.

A serious objection to this bill is that it is impossible to determine even approximately the cost of the bill to this country. The Interior Department estimates the cost for the first year at $2,500,000, and an annual increase of this amount for an indefinite period. The bill applies to all soldiers who married up to the date of the final enactment of the bill into law and to children born of such marriage prior or subsequent thereto, so that it grants pensions to a generation of children yet unborn without any proof that the death of the husband and father was or may be the result of disease or injury contracted in the service. For these reasons I shall be constrained to oppose the enactment of the bill into law.

I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back three minutes.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. RAKER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message, in writing, from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives, by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House of Representatives that the President had approved and signed bills and joint resolutions of the following titles:

On March 19, 1914:

H. J. Res. 217. Joint resolution to convey the thanks of Congress to the captain of the American steamer Kroonland, of the Red Star Line, and through him to the officers and crew of said steamer, for the prompt and heroic service rendered by them in rescuing 89 lives from the burning steamer Volturno in the north Atlantic Ocean.

On March 26, 1914:

H. R. 12594. An act to authorize the county commissioners of Skagit County, Wash., to construct a bridge across Swinomish Slough opposite the town of La Conner; and

H. R. 13771. An act extending the provisions of the act of March 3, 1913, authorizing the construction of a bridge over the Missouri River near Weldon Springs Landing, Mo.

On March 27, 1914:

H. R. 11751. An act authorizing the sale of certain land to the county of San Diego, State of California, for public watering purposes; and

H. R. 13091. An act to provide for drainage of Indian allotments of the Five Civilized Tribes.

On March 28, 1914:

H. R. 9897. An act to amend section 12 of the act entitled "An act to amend and consolidate the acts respecting copyright," approved March 4, 1909.

PENSIONS.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. ANSBERRY. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. WEAVER].

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Chairman, I shall vote for this pension bill because I believe in a generous and liberal pension policy and because I am glad by my vote to help refute the ancient slander that republics are ungrateful.

The purpose of this bill is to pension the widow and the minor children under 16 years of age of any deceased officer or enlisted man who served 90 days or more in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States either as a Regular or Volunteer during the War with Spain or the Philippine insurrection. Such widow shall receive a pension of $12 per month during her widowhood and each minor child $2 per month while under 16 years of age. Such officer, soldier, or sailor must have been honorably discharged and such widow must be without means of support other than her daily labor and without an actual net income exceeding $250 per year.

The Government of the United States is rich enough, and it ought to be generous enough, to help the helpless, for the beneficiaries of this bill are entitled to peculiar sympathy and tender consideration from that Government. The soldiers and sailors in the War with Spain and those in the Philippine insurrection not only risked their lives in defense of their country, but were exposed in an extraordinary degree to suffering and death in fever-stricken swamps and foul miasmatic jungles of the Tropics. Where one was wounded or killed in battle a hundred, with constitutions undermined by insidious disease, have suffered physical injury worse than wounds or death. Those whom we pension by this bill are they whom these soldiers tenderly loved. When the husband and father is gone who risked his life, who sacrificed his strength, who immolated his youth at his country's call, ungrateful would that country be to deny its aid to the stricken widow and orphans. Let this great Government temper the wind to the shorn lamb.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ANSBERRY], in speaking for this bill, has charged that the opposition to the bill comes from gentlemen on this floor who represent southern constituencies. It is true that two of the militant gentlemen who have, late and early, consistently opposed all sorts of pensions represent southern constituencies. I mean the gentleman from Texas, Mr. CALLAWAY, and the gentleman from Texas, Mr. DIES. I do not criticize my good friends from Texas, although I do not agree with their position. I know that in every vote they cast on this floor they register a vote that reflects their judgment and conscience. It is not because of their position on the pension question that they have the respect, confidence, and support of their constituents in Texas, but it is in spite of that position—because of their integrity, courage, great ability, and true public service.

I believe I know the sentiment of the Texas people quite as well as either of the distinguished gentlemen, and when they fail to voice the sentiment of the Texas people I shall not hesitate to speak for Texas myself, because my grandfather, a southern man, lived on the frontier of Texas when her flag of a single star was the ensign of a sovereign republic; my father in his young manhood went from Texas to the battle field to give four years as a soldier to the cause of Texas and the South; and when my infant eyes first opened on the dawn it was beneath the light of heliotrope Texas skies. And I deny that the Texas people are opposed to the payment of pensions to deserving soldiers of this Republic, and to the orphans and widows of such soldiers.

The people of Texas believe in pensions, because they amended their constitution by an almost unanimous vote; and I was a citizen of Texas at the time, and voted to amend the constitution to give pensions to Confederate soldiers. The distinguished gentlemen, like all their Texas colleagues, owe their seats in this great deliberative body, the American House of Representatives, to the fact that they received the Democratic nomination at home, for if they had not received the Democratic nomination in Texas they could not have been elected. And the Democratic Party in the national convention at Denver, and four years later at Baltimore, declared without a dissenting voice for a generous and liberal pension policy.

What I have said of the sentiment of the Texas people is equally true of the entire South. I voice the sentiment I know of 2,000,000 of my Oklahoma constituents, for whom I speak when I vote for this bill. When the call for volunteers was made for the Spanish-American War in 1898 I lived in the Indian Territory, and thousands of volunteers in the Indian Territory and in the Territory of Oklahoma enlisted. All of the Southern States were eager—the whole South was eager—to show its loyalty and its devotion to the Union. Texas furnished 6,765; Tennessee, 6,266; Alabama, 4,022; Arkansas, 2,836; North Carolina, 3,966; Virginia, 5,223; South Carolina, 2,618; Florida, 1,350; Louisiana, 2,916; Kentucky, 5,614; Maryland, 2,711; Mississippi, 3,161; and Georgia 4,383 volunteers in the War with Spain.

The embers of hatred, prejudice, and bitterness which survived the War between the States have died out in the ashes of the long ago, and, while I am the son of a Confederate soldier and proud beyond the power of speech to tell of ancestry so glorious, as a Representative of the American people I shall rejoice to cast my vote to pension the deserving soldiers of this great Nation, and in so doing I know that I reflect the sentiment of the southern people. To-day I would pay reverent tribute to my mother country, that beautiful and far-away enchanted land—the old South. It was a country dowered by the God of nature with elemental wealth—mountains stored with iron and coal, plains bounded only by the horizon, primeval forests of the long-leaf pine, and the live oak trees.

"Druids of Eld with voices sad and prophetic"; majestic rivers rushing to the sea and valleys like the Happy Valley of Rasselas, where every blast shook spices from the leaves and every month dropped fruits upon the ground.

If you take from the structure of the United States Government and from the Nation in its making the contribution of the South, it would be as if you stripped from the skies its radiant constellations and the starry scarf of the milky way and left the heavens in dim eclipse, black, wintry, dead, unmeasured.

Have you estimated the contribution of the South to liberty's cause in the revolt against Great Britain? But for the sword and spirit of the South there would have been no revolution; there would have been no new nation. In proportion to population statistics show that the southern colonies contributed more than the number of soldiers contributed by the northern colonies to the Continental Armies. Long prior to the historic declaration in Philadelphia the citizens of Mecklenberg, N. C., declared the first declaration of independence. Patrick Henry sounded the bugle note and call to battle. He was a Virginian. Richard Henry Lee, in the Continental Congress, June 7, 1776, submitted a resolution declaring that "these united colonies are, and of right ought to be, free and independent States." He was a Virginian. Thomas Jefferson wrote the Declaration of Independence—that marvelous State paper set on fire with the aspirations for human liberty, a paper that will live to the last syllable of recorded time. He was a Virginian. George Washington commanded and led to glorious victories. He was a Virginian. The English armies were defeated; the independence of the colonies secured by southern soldiers on southern battle fields. The convention that framed the Constitution of the United States was presided over by George Washington. That Constitution took its mold and conformation from the brain of James Madison, a Virginian.

No one influence gave to the new Government as much strength, stability, and power in its formative period as the decisions of the greatest jurist who ever sat on the bench of that exalted tribunal, the Supreme Court of the United States—John Marshall, a Virginian.

Time would fail me even to name the great men of the South. She gave to civilization and to the future ages Thomas Jefferson, the world's greatest constructive statesman; George Washington, in his day and through all the tide of time first in the hearts of his countrymen; Henry Clay, whom CHAMP CLARK, in his wonderful speech of yesterday, called the greatest Speaker of this House, who was also, perhaps, the world's greatest orator; Matthew Fontaine Maury, who discovered and charted the circulation of the currents of the ocean and wrote the Physical Geography of the Sea; James Audubon, America's foremost naturalist and ornithologist; Edgar Allen Poe, the weird poet whose genius was divine; and, finally, let me tell you that the State of Kentucky, first born and fairest daughter of the Old Dominion, gave to the South Jefferson Davis, and to the world the unique, the wondrous, the inimitable Lincoln.

Worthy to rank with these are poets like Henry Timrod, Paul Hamilton Hayne, Father Ryan, and Sydney Lanier; great preachers, Munsey, Marvin, and George F. Pierce; statesmen like Alexander H. Stephens and John C. Calhoun; men of rugged and heroic mold like Andrew Jackson and Sam Houston; and great orators, William L. Yancey, Ben Hill, Robert Toombs, and that morning star of the New South, the messenger of peace, Henry W. Grady.

I wish I had the power to paint a picture of the social state of the southern people in ante bellum days—the spontaneous and universal hospitality; the indifference to the blandishments of wealth; the joyous out-of-door life under the blue skies and in the reveling woods; the modesty and innate refinement of the women, shrinking like a flower from the public eye, but, like the flower, unmarred by the storm; the rugged independence of the men that would not stir an inch to gain a crown; the unbought grace of life; the honor that felt a stain like a wound; and that spirit that permeated the atmosphere that we can not describe, but can only call "southern chivalry." It is gone from us, far away as some lost Arcadia or Old-World-fabled Atlantis. Gone is the big house with the tall colonial columns and the wide verandas, set in the background of the giant trees that—

In many a lazy syllable repeated their old poetic legends to the wind.

Gone the negro quarters and the tender love and loyalty of the slaves bound to their masters by ties of mutual affection; the crooning of the lullaby of the old black negro mammy, the folklore of the glorious nights with Uncle Remus; and the lost spell of the days with Aaron, the son of Ben Ali, in the wildwood.

Such was the Old South, my country, of which the southern poet sang:

Stoop, angels, hither from the skies;
There is no holier spot of ground
Than where defeated valor lies
By mourning beauty crowned.

If I have digressed from my discussion of this pension bill, I justify the digression because of the unjust insinuations against my native land. This bill ought to pass and it will pass, but it could never be enacted into law if it did not reflect the crystallized sentiment and opinions of the people of the South. A southern man to-day sits in the White House, with southern men in his Cabinet; a southern man is the Speaker, a southern man the Democratic leader of this House; a majority of the Members of the Sixty-third Congress are of southern birth or ancestry—and yet all are Americans, and from the watch-tower is heard the sentinel's cry, "All is well."

Mr. ELDER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHERWOOD].

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I do not rise to oppose the bill. I expect to vote for it, but I wish to make some suggestions on the line I made a week ago when this bill was up for consideration. I said that this bill gives preference to the widows of soldiers of the Spanish War, and for that reason, if it passed in its present form, would doubtless create a good deal of feeling among the soldiers of the Civil War and their widows and orphans.

Now, I want to refer to the law so that you may understand it. Section 3 of the act of Congress approved June 23, 1890, provided pension of $8 per month to such widows of officers and enlisted men who had served 90 days in the War of the Rebellion and had been honorably discharged and were without means of support other than their daily labor. That was the act of 1890. Said provision was amended by the act of May 9, 1900, to extend its benefits to widows without means of support other than their daily labor and an actual net income not exceeding $250 per year. The total of allowances to these classes made under the law from the date of its original enactment, as I received in an official statement from the Commissioner of Pensions this morning, included 307,342 widows. There were 4,233 allowances made to said classes under the act of April 19, 1908, from the date of its passage to the close of said year—June 30, 1908, from the date of its passage to the close of said year, June 30, 1908—and the total of said claims on the roll at said date was 188,445. Prior to the act—and here is an important provision—prior to the act of June 27, 1890, widows of Civil War soldiers were pensionable only under the general laws as now embodied in section 4702, Revised Statutes, which require proof that the soldier's death cause originated in the service and line of duty. The rate of pension as originally provided thereunder to the widows of noncommissioned officers and privates was $8 per month. So that from 1864 to 1890 a period of 26 years had elapsed, and widows of Civil War soldiers have been drawing pensions from the close of the war at $8 up to that date.

Now, take this provision in this bill. I will read from the bill now before the House: "That said widow shall have married said officer or enlisted man previous to the passage of this act."

It does not require even that he should be a soldier who served at the front during the war, or that he was disabled, but it states "that said widow shall have married said officer or enlisted man previous to the passage of this act." I suggested last week that this provision ought to be amended to conform to the general law and to the practice of this Government, so far as I know, since its foundation, and certainly for over half a century.

Let me refer to the provision in this bill that absence on furlough shall not be deducted.

To illustrate: I commanded a regiment of veterans for three years. We served at the front during that entire service. We were 122 days under fire. We were in 40 of the battles of the war; and yet, under the law of May 11, 1912, known as the Sherwood law, the Pension Office, in accordance with the practice of that office, sent to the War Department for the necessary information and deducted the furlough of every soldier of my regiment. They had a furlough of about 30 days every year, but that was not when they were doing duty at the front. That was in the winter, when they were in winter quarters. They deducted 90 days for every one of those furloughed soldiers, and instead of drawing pay straight along for 3 years, they were reduced to 2½ years.

Now, you are proposing in this bill to pension the widow of the soldier who served only 90 days, when it has already been stated he might have been on furlough for nearly the whole time. I do not wish to make any suggestion to the committee. I do not think it would be in good form. But if this bill is to be passed, as it will be undoubtedly, it ought to be made to conform to the same basis as the soldiers of the Civil War.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield to the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. SHERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. I would like to ask the gentleman a question as chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions—whether or not there is likely to be any general pension legislation in behalf of the widows of Civil War veterans during this Congress?

Mr. SHERWOOD. Well, that is a question that would be very hard to answer. I am only one of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, consisting of 16 members, and every member of that committee has the same voice as I have. But we have been passing in this Congress a few private pension bills where soldiers married after 1890—say one year or two years or three years after 1890, and in one case four years after, or when they were married in 1894, and where they were in absolutely destitute circumstances, and where they had lived with the old soldiers 10 to 15 years—but they were all stricken out in the Senate. What the result will be on a general bill you can best judge. If the Senate strikes out that class of bills, the probabilities are it would not pass a bill to remove the limit up to 1900, as provided in the Senate McCumber bill.

Now, this bill pensions every soldier of the Volunteer Army and of the Regular Army who was in the war in the Philippines. It does not say "every volunteer soldier"; it says "every soldier." Now, the widow of every soldier who served 90 days, no matter where she may be located, if she marries after the passage of this act and the soldier dies, the next day she would be put on the pension roll for life. I have a letter from the Philippine Islands. Many of the soldiers who went over there first married Filipino girls, some of them doubtless on the European plan. But if any of those soldiers should die to-morrow, the young Filipino girls who married them would be put upon the pension roll for life under the provisions of this bill, should it be enacted into law. I think a provision should be put in this bill to correspond with the legislation for the widows of the Civil War. Put both on an equality.

My distinguished friend from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS], popularly mentioned as the next governor of Ohio [applause]——

Mr. MANN. And that is no dream, either. [Applause.]

Mr. SHERWOOD. Asked a question the other day with reference to the number of casualties in that war. I may say that in the War of the American Revolution, which lasted seven years, there were 56 battles fought, or 8 battles a year on the average. The total number of soldiers killed in that war was 1,875. In the War with Mexico, which lasted about two years, when we called out 110,000 men, the casualties of those killed in battle or who died of wounds was 1,085. In the war against Spain, when the first call was for 125,000 men and the next call was for 75,000 men, and when we had, I think, at that time about 45,000 soldiers of the Regular Army and I do not know how many men in the Navy, and the insurgents had in Cuba about 10,000 men, I do not remember just how many battles were fought, but I have the statistics of the war office showing that in all the battles of that war, including those lost in Manila Bay and Santiago Bay, in both the Army and the Navy, the number was 247. In the Battle of Gettysburg alone—just one battle—the number of killed and wounded and those who died of their wounds was 3,070. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. ANSBERRY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN] is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I listened a week ago to a very interesting debate on this bill, and one hour of that discussion was occupied by the talented Member from Texas [Mr. DIES] in opposition; and while he talked and denominated the present pension roll as one of graft and dishonor, I held in my hand a copy of the river and harbor bill, which had just passed the House. On three pages of that bill were appropriations amounting to $3,700,000 for river projects in the State of Texas, and of that amount almost half a million dollars was appropriated for the improvement of the Trinity and Brazos Rivers, which one of his colleagues from Texas [Mr. CALLAWAY] denounced as a fraud and a cheat upon the taxpayers of this country. He protested and stated that it would require forty-odd years to complete the improvement, at a total expenditure of eight or ten million dollars, and that when completed the river would be of practically no use to the people of Texas. And mark you, that river runs through the district of the gentleman who made that criticism, and this Member from Texas [Mr. DIES], who in season and out of season has denominated the pension roll of this country, made up of heroes and patriots who saved the Union and preserved the flag [applause], as being unworthy, sat in his seat without a murmur or a protest against that wasteful extravagance of public money upon the streams in Texas.

Why, we have just listened to a speech from the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON], complaining about spending $2,500,000 upon the poor, needy, and defenseless widows of the Spanish-American soldiers and their crippled, helpless, insane children; and yet on yesterday he voted to turn over the Panama Canal, which cost the American taxpayers $400,000,000, to British control. [Applause.] It will cost us $35,000,000 to fortify and maintain the canal every year. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON] could do that, but he was indignant and felt outraged when we are about to pass a bill to provide for the needy widows of men who, unlike the critics of this bill, were patriotic enough and brave enough to enlist for that war. [Applause.]

I deny and I repudiate the insinuation that our pension roll is not a roll of honor, made up of the best blood and best citizenship of this Republic. [Applause.] How is it a roll of honor? No man's name is on it who could not produce an honorable discharge, which is the highest evidence of his faithfulness and loyalty to the Republic.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Is that true of the soldiers of the Civil War also?

Mr. AUSTIN. Certainly it is.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I think the gentleman is mistaken about that, because I have a very distinct recollection of hundreds of deserters who managed to get on that roll.

Mr. AUSTIN. I challenge the gentleman from Texas or any other Member of this House to show an iota of proof that the name of a deserter is on the pension roll of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, it can be very easily done, as the Adjutant General of the United States Army can inform you, by act of Congress.

Mr. AUSTIN. Let us see about that. Both the armies were engaged in east Tennessee. Tennessee furnished 31,000 soldiers to the Union Army, principally all of them from eastern Tennessee. Often they obtained leave of absence to go home to see a sick wife or a dying child; and while they were away, their command in the heart of the enemy's country moved from where it had been when they left it; and because, forsooth, such a man failed to answer to the roll call he was marked a deserter, when he was no more a deserter than Grant or Sherman or Sheridan. I know to-day of one of my own constituents who was captured and imprisoned in a Confederate prison, and the records of the War Department show that fact; yet that man, W. C. Chandler, of my town, is marked upon the records of the War Department as a deserter, and that stain is upon his record and his honor.

It is 15 years since the close of the Spanish-American War; yet the soldiers of that war have not asked Congress for a single piece of legislation in their behalf, but they have said, "Relieve us of the care and responsibility of supporting or aiding in the support of four or five thousand of the needy widows of our comrades, with their children, whose husbands have died since the close of that war, where the widow has been unable to establish the fact that the cause of death was wound or disease contracted in the line of duty."

Who constituted that army? Texas furnished 6,821 out of a population of 3,896,542; and Tennessee, with a population of 2,184,789, furnished 6,531. Of that number almost half enlisted from the 10 counties of the district that I represent. My town, Knoxville, Tenn., stood next to New York City in the number of recruits furnished, and Scott County, with 2,100 voters, furnished more than 500 private soldiers to the Spanish-American War. Do you say that they enlisted for a selfish purpose when the pay of a private soldier was only $13 a month? How many of them were rich? Less than 3 per cent of them had anything except their daily toil. They came from the farm, the workshop, and the mines. They left their wives and young children behind and gave up remunerative employment because they loved their country, and in its hour of need were willing that their wives and children should suffer, if need be, and they were willing to die, if need be, for Old Glory. [Applause.] To you who stand here and criticize them I say you are so penurious, you are so solicitous about the taxpayers, you are so indifferent to the cry of the widow and the hunger of the orphan, that you ask this Congress to deny their appeal. [Applause.]

Ah, they say, few men were killed. There were 826 battles and skirmishes, and 12,000 lost their lives.

Let one of these critics go to the Philippines and sleep on the ground and be attacked by insects and fever and then fight the brown man, wading through swamps, and then come here and tell us that this legislation is unfair and unjust.

What else? Have you forgotten the round robin letter written at Santiago, when men were falling every day and dying of yellow fever, appealing to our Government to save the remnants of that Shafter army by removing them to a less pestilential place? Do you remember when they carried them to Montauk Point, on Long Island, and there, where the breezes of the ocean cooled their fevered brows, how the American people looked on with anxiety for the recovery of those brave men? Do you remember the thousands who lost their lives in the camp at Chickamauga, where the mortality from typhoid fever was so great the War Department had to transfer two Ohio regiments—one from Toledo and one from some other place in that State—away up into the mountains of east Tennessee? I remember going through the hospitals and seeing these men. Yet gentlemen here say there was no danger; that there were no risks.

What else? One of the regiments from my district went into Cuba and remained there during the American occupation. Another regiment went to Porto Rico. Then the first Tennessee regiment went to the Philippine Islands, and after they had served out their enlistment and gone aboard the transports to return to America there was a fresh renewal of the insurrection, and they disembarked and joined in that affray, for which act of patriotism they were thanked by the President and the Secretary of War. Take men living as these soldiers had lived in our climate and our temperature, transfer them to the tropics of Porto Rico, Cuba, and the Philippine Islands, and are you surprised that when they come back to America they find themselves stricken with tropical diseases, not in one case or in hundreds of cases but in thousands of cases? [Applause.]

Mr. ANSBERRY. I yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND].

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. Mr. Speaker, I am glad, indeed, to support the pending bill granting pensions to the widows and minor children of officers and enlisted men who served 90 days or more in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States, either as regulars or volunteers, during the War with Spain and the Philippine insurrection.

It is a just measure and one that should have been passed long ago. California furnished her full quota of volunteers during the Spanish-American War. One of the first ships bound for the Philippines after Dewey's great victory in Manila sailed out of San Francisco Bay crowded with Californians, many of them native sons of that Commonwealth, cheerfully responding to their country's call. As they sailed through the Golden Gate the cheers of thousands of Californians resounded from every vantage point, and the gratitude then expressed is as deeply felt to-day by the people of my State. All honor to the veteran of the Spanish-American War. Patriotism still exists throughout the country, although recent occurrences may indicate that it is somewhat dormant.

The following is the act:

A bill to pension widows and minor children of officers and enlisted men who served in the War with Spain and Philippine insurrection.

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the passage of this act if any officer or enlisted man who served 90 days or more in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States, either as a regular or volunteer, between April 21, 1898, and July 4, 1902, inclusive, service to be computed from date of enlistment to date of discharge, including all furloughs, and who has been honorably discharged therefrom, has died or shall hereafter die leaving a widow without means of support other than her daily labor and an actual net income not exceeding $250 per year, or leaving a minor child or children under the age of 16 years, such widow shall, upon due proof of her husband's death, without proving his death to be the result of his Army or Navy service, be placed on the pension roll from the date of the filing of her application therefor under this act, at the rate of $12 per month during her widowhood, and shall also be paid $2 per month for each child of such officer or enlisted man under 16 years of age, and in case of the death or remarriage of the widow, leaving a child or children of such officer or enlisted man under the age of 16 years, such pension shall be paid such child or children until the age of 16: Provided, That in case a minor child is insane, idiotic, or otherwise permanently helpless, the pension shall continue during the life of said child, or during the period of such disability, and shall commence from the date of application therefor after the passage of this act: Provided further, That said widow shall have married said officer or enlisted man previous to the passage of this act: Provided, however, That this act shall not be so construed as to reduce any pension under any act, public or private.

SEC. 2. That no agent, attorney, or other person engaged in preparing, presenting, or prosecuting any claim under the provisions of this act shall, directly or indirectly, contract for, demand, receive, or retain for such services in preparing, presenting, or prosecuting such claim a sum greater than $10, which sum shall be payable only on the order of the Commissioner of Pensions; and any person who shall violate any of the provisions of this section, or shall wrongfully withhold from the pensioner or claimant the whole or any part of a pension or claim allowed or due such pensioner or claimant under this act, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall, for each and every offense, be fined not exceeding $500 or be imprisoned at hard labor not exceeding two years, or both, in the discretion of the court.

Mr. ANSBERRY. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, it is my purpose to vote for this bill, but in connection with it I desire to record one or two historic facts. I was one of those who went over to New York to receive a transport that brought back Pennsylvania troops that had fought in the Philippines, and I well remember their sallow faces and their wan appearance. They were young Americans who had left their homes, their firesides, and their loved ones to go into a foreign country, an unusual thing for an American soldier, to fight for the honor and the dignity of their Nation.

In this bill we are asked to provide for the welfare of those whom these men shall leave in widowhood. We are not providing for the men themselves who suffered in this foreign service, but we are asked to see that those who suffered in their absence, who performed heroic self-sacrifice at home, shall be relieved from want. The Government is quite able to take care of the widows of the men who were gallant and patriotic enough to fight the battles of their country.

Fortunately, there is no issue here such as might have been raised following the great civil strife. All men, from all States and from all sections of the United States, enlisted for the service of 1898.

The man from Alabama fought side by side with the man from Massachusetts in this war. The man from Texas stood side by side with the man from Minnesota. There is no such sectional question now as there was when the pensioning of those who came back from the Civil War was under consideration.

But while we are considering this phase of the question it is most interesting to note the gradual passing from the scene of those who were active upon one side or the other in the great civil conflict from 1861 to 1865. Only recently this Hall resounded with the eloquence and the patriotism of those who fought upon one side or the other of that great struggle; but time has worked many changes here. Once the Union men preponderated in this Chamber, but to-day there are more of our colleagues who fought with the Confederates in the Civil War than there are those who fought for the Union. The honor roll has rapidly diminished in numbers, and there are now few men who can tell from experience of the great strife of 1861.

The House itself contains some 430 representative men of this Nation, patriotic and zealous in its behalf, but of that number there are remaining but three men who stood upon the Union side in the great conflict. Our distinguished and much-beloved friend, Gen. SHERWOOD, of Ohio, is one of these. His praises have often and worthily been sung in this House. God grant that he may remain with us for years to come [applause] to give utterance to those harmonious sentiments that come frequently from his lips.

Another is our distinguished colleague from New York, Col. JOSEPH A. GOULDEN [applause], who is the last living man in this House to have remembered the wonderful speech of Abraham Lincoln at Gettysburg.

The third is our battle-torn but active veteran from Iowa, Capt. KIRKPATRICK. [Applause.] They are all Democrats. Not a Republican veteran remains.

While there is certainly no bitterness, and seldom even a passing reference to the Civil War, the mutations of time and, possibly, of politics find the Union veterans in this House outnumbered by the Confederates. I have named the three soldiers of the Union forces who still are with us. Our colleagues who fought upon the other side were six in number until yesterday, when the Grim Reaper took to his reward our esteemed friend from Alabama, Judge Richardson. Gen. ESTOPINAL, of Louisiana; Mr. TALBOTT, of Maryland; Mr. JONES, of Virginia; Maj. STEDMAN, of North Carolina; and Mr. TAYLOR, of Alabama, I am informed, are the last remaining veterans of the Confederacy. Valuing them all as men, and enjoying, as we do, our daily contact with them as Representatives, it is pleasing to observe that, with rare exceptions, the general principle of providing for the widow of the soldier is now approved by both sides of the House.

It is also noteworthy that the present bill, reported by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEY], a Democrat, is substantially the same bill that was reported in the Sixty-second Congress by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. Crago, a Republican. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. Crago, made this bill the special feature of his congressional career. He was a veteran of the Spanish War, who had seen service in the Philippines. His heart spoke for the widows of those who had done this yeoman service for their country. As originally reported by Col. Crago, the bill came from a committee presided over by Judge Richardson, of Alabama, the distinguished former Confederate soldier who died but yesterday. I wish I had the time to dwell upon the amiability and lovable qualities of this good man, but time does not permit. I shall comment only upon that spirit of good will and patriotism which prompts our friends upon the other side of the House to join with the Republicans in the passage of this measure.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. ANSBERRY. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. LANGLEY].

[Mr. LANGLEY addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. ANSBERRY. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. GUDGER].

Mr. GUDGER. Mr. Chairman, on March 11, 1914, I introduced the following bill to regulate and improve the civil service of the United States:

Whereas life tenure in office is inimical to a republican form of government: Therefore

Be it enacted, etc., That all Federal positions now under the classified service shall be open for competitive examination under the rules and regulations heretofore prescribed by law, subject to the provisions hereinafter prescribed and the exceptions hereinafter made.

SEC. 2. That within four months after the passage of this act the Civil Service Commission shall hold a civil-service competitive examination for all Federal positions now under the classified service.

SEC. 3. That said Civil Service Commission shall, within a reasonable time after said competitive examinations are held, report the eligible list as now provided for, and the selection of all Federal employees shall be made from said eligible list as now prescribed.

SEC. 4. That after the selections are made from said eligible list all employees now holding positions of any character or kind shall be superseded by person or persons from the said eligible list.

SEC. 5. That further competitive examinations shall be held every six years for all positions now under the classified service: Provided, That this act shall not apply (a) to any appointments that have been made from a competitive examination since January 1, 1914; (b) to any appointment made by the President which requires confirmation by the Senate.

Then follows provisions that positions not now under the classified service shall be retained on the noncompetitive list.

SEC. 7. That the hereinafter named classified positions shall be placed on the noncompetitive list, and all appointments thereto shall be made by a noncompetitive examination, as provided by the rules and regulations of the Civil Service Commission, by the departments having supervision of said employees, to wit: All unskilled laborers, charwomen, messengers, doorkeepers, and other laborers of like nature: Provided, That in the selection of doorkeepers and messengers priority shall be given to honorably discharged, bona fide Federal, Confederate, and Spanish-American soldiers and sailors.

SEC. 8. That all laws or parts of laws inconsistent with this act are repealed.

EFFICIENCY IN THE CIVIL SERVICE.

Mr. Chairman, efficiency in the civil service is a prime consideration in the administration of the affairs of the Government. In my opinion it is not attained by a life tenure of office. When business gets into a rut its efficiency is impaired. This is as true of the business of the Government as of the business of the individual.

Based upon these truisms is the bill, introduced by me on March 11, "to regulate and improve the civil service of the United States." It provides for a competitive examination for all positions now in the classified service within four months after the passage of this act. If this bill becomes a law, the civil service will be rejuvenated under its operation. New life will be infused into it. The drones and the incompetents will be weeded out. Political hangers-on will make way for vigorous men fresh from the ranks of the people.

I am not frightened by the cry—which I know will go up from those who feel themselves secure in their places under the present dispensation—that my proposition goes back to the Jacksonian theory that "to the victors belong the spoils." I do not deny that I would be glad to see a Democratic administration surrounded by as many employees of Democratic faith as can be put in positions, with due regard, of course, to the proper maintenance of governmental efficiency. While I would not displace an efficient Republican by an inefficient Democrat, I would be more than willing to supplant such a one in the Government service by an equally well qualified member of the party whose standard is so splendidly upheld by our great President and whom the people of the United States have intrusted with the government of the country.

It is my honest belief, Mr. Chairman, that at least 50 per cent of the present incumbents in the classified service are inefficient. I keep within bounds, I think, if I assert that at least one-third of this number are so burdened by the weight of years as to be unable to maintain the degree of efficiency to which the Government is entitled, and the other two-thirds fall short of the highest standard of efficiency in other respects. I have not the least doubt that such a competitive examination as is proposed in my bill will enable the Government to reduce the present force in the classified service at least 25 per cent, because the new material will be about twice as efficient as the 50 per cent who have held office for many years in the expectation of holding on for the balance of their natural lives.

It will be observed that my bill does not propose simply to substitute another swarm of life tenures in the classified service for those now existing. If it had no other purpose, it would not be worthy of serious consideration. My bill provides for a new examination every six years, so that those who have proven inefficient can be weeded out and new men put in their places. More especially there is involved in the proposed change the idea that by this process of periodical elimination and replenishment we will gradually educate a very much larger proportion of the people in the practical workings and functions of the Government than is possible under existing conditions. I want to point out also some other advantages that would grow out of this change.

In a Republic like ours there should be no office-holding class. The right to hold office under the Government is as clear as the right to vote. I do not regard it as right and fair that any number of persons should be continually in office by appointment or otherwise. But more important than all else is the indisputable fact that the sense of an ample salary for an indefinite number of years—yes, for life—robs the recipient of the desire and power of initiative and soon converts him into nothing more than a cog in a big machine. A distinguished Senator, speaking on this subject not long since, admirably stated this phase of the situation in these words:

> There is no slavery so binding as the slavery of salary * * *, because of the tendency to rob a man of all self-reliance, of all courage to face the problem of life, which goes with the taking of a salary. It makes him a slave to a position which, if it were not for that salary, he would get out of and face the problem of life.

If the young man who enters the civil service knows that he will have to quit it at the end of six years unless he comes up to a certain standard, he will take pains to reach that standard in that time. Not so if he goes into the office knowing that nothing but bad conduct can separate him from it. On the other hand, if that young man is not "a slave to salary," he will profit as much as he can by the work he has to do, and at the end of his six years will go back into the great mass of American workers not unfitted for facing the problem of life. Yet another point, Mr. Chairman. If that young man when he enters upon his Government office has habits of thrift, he will not entirely unlearn them in six years. If he has the right sort of stuff in him, he will not try with a salary of $1,200 a year to live in the style of a Cabinet officer, but will seek to lay aside a few hundred dollars every year, so that at the end of his six years he will have a little capital with which to go in business himself. He will leave office as he entered it—a self-reliant young American, fit to take up the battle of life, with every prospect of victory.

We hear a good deal these days of the growing necessity for a civil pension list. We have been told in this House, and in the Senate as well, that we will have to come to it; that we can not let men grow old in the service until their efficiency is practically at zero and then throw them out on the cold world. There is but one way, Mr. Chairman, to avoid the pensioning of superannuated Government employees, and that is not to allow them to become superannuated. Make them quit the Government service while they are in the vigor of life and can hold their own in the struggle for existence. Let them demonstrate in themselves the survival of the fittest. Besides, the Government is not an eleemosynary institution. It is supported by the taxes paid by the people, and the people have the right to demand that they shall get full value for every dollar paid by them into the National Treasury.

Of course nothing could be further from my mind than to advocate the complete overturning of the entire force of Government employees every six years. If any man during his prescribed term of office demonstrates his ability to serve the Government to its advantage, keep him by all means; promote him according to his deserts, and as we expect him to give the Government full value in service let us pay him in proportion to the value of such services. In other words, let us apply the merit system as any sensible business man applies it in his establishment.

The bill which I offer for the consideration of this House is primarily a business proposition. It rests upon approved business principles. It aims to draw periodically from the great mass of the people men who are found capable and are willing to give their services to the Government for a stated term. That term being fixed at six years precludes the possibility of a general upheaval with a change of administration. The term of office set down in this bill overlaps by two years the constitutional term of an administration. It is not therefore open to the possible charge that its enactment into law would disorganize the clerical force of the Government in order to reward party service.

Life tenure of office, Mr. Chairman, is an essential feature of monarchical government. In principle and practice it is repugnant to republican institutions, especially to a republican form of government such as we of the United States know and have known for nearly a century and a half. It may fit into a state of society where caste and class are governing factors, but it should find no permanent lodgment in this country. Nothing is so distasteful to the American citizen traveling abroad and so grates upon his sensibilities as the bureaucratic spirit which he encounters everywhere and which is the direct, inevitable outgrowth of the system of life tenure.

The last section of this bill makes an appeal to patriotic sentiment. It provides that messengers, doorkeepers, and watchmen shall be removed from the classified list; that appointments to positions of this character shall be at the pleasure of the heads of departments, and that in every instance preference shall be given to the veterans, Federal and Confederate, of the War between the States and those of the Spanish-American War. The work these men would have to do is light and the pay is good. There are hundreds of the heroes of the great war of 50 years ago who, fully able to fill these places, are barred because they can not comply with the literary requirements prescribed by the Civil Service Commission. What greater need than ordinary intelligence should there be for a man who opens the door to an office, or carries a paper from one room to another, or is on watch for a certain number of hours?

I confess it offends my sense of what is just and right to see a lot of young able-bodied men—the majority of them negroes—holding these places which should by right be allotted to those battle-scarred veterans. When in the glory of youth and in the vigor of manhood they offered their lives to their country, their intellectual qualifications were not inquired into. Indeed, they were not even asked if they could read or write. Why should not now, in their old age, all these superfluous obstacles be removed from their way to places where they can take comparative ease, and yet perform all the duties such places call for?

The civil-service system as now constituted is a howling farce. It works on the now-you-see-it-now-you-don't principle. When it is desired to keep a fellow out of office the bars can be put up as high as is necessary to that end; but when some favorite comes along those same bars disappear as if by magic. Everyone within the sound of my voice knows this to be true. The people all over the country also know it to be a fact. The civil-service system is scoffed at and condemned as an arrant humbug in every State of the Union.

Pass this bill, and you will wipe out an insufferable nuisance. Pass this bill, and you will clothe the civil service with respectability. Pass this bill, and you will substitute efficiency for inefficiency, strength for weakness, and patriotism for favoritism. If you do not pass this bill, or some other of like spirit, the people will indignantly demand a much more radical change. [Applause.]

Mr. ANSBERRY. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FARR].

Mr. FARR. I shall vote with pleasure for this measure to provide pensions for the widows and orphans of the officers and enlisted men in the War with Spain in justice to the brave men who were willing at whatever sacrifice to face bullets, suffer disease, and endure hardships in the defense of their country. In times of peace it is easy to forget the importance to the country of men who are willing to leave their homes and loved ones and go forth to the awful dangers of war, frequently never to return, and in so many instances those who do escape injury or death incur disease that impairs them for life; such was the result of the War with Spain. I know many instances of brave, strong, courageous men fit for splendid service in any sphere of life who returned to their homes unable thereafter to meet the requirements of ordinary duties. These splendid men fought and bled for us, and it is our plain duty, and to me it is a privilege to show my appreciation of what they did for their country by advocating the passage and voting for a measure that will at least partially provide for their widows and orphan children.

At present the destitute widows and their dependents are cared for in the main by the United Spanish War Veterans. It is inequitable to ask the men who offered their lives to their country in war service to make this additional financial sacrifice when the burden should be carried by the mass of our population which did not serve with the colors.

It is 15 years since the Spanish War, and this is the first request for legislation ever made by the organization of United Spanish War Veterans. The unselfishness of the request commends itself, for these veterans ask absolutely nothing for themselves, but only provision for the helpless widow and orphan.

Of the 434,000 who served in these warfares about one-fourth were in the regular service, and from seventy-five to one hundred thousand were assigned to duty in the Philippine Islands. In these warfares there were 826 battles and skirmishes, in 515 of which men were killed or wounded. The whole mortality of the campaigns was 12,000 lives. For the first time in the history of our country the American soldier and sailor served in the Tropics and the Orient under climatic and hygienic conditions unusual to him. They received no bounty or substitute money and were not drafted for service. Not to provide for the dependents of this latest type of our patriotic citizenship while lavishingly making provisions for the dependents of those who served in all the other wars of the Republic indicts the Government on a charge of unjust discrimination, and it will be my pleasure to vote for the removal of that discrimination.

Mr. ANSBERRY. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SWITZER].

Mr. SWITZER. Mr. Chairman, if I understood the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON] correctly, he stated that he could not support a pension bill that would grant pensions to unborn children. If he is in favor of pensioning the children of deceased soldiers at all, even of the Civil War veterans, this is a most remarkable statement. The first bill of this character ever passed by Congress granted pensions to children then unborn. The last bill passed carrying a pension for the widows and children of deceased Civil War veterans, the dependent bill of 1890, likewise granted pensions which have been shared by children unborn at the time the bill was enacted. I do not understand how any equitable bill of this character could be enacted without it included among its beneficiaries children born subsequent to the passage of the act.

He further opposes this measure, as I understand, because he claims that the proposed legislation is premature, that there is undue haste in this matter, and cites as evidence the fact that dependent pensions were not granted to widows and children of the Civil War veterans until 1890, 25 years after the close of the Civil War. But he should bear in mind that conditions now are not the same as they were at the close of the Civil War. That was a longer war. The whole South was devastated, the whole country to the southward was impoverished. The estimated wealth at that time of the Nation, as gathered from statistics, was $17,000,000,000. We have on deposit in the banks of the country now $17,000,000,000. The wealth of this country has sextupled since the Civil War. The population has trebled and more since the Civil War. Conditions are not at all the same. At the close of the Civil War the people were so impoverished and the country was so poor and the resources of the country had been so taxed that there was no thought of granting pensions of this character.

I believe a republic, and especially this rich and powerful Republic, the life of which is dependent on the patriotism of its citizenship, should promptly recognize in some substantial way the patriotic services of its citizen soldiery rendered in time of war, and I know of no better way than to enact a law which will to some extent take care of their dependent widows and children.

The fact that the people of the Nation were so poor and the revenues of the country so impoverished at the close of the War of the Rebellion as to prohibit them meting out absolute justice to the Civil War veteran, or because they may have been laggard in their duty after recovering from the great losses suffered during that terrific struggle, does not appeal to me as a sufficient reason to refuse to make some provision for the maintenance of the dependent widows and children of the deceased Spanish-American War veterans. By passing this bill we will partially pay the debt we justly owe, and by such action encourage the patriotism of future generations. I shall vote for the bill.

Mr. ANSBERRY. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING].

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, I am heartily in favor of the pending legislation. As a member of the Pensions Committee of the House, I have devoted a great deal of attention to this subject for several months. I was a member of the subcommittee which conducted the hearings on this bill and of which the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEY] was chairman. A mass of evidence was presented to us in support of the proposed legislation. The important features of that testimony have been incorporated in the committee report which is now in the hands of Members. I think that I am well within the facts when I say that that report fully justifies the Pension Committee in making a favorable report on this bill, and supplies a most convincing argument why the House should approve the action of the committee.

Mr. Chairman, I did not serve in the Spanish-American War, although my good friend, the gentleman from New York [Mr. GOULDEN] did me the honor the other day to refer to me as a veteran of that conflict. I did not serve, because I could not meet the physical requirements established by the officers intrusted with the task of examining the young men who clamored for an opportunity to serve under the flag during our War with Spain.

Under the circumstances, I am not now disposed to haggle about the amount of pension which shall be paid to the men who did my fighting. Neither am I disposed to haggle about the pensions which shall be paid to the widows and dependent children of those men who were at the front defending the flag at a time when I should have been carrying a musket. The flower of Colorado youth went into the Army in 1898. That is not a mere figure of speech, as everyone familiar with the facts can testify. Many of them died in Cuba and the Philippines, and others returned broken in health and spirit.

Gentlemen tell us that this was not a real war; that whipping Spain was mere child's play. Few of these critics ever smelled powder. The most formidable foe the American Army had to contend with was not the Spanish soldier or the Filipino, struggling for what he conceived to be the freedom of his country, but the dreadful diseases peculiar to the Tropics. My service on the Pension Committee has convinced me that it is impossible for any gentleman to state the exact extent to which the constitutions of our soldiers were permanently weakened by the germs of malaria and typhoid and the hundred and one complications resulting from those diseases. I could furnish almost innumerable examples to illustrate the force of this point, but my time is limited, and I am anxious that we should get to a vote without unnecessary delay.

Many of the gentlemen who are foremost in opposing pension legislation do not hesitate to advocate policies which might plunge this country into war. During the last few days we have heard much loose talk of that kind on the floor of this House. It seems to me that our pension roll, which, I contend, is a roll of honor, is a very effective answer to the pleas of the "jingoes." I am not a peace-at-any-price man. I merely put a little higher value on the blood of our boys than do some gentlemen. When a nation's liberties are threatened, when its Territorial integrity is endangered, then patriots must be prepared to make the supreme sacrifice in defense of national life. I will never support a land-grabbing war or a war prosecuted for the protection of shady "concessions" acquired by unscrupulous monopolists through devious ways. Gentlemen who advocate such unholy conflicts should not interpose objections when it is proposed to care for the widows and orphans of the men who left the farm, mine, or factory to fight for Cuba libre.

Just another word, Mr. Chairman, and I will finish. It should be recorded to the everlasting glory of the veterans of the Spanish-American War that they are not seeking pensions for themselves. They are calling on us to care for the dependent widows and orphans of their comrades who have crossed the Great Divide, and unless I greatly mistake the temper of this House, the appeal will not be in vain.

Mr. ANSBERRY. Mr. Chairman, I now yield two minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HAMILL].

[Mr. HAMILL addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. ANSBERRY. Mr. Chairman, I now yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. STEPHENS].

Mr. STEPHENS of California. Mr. Chairman, all my life I have had a reverence for the men who from 1861 to 1865 left homes of peace and plenty and comfort and went forth to fight for the preservation of the Union; went forth to endure untold hardships and suffering; went forth to yield up their lives that the life of the Nation might be saved. Mr. Chairman, since 1898 I have similarly regarded the boys who volunteered for service in behalf of the flag during the War with Spain.

From April, 1898, to July, 1902, thousands of our bravest and best yielded up every home tie, every certainty of reasonable health, every certainty of comfort and loving care among friends to battle for the Nation's honor. Men who volunteer their lives for their country's good deserve all we can reasonably do for them. I have favored larger pensions for veterans of the Civil War, and I would be glad to vote for a pension of at least $1 per day for every man who served the Union honorably during the War between the States, and when the proper time comes I shall favor the granting of an adequate pension to every veteran of the Spanish War who needs it. As he volunteered to serve his country when it needed him, so now I am ready to do what I can to have that country assist him when he is distressed.

Mr. Chairman, my heart goes out to the women and the children widowed and orphaned through the death of husband or father because of wounds incurred or diseases contracted by him in time of war. I go further and am ready now and glad to vote to-day for a bill to pension the widow of every soldier of the period mentioned in the bill.

Mr. Chairman, I know the quality of the boys that volunteered during the Spanish War from southern California, and I know how deserving are the orphaned children and the widows of those who volunteered and since have passed away. No men more loyal to a nation's flag ever lived than those from my own home city and section, and I willingly give my vote in behalf of those whom they loved best.

Mr. ANSBERRY. Mr. Chairman, how much time has this side consumed?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. FOSTER). The gentleman has 14 minutes remaining.

Mr. ANSBERRY. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. ELDER. Mr. Chairman, I am glad to see that there is not the tense feeling about this matter to-day that we have undergone for the last several days, and yet from a monetary standpoint more money will be eventually expended within the next 50 years under this bill now before this House than the actual cost of the building of the Panama Canal. We start out with a $2,500,000 annual expense, and if history repeats itself, with 452,000 men serving in this war as against a million and a half who served on the Federal side in the Civil War, then within 25 or 30 years this list will have grown to at least $30,000,000 a year.

I do not oppose class pensions on the ground that some do. My view is purely an economic one. I do not believe in any special pension system where the party involved has not been hurt by his service to the Government. I do not believe in a pension to Federal judges, nor do I believe in pensions to Government clerks. If we are not paying them a living, decent wage out of which they can lay up for the future, then we should raise their wages. I will, on the question of pensions, as an economic proposition, go further than most of you. I believe fully deserving and needy citizens who have abided the laws of their country during their life, when they reach an old age, should be supported by the Government.

England is the only European country which has a noncontributing system of old-age pension. The Government provides the whole sum. In France, Germany, Austria, Belgium, Denmark, Italy, and Spain they maintain a system of workingmen's insurance which is contributed to by the employee, the employer, and the State.

Russia has no such system, except for employees of the Government, and some few pension systems maintained by large corporations for their employees.

In addition to the above workingmen's insurance, most of the European countries have various other kinds of special insurance, such as miners', government employees', accident, sickness, seamen's, and so forth.

In Germany and Italy the money paid in reverts to heirs in event of death of pensioner before reaching the pensionable age.

In France under one plan the money reverts to the heirs, while under the other plan the Government is only obligated to pay a pension during life; the first plan combines old-age insurance and a form of life insurance.

In Germany the original act was passed in 1889, supplemented in 1891, and the present act passed in 1899, making important modifications of the old-age insurance provisions. This is a part of a comprehensive system of sickness, accident, and invalidity insurance in operation in Germany.

The act of 1899 makes this obligatory upon the following classes:

Persons employed as laborers, journeymen, assistants, apprentices, or domestic servants earning wages or salaries.

Managing officials, foremen, and technical workers; clerks and apprentices in business houses; other employees whose services or employment forms their principal vocation, such as teachers, tutors, and all persons receiving wages or salary, if their annual earnings do not exceed 2,000 marks ($500).

Persons employed for wages or salary as crews of German vessels and ship captains whose earnings do not exceed 2,000 marks ($500).

The right to insure voluntarily under this act is granted to these classes:

Superintendents of works, foremen, men with technical education, business assistants, teachers and tutors, ship captains, and other employed persons whose annual earnings exceed 2,000 marks ($500) but does not exceed 3,000 marks ($750).

Traders and manufacturers who do not regularly employ more than two workmen liable to insurance, as well as all persons engaged in home industries and not subject to the insurance obligation.

Persons who receive only board and lodging in return for their labor or are exempt from compulsory insurance because their employment is only temporary.

The employer is held responsible for the insurance of all workmen employed by him, and for the payment of the premiums, being authorized to deduct the workmen's share of the premium from his wages.

In 1909, including all forms of insurance, sickness, accident, and so forth, 14,000,000 were insured out of a total population of 60,000,000. The obligation to insure begins with the seventeenth year. The pension is granted at 70 years of age without proof of disability. The insured must have paid premiums for 1,200 weeks. The expenses of this insurance are borne jointly by the Empire, the employers, and the employed. The Empire contributes to each annuity the fixed sum of 50 marks ($11.90) per annum. The Government pays the expenses of the department. The following table shows the five wage classes as determined by total annual earnings, the amount of pension payable in each class, and the weekly contribution required:

Wage class.	Total pension payable.	Weekly premium.
		Cents.
Less than 350 marks ($87.50)	$27.50	3½
Between 350 and 550 marks ($137.50)	35.00	5
Between 550 and 850 marks ($212.50)	42.50	6
Between 850 and 1,150 marks ($287.50)	50.00	7½
More than 1,150 marks	57.50	9

In an official report published in 1913 it is stated that there is a distinct relation between the operations of the old-age pensions and the decline in pauperism in England and Wales.

The report of His Majesty's inland-revenue commissioners for the year ending March 31, 1909, the latest official publication giving statistics of the pension act, shows that in the first three months of the operations of this act 647,494 pension claims were allowed. This total included 369,037 for England and Wales, 183,500 for Ireland, 70,294 for Scotland, and 24,663 for Wales. Later figures concerning the number of pensioners and the amount of expenditures are given in a consular report by Consul General John L. Griffiths, of London, under date of November 26, 1909. These figures cover the first eight months of the operation of the act, ending August 31, 1909. The total number of pensioners is stated at 667,000, including 410,000 for England and Wales, 184,000 for Ireland, and 73,000 for Scotland. The total expenditure for the eight months is given at $26,298,565. The expenditure was at the rate of about $40,000,000 a year, or approximately $10,000,000 more than the original calculation.

An old-age pension can not be assigned, in bankruptcy or otherwise, to any creditors.

England at this time has a non-contributing old-age pension system. Several of the European countries have old-age pensions to which the various beneficiaries contribute. But, my friends, what reason or right is there that an old man who has lived 60 or 70 years, who has borne his share of the taxes, who has made a good citizen, who has lived out in the country in his humble way, and who has received few of the benefits of this Government; who has been willing to follow the flag, if need be—what right is there that that old man, who has contributed more to the Government than the wild boy who, for a lark, went down and fought a battle against a lot of mosquitoes, should not receive a pension, while that boy to whom this bill refers, serving only 90 days, would receive a pension?

What right has that young man who was not injured by the service, who had a better time than he ever had in all the days of his life, to be able to say for that valorous and great service which I did not render you are not going to pension my needy folks, but in later years you are going to pension me. His old father, who has made a good citizen all of his life, who has worked for the Government for years by paying the burdens of taxation and who has received none of the benefits of it, can be in need and in want and in penury, but he must follow the plow. I say to you that that old man did more good and rendered more service for the Government than the youngster who spent that 1 day or those 90 days waiting for a war that never actually came so far as he was concerned.

I realize that politically it is not very popular to oppose these various systems of pensions, but I believe that the day is coming some time, and God speed the day, in America when the people will wake up to the fact that they are the ones who are paying these unfair and unjust pensions. I believe if a man was injured in the war, if he was incapacitated from making a living, that this Government, in all equity and justice, should take care of him, but the man who went for patriotism's sake and was not injured, then the Government does not actually owe him one cent, and it should not pay it. Why, my friends, this Government owes millions and millions of dollars, owes justly and equitably, and yet we do not pay it. Why? They say we have not got the money. There is a cotton-tax claim here that the Supreme Court of the United States and other courts hold to be just, and there is not a constitutional lawyer on this floor who will say that tax is not unconstitutional, and yet under the Constitution of this country it was collected to the amount of $67,000,000. You admit the right of the claim, and it ought to be paid, but you do not pay it, and why? Because the Government has not got the money and you do not dare bring it out of the committee because you say we have not got the money to pay it. And until this Government reaches a time when it can pay its just, honest, and legal debts, my friends, we have no right in good conscience to go further on this scheme of spending money for pensions to catch votes. [Applause.]

Mr. ANSBERRY. Will the gentleman from Louisiana yield back his time?

Mr. MANN. He has control of his time; to whom will he yield it?

Mr. ANSBERRY. To me.

Mr. ELDER. I will do so.

Mr. ANSBERRY. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of New York. Mr. Chairman, it is my purpose to vote for this bill. The men who shouldered arms in the Spanish-American War were inspired by the highest patriotism. The contest has no parallel in the history of the human race. It was not a war of conquest or aggrandizement. It was not a contest for the acquisition of territory or to obtain military, political, or industrial advantage. The battles of the Spanish-American War were fought in order that the tyranny of despotic rule might be lifted from a people who were our customers in commerce and trade, our near neighbors, and our friends. The soldiers of that war were animated by the best motives of civilization and humanitarianism. Shall we now say to these men that their families shall suffer? Shall we tell them that their patriotism will be rewarded by neglect, on the part of this Government, of those near and dear to them? I can not believe that this Congress will deny to the widows and orphans of American soldiers in the late wars the treatment that is properly accorded to the families of those who served faithfully in the contest between the North and the South. The United States can prove its patriotism in no more effective way than by showing gratitude and appreciation to those who went forth to shed their blood for the honor and glory of this Republic. And this spirit can not be better exhibited or exemplified than by providing for the families of those who went to Cuba and the Philippines or who stood ready to fight for the flag wherever and whenever their country called upon them to do so.

Mr. ANSBERRY. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CLINE].

Mr. CLINE. Mr. Chairman, I am supporting this bill to pension the widows and orphans of the Spanish-American War, the Philippine insurrection, and a Boxer uprising. I am in favor of pensions to all worthy and deserving soldiers, their widows and orphans, and my record in Congress will abundantly verify it. I am in favor of this Government at all times providing for and protecting those in need who volunteered to support the honor or the civil rights of this Government, and that protection should extend to those dependent upon them for support. It requires great courage, Mr. Chairman, to go into distant lands, like the Philippines and China and even the near possessions of Spain like Cuba, to defend the cause of this country in any engagement upon which it has entered. The service of the volunteer forces in the War with Spain, Philippine insurrection, and the Boxer uprising was a peculiar one. Our Government was not embarrassed in any manner in either of these rebellions. In our War with Spain, we were making a volunteer service on the part of humanity. It was not directly in our cause that the husbands of the beneficiaries of this bill and their orphans were engaged in defending. In Cuba it was a rescue of a Province of a foreign State from the atrocities of the home Government visited upon an innocent people that this Nation could no longer endure, and with the purpose of rescuing that people that could not defend themselves longer against the inhumanity of the parent Government the young men of our own country were called upon to make the necessary sacrifice to restore a condition of better security to life and property. The necessity of sending men to the far-away Philippines to restore order and put down a rebellion could not be avoided. Our young men, without hesitation, cast their lives and fortunes in the Government's cause to restore order and maintain our supremacy in these possessions that came to us through the settlement of the Spanish-American War.

In this tropical country without sanitation, burdened with all those enemies of health to the men coming from a northern temperate climate, many thousands of our young men were not deterred because of the same from entering the service. I am in favor of pensions and liberal pensions, but I deplore the condition that makes it necessary to pay them. I have no hesitation whatever in writing on the statute books a pension for any man that will risk his life with three years' service in the defense of his country in the Philippine Islands. I have no less hesitation in extending the benefits of the pension laws to the widow and children of such a man. I believe in the trend of the nations of the world for universal peace that future wars may be avoided and all international difficulties be finally settled by arbitration; but when the necessity arises to defend the Government or in the interests of humanity, the youth of this country voluntarily go down to battle, then the Government can only do its highest duty by protecting and providing for those who defend the country's honor. As I said before, I believe a just Government ought to do as our Government, to its glory, always has done, and that is to provide a pension for the volunteer forces of the United States who suffered injury as a result of that service or who have left others depending upon them. It is within my knowledge that there are a number of widows of young Spanish-American soldiers and soldiers engaged in putting down the Philippine insurrection that will be beneficiaries of this bill. It may be, as some have said, that this date is too early after the war to make this broad and sweeping provision. But if cases are now meritorious and ought to be provided for the length of time that we should procrastinate with this legislation can not increase the merit of these cases. A great and good Government can not gain merit by deferring its benefactions. It is a singular fact, Mr. Chairman, that this bill is supported universally by the veterans of the Civil War as one that ought to be passed at this early date. I know this bill will pass the House by a large majority and I very heartily register my vote for the purpose of aiding a Government, always loyal to its volunteer forces, to extend its benefactions to those in need.

Mr. ANSBERRY. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I just want to say a word or two, something in the form of personal interest. I was in the House, and was one of the insurrectos on the Republican side in the House in reference to Cuba who helped to bring on the Spanish War. I offered to go to the Spanish War, but the governor of my State thought I might be of some service in Congress and stated he did not see that I could be of advantage in the Army. I had a brother in my law office, a young lawyer of considerable ability and good health. He did not send any word to me that he was going to go to the Spanish War and I did not send any word to him, but I knew he was going in. He went in with the First Illinois Infantry. He was a good lawyer and had a good position in a good law office. I went to Montauk Point to meet the First Illinois Infantry when they came back from Cuba. They had not seen very much fighting, though they had seen a little. I went not for the purpose merely of meeting my brother, because I did not know he had been ill, but I went to meet the First Illinois boys and help take care of them. I found my brother in the hospital, got him furloughed, and later took him home. Now, it is very easy for people to say that those boys went through no great experience, and I apprehend they did not as compared with many who went in the Civil War, but my brother lost his health, he was compelled to resign his position in the office and quit the practice of the law, to leave his life profession in which he had made good, and do the best he could, which has not been excessively well, with poor health, trying to make a living in some other way, because he could not stand office work. I have frequently advised him to apply for a pension, which, so far as I know, he never has done through probably a false sense of pride. My father was in the Black Hawk Indian War, in the Mexican War, and the Civil War, and yet after all of those wars was a man of good health and strong power. My brother suffered more in health as the result of his service through the little time in the Spanish War in Cuba than my father had suffered in the three wars in which he had served.

Now, I am inclined to think those boys who did go to the front when you and I were permitted to remain at home engaging in our own business, preserving our own health, have a little more coming to them than the very paltry pay which we gave to them. We did not take care of them so extra well. Some day, when I get a little older and maybe more or less garrulous, I am going to write a little story of my experience at Montauk Point. It will not reflect any credit upon the Regular Army when it is written. Let me give you one illustration. Just before the First Illinois Infantry was sent back from Cuba my brother had issued to him a new uniform. He had been wearing the old uniform, one which he had worn, I think, from his enlistment. When I got a furlough for him, or permission for him to be taken away from the hospital—and he was not so very sick—he came to me and said that he had a new uniform, but they had required him to give it up to be destroyed or fumigated so that he could not take it with him for fear that it might carry disease. I said to him, "What are you going to do?" "Oh," he said, "I guess in the usual manner I will wear my old uniform away," and he wore home the old uniform that he had worn all through Cuba while a wise Government destroyed his new uniform for fear that it would spread disease. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. ANSBERRY. Mr. Chairman, how much time is there remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has 15 minutes remaining.

Mr. ANSBERRY. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FITZHENRY].

[Mr. FITZHENRY addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. ELDER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ANSBERRY. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. J. I. NOLAN].

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, during the discussion to-day and last Wednesday on the bill introduced by Representative KEY of Ohio, which provides for the pensioning of the widows of the veterans of the Spanish-American War, the Philippine insurrection, and those who served during the Boxer uprising in China, considerable criticism has been indulged in by Members on the floor of the House as to the wisdom of this legislation and questioning the propriety of it, insinuating that the men whose widows will be the beneficiaries have in many instances rendered no real service to their country during this period of war. Along with many others in this House who are in favor of this measure I am in favor of it not as a matter of policy but as a matter of justice. We took advantage of conditions and played safe by staying home during the time that these men were actually in the service of the United States either at the front or in the various camps under orders. We held to the positions that we occupied and looked after the interests of ourselves and our families. The men who volunteered for service in Cuba, the Philippines, and in China gave up positions that paid them well in many instances and who were largely responsible for the support of members of their immediate families. At the outset most of these men were promised by their employers their old positions on their safe return, a promise in many instances that the employer failed to make good on when our boys returned from the front.

During all the time between April 21, 1898, and July 4, 1902, I saw regiment after regiment coming to San Francisco, both Volunteers and Regulars. In the first instance, the Volunteers, young men, came with their different State regiments, and very often without even Army uniforms. They were thrown into Camp Merritt, at San Francisco, and held until such time as they were dispatched to the Philippines. Their lot was as happy as the people of San Francisco could make it; and it was well that the people responded in the first instance, for the Government itself was not equipped for the proper care of the thousands of troops that were to be dispatched.

The rations and equipment that were served to these men became a national scandal, and they suffered many privations in our country before being dispatched to foreign lands.

From the annual report of the War Department for the fiscal year 1902, volume 1, page 291, I find that the total number of troops that served in the Philippine Islands between June 30, 1898, the date of the first arrival of the troops, and July 4, 1902, the end of the insurrection, was 1,882 officers and 74,534 enlisted men of the Regular Army and 2,185 officers and 47,867 enlisted men of the Volunteer Army, making a total of 4,067 officers and 122,401 enlisted men.

The enlisted men of the Army, and especially the Volunteers, who responded not for the amount of pay they were to receive, which was very small, but from patriotic motives, sacrificed much from a financial standpoint during the period of their enlistment, and for this reason alone they would be entitled to a great deal of consideration; but anyone who saw the changed condition of these men, from healthy young Americans at the time of their departure to pale-faced, emaciated human beings on their return, would realize the many hardships that these men must have endured in a tropical country where no efforts had ever been made by those in authority to regulate the sanitary conditions.

The conditions in the Philippines to-day are vastly different from the conditions of 1898, and the man who is soldiering there to-day has a vastly different condition surrounding him than our Volunteer and Regular soldiers who were dispatched there during the period of the Spanish-American War and Philippine insurrection.

While it is true that any man who has a record for sickness and who can trace his condition to that record is eligible for a pension, nevertheless it is a fact that the conditions surrounding the service at that time were and are responsible for the sickness and death of many a man who served his country during that war, and who has no hospital record to fall back on to secure either for himself, his wife, or his children any redress from his country.

The same report that I have quoted also states that 76 officers and 2,547 enlisted men of the Regular Army and 64 officers and 1,687 enlisted men of the Volunteer Army—a total of 140 officers and 4,234 enlisted men—died from all causes in the Philippine Islands between June 30, 1898, and July 4, 1902. Only a small percentage of those men died from wounds received in actual battle, the great majority of them having succumbed to the ravages of diseases peculiar to that tropical country; and it was this condition that left its mark on many a Volunteer and Regular officer and enlisted man, and it is justice that these men are now seeking, so that their widows and children may receive some consideration at the hands of this Government for which they made sacrifices.

I again refer to the fact that many of the men were promised their positions on their return from service in this war, and I know of many instances in my own city of San Francisco where the men who were greeted so enthusiastically on their return and who were promised so much were very soon forgotten.

Mr. Chairman, there is one provision of the bill that I think ought to be amended, and that is the provision that a widow with an income of $250 or over annually shall not be entitled to the benefits of this law; and, while it seems impossible to remedy that defect now, I trust that the time is not far distant when the Spanish-American War veterans will be placed on the same footing with our Civil War and Mexican War veterans. I am very much in favor of this measure, and hope it will pass the House unanimously.

Mr. ANSBERRY. Mr. Chairman, I wish the Chair would notify me when I have consumed all but five minutes of my time.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES], who has entertained the House on many occasions with his peculiar views on the propriety of certain appropriations—and usually those appropriations which he disapproves of are ones that do not go to his own district, and he always dissents from an appropriation in a bill granting pensions or providing for an appropriation on behalf of the soldiers of the United States—the gentleman, it seems, has a peculiar aversion to the pension question and pension legislation, which is due, I think, to the fact that he represents a southern district in this House. I want to say, in passing, that I do not wish to be understood by that as saying that all men who represent southern districts in this House, or any large proportion of them, are opposed to pension legislation. A notable example is the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. TALBOTT], who himself served four years under the Confederate flag and who time and again in this House has raised his voice in the defense of those who bore arms upon the other side. I do not recall a single instance of a pension bill being under consideration in this House that the gentleman from Maryland, who had such distinguished service on behalf of the "lost cause," did not vote "aye" on all such legislation. [Applause.]

Now, it strikes me that if this brave Confederate soldier who experienced the hardships of the Civil War on the Confederate side, took part in that terrible and sanguinary contest, who had personal knowledge of the differences that divided our great country at that time and that period—if he can do that, then these men, who might be described as men who "laugh at scars and never felt a wound," might themselves forget and sink the narrow prejudices which they have and which seem to affect their vote on pension legislation.

I want to call the attention of this House to a witness who was summoned here by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES], and whom he claimed was a distinguished soldier of the Civil War, a grandson of one President of the United States and a great-grandson of another, Col. Charles Francis Adams, jr., of Massachusetts.

He quoted that soldier as saying that the pension roll was a roll of dishonor. I thought I would be the last one to say a word here against any man who served under that flag. I will wager Col. Adams has never felt the pinch of poverty, has never known the need of comfortable clothes or a warm shelter. Perhaps he does not know that countless thousands of his comrades get food and clothes and provide a roof over their heads by their little pension. I am afraid this man has forgotten the old and less fortunate of his veteran comrades as he has evidently forgotten the old adage as to the kind of a bird that fouls its own nest; but in view of the fact that the gentleman has summoned Col. Charles Francis Adams here as a witness I have taken the trouble of looking up that gentleman's record that we may determine for ourselves if he be an altogether credible witness, as the descendant of such illustrious sires should be.

I find in the Records of the Rebellion, in volume 46, series 1, page 827, under the date of April 18, 1865, a general order, something that will perhaps throw a side light on the reason why this person designated the pension roll as a roll of dishonor:

> The general commanding is much pleased at the report of the inspection of yesterday, which, together with the arrest of Col. Adams, had been ordered from department headquarters in consequence of the very numerous complaints against the regiment.

The gentleman's name is mentioned in two or three other places in that voluminous record of the Civil War; but in not one single place is there a word in that record that any man should be proud of who is the grandson of one President and a great grandson of another, and who spent four years in the Civil War, save and except a report which was made in March, 1865, I think, under which he became a brevet brigadier general. Though why he should have been so honored, I do not know. How about making the roll of brevet brigadier generals a roll of honor?

On one other occasion, as I recall the record, Col. Adams was commanding a Cavalry regiment. And men who have seen service in the Civil War tell me that that sort of regiment should be in action if any regiment or any part of the Army is in action. But that record does not disclose, from the beginning to the end, that this gentleman, who has so forgotten the respect due to his comrades in arms as to make the insulting statement in reference to them, any particularly creditable services he rendered as captain, major, colonel, or brevet brigadier general. These volumes are silent on that point. One other little thing I recall from that record, and then we will dismiss this distinguished descendant to oblivion. He was commanded to go to the front in some action in the vicinity of Washington, and he did not go, but gave as a reason that there was a swamp or a quagmire there, through which he could not go. There, my friend from Texas, is the witness you summoned; and, I think, if any man has ever been discredited, Col. Adams has been discredited by the record which he made as a soldier and commander of troops in the Civil War.

I regret that my colleague from Ohio [Mr. GORDON] seemed to be putting himself in the position of some of these other gentlemen who represent southern constituencies, by carping and finding fault. My colleague seems to be of the opinion that because this great Government permitted 25 or 30 years to elapse between the close of the Civil War and the time it took care of the dependents of the veterans of the Civil War, therefore because we were going to do substantial justice to the dependents of the Spanish War veterans within 15 years of the date of that war instead of 25, that in some way or other this works an injustice on the dependents of the veterans of that war; or does he want this deferred for 25 years on the theory that two wrongs will make a right—a discovery that no one heretofore has ever announced on the floor of this House, to my knowledge.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair reminds the gentleman that he has five minutes left of his time.

Mr. ANSBERRY. I ask leave, Mr. Chairman, to extend and revise my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ANSBERRY] asks leave to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ANSBERRY. I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MURRAY].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MURRAY] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I do not know that these remarks are necessary to carry this bill, and that is all I am concerned about. I have found it necessary, however, to refer to some of the statements as to the supposed inconsistency of this legislation compared with other pension legislation. We find a spirit in the land seeming to urge that we do not need any more pensions, because we are not going to have any more wars.

I call the attention of gentlemen who hold that view to the fact that the philosophy of history teaches us that invariably, following a period of long peace between nations, there is one of war. Judging from past history, I would not fear to predict that there will be more wars in the coming century than there were in the last. Universal peace is an ideal thing that we all hope for, that we drive toward, but as long as one man will fight when another steps on his toes purposely, so long will a group of men fight when another group of men attempt to step upon their toes. So war will always exist, and we need to give hope to the men of the future who will be called upon to serve this country.

Certainly the man who is brave enough to go into a war thinks much more about his wife and children than he does about himself. Were I to go into any war that might come in the future I would not think about what became of me. My only concern would be whether or not my wife and children should suffer for bread. I do not want to see a repetition of things that have happened in the past, of incidents of ingratitude, where any man who ever served this Government shall suffer for bread, and I think much less of the soldier than I do of his widow and orphan children whom this bill undertakes to take care of.

Mr. ELDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to a question?

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. No; I have but five minutes. This bill may differ from the Civil War bill, but the circumstances are different and necessitate a change. All of the furloughs in the Civil War were requested by the soldiers. Many of those in the Spanish War were forced furloughs.

Then, in reply to what Gen. SHERWOOD said, I call attention to the fact that we can not pass a law that will be uniform or uniformly just. For instance, we say in all our pension legislation that a man who served less than 90 days can not draw a pension. Yet the man who has served in one battle and in consequence has become a cripple for life is just as much entitled to a pension as the man who served four years and never received a wound. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired. All time has expired. The Clerk will read the bill.

Mr. KENNEDY of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of this bill, and I ask the privilege of extending my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. KENNEDY] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KENNEDY of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the bill under consideration to pension the widows of officers and enlisted men who served in the War with Spain and the Philippine insurrection. I have always believed that every man that enlists in the service of his country and defends his country in time of war and becomes disabled is entitled to a pension, and if he dies that his widow should receive a substantial pension, and if he leaves dependent children they should be paid a reasonable amount of money. They are the wards of the Nation. The money that the soldier receives will assist, in some measure, in keeping him from want, and what his widow and children receive from the Government will, in many cases, maintain the home and keep the family together and prevent the children from becoming inmates of public institutions.

A man who has enlisted in time of war and has become disabled should never want for the necessities of life; and if he is taken away, either on the field of battle or by sickness when the war is over, his widow should be maintained in a substantial manner.

Mr. Chairman, this is the first time that the Spanish War Veterans have ever requested legislation from the Government, either for themselves or the surviving widows of their comrades. There are quite a number of widows who would be in want of money and food only for the generosity of Spanish War Veterans on account of the imperfections of our pension laws. The widows of the soldiers that enlisted in the War with Spain and the Philippine insurrection find it almost impossible to secure evidence—in some cases that have come under my observation—the evidence that their husbands became disabled in the line of duty while in the service. When a Spanish War veteran is applying for a pension for himself he may have knowledge of persons and facts and the location of the persons who can give the required proof in his claim, but when the widow applies for a pension she is unable to procure the evidence, not having her husband's knowledge as to the location of the proper witnesses, and in many cases she is unable to secure the address of his comrades.

The committee, in its report in favor of this bill, very truly states that—

For the first time in the history of our country the American soldier and sailor served in the Tropics and the Orient under climatic and hygienic conditions unusual to him. They received no bounty or substitute money and were not drafted for service. Not to provide for the dependents of this latest type of our patriotic citizenship, while lavishly making provisions for the dependents of those who served in all other wars of the Republic, indicts the Government on a charge of unjust discrimination.

It has been 15 years since these men enlisted, and I believe we can now pass a bill of this character and that it will receive the approbation of the people of the country.

Our soliders, whether they are killed in battle or die in camp of fever, whether they have been soldiers for one day or four years, whether they have been crippled on the battle field or their bodies wasted by fever, we who have remained at home, realizing that the Spanish War soldier enlisted without receiving any compensation whatsoever or bounty of any kind, should be magnanimous in our treatment of them in their days of want, and if their lives have been taken either in or out of the service it is our plain duty to care for their widows and orphan children.

Mr. Chairman, I sincerely hope that this bill will pass.

Mr. CONNOLLY of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I also would like to announce that I am in favor of this bill, and ask the privilege of extending my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. CONNOLLY] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 13044) to pension widow and minor children of any officer or enlisted man who served in the War with Spain or Philippine insurrection.

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the passage of this act if any officer or enlisted man who served 90 days or more in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States, either as a regular or volunteer, during the War with Spain or the Philippine insurrection, between April 21, 1898, and July 4, 1902, inclusive, and who has been honorably discharged therefrom, has died or shall hereafter die leaving a widow, without means of support other than her daily labor, and an actual net income not exceeding $250 per year, or leaving a minor child or children under the age of 16 years, such widow shall, upon due proof of her husband's death, without proving his death to be the result of his Army or Navy service, be placed on the pension roll from the date of the filing of her application therefor under this act, at the rate of $12 per month during her widowhood, and shall also be paid $2 per month for each child of such officer or enlisted man under 16 years of age, and in case of the death or remarriage of the widow, leaving a child or children of such officer or enlisted man under the age of 16 years, such pension shall be paid such child or children until the age of 16: Provided, That in case a minor child is insane, idiotic, or otherwise permanently helpless, the pension shall continue during the life of said child, or during the period of such disability, and shall commence from the date of application therefor after the passage of this act: Provided further, That said widow shall have married said officer or enlisted man previous to the passage of this act: Provided, however, That this act shall not be so construed as to reduce any pension under any act, public or private.

SEC. 2. That no agent, attorney, or other person engaged in preparing, presenting, or prosecuting any claim under the provisions of this act shall, directly or indirectly, contract for, demand, receive, or retain for such services in preparing, presenting, or prosecuting such claim a sum greater than $10, which sum shall be payable only on the order of the Commissioner of Pensions; and any person who shall violate any of the provisions of this section, or shall wrongfully withhold from the pensioner or claimant the whole or any part of a pension or claim allowed or due such pensioner or claimant under this act, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall, for each and every offense, be fined not exceeding $500 or be imprisoned at hard labor not exceeding two years, or both, in the discretion of the court.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 3362. An act to authorize the Secretary of Commerce, through the Coast and Geodetic Survey and the Bureau of Fisheries, to make a survey of natural oyster beds, bars, and rocks, and barren bottoms contiguous thereto in waters along the coast of and within the State of Texas.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 13765) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, Mr. HITCHCOCK, and Mr. WARREN as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 13453) making appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, Mr. LEA of Tennessee, and Mr. DU PONT as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the President had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

S. 4019. An act to authorize the Tug River & Kentucky Railroad Co. to construct a bridge across the Tug Fork of the Big Sandy River at or near the mouth of Blackberry Creek, in Pike County, Ky.

S. 4145. An act to authorize the government of Porto Rico to construct two bridges across the Arecibo River near the city of Arecibo, P. R.

PENSIONS.

The committee resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the committee amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, lines 6 and 7, strike out the words "during the War with Spain or the Philippine insurrection."

Page 1, line 9, insert, after the word "inclusive," the words "service to be computed from date of enlistment to date of discharge, including all furloughs."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I notice that, while the committee reports that amendment to strike out the words "during the War with Spain or the Philippine insurrection," they also report an amendment to the title which leaves that language in, so that the title to the bill and the bill itself will apparently cover slightly different propositions. Now, what is the object in striking out the words "during the War with Spain or the Philippine insurrection"?

Mr. ANSBERRY. I confess that I agree with the gentleman, but I am advised that the title is sufficient to cover everything that is in the bill. The purpose of striking out the words "during the War with Spain or the Philippine insurrection" is to include those men who took part in the Boxer rebellion.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Not otherwise changing the title of the bill?

Mr. ANSBERRY. I thought that the title of the bill should include that, but I am advised otherwise, and, as the gentleman well knows, I am not on the committee.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. ANSBERRY. Yes; I will be glad to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has the floor.

Mr. MANN. I will yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. GARDNER. As the bill is now, if you strike out that clause you would make any soldier of the Regular Army who was in garrison at Fort Russell or Fort Riley, or any of the forts, and was never connected with the War with Spain, pensionable, would you not?

Mr. ANSBERRY. Yes.

Mr. GARDNER. And it is the proposition to give such soldiers the preference of soldiers of the Regular Army who did not happen to be in active service during that time?

Mr. ANSBERRY. I am informed that comparatively few of the soldiers of the Regular Army were not in active service between April 21, 1898, and July 4, 1902. Gentlemen will understand that it is a hard matter to include those men without doing, as is always the case when general legislation is attempted, some injustice or inequality. In order to make it uniform, usually some one suffers or is benefited beyond his desserts. As a matter of fact, these men get the benefit of that, as the gentleman says, when they were in barracks or some other place, not in active service.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman think it practicable in the future to differentiate between the widow of a Regular soldier who remained in Chicago, if he did, during the War with Spain or the Philippine insurrection, and the widow of a soldier who happened to be in the service next year—a Regular soldier?

Mr. ANSBERRY. No; I do not. I am rather of the opinion of the gentleman from Illinois, that a few men will be put in a different class from other men who enlisted in the Regular Army. But, as I said before, it is my understanding that most of the men in the Regular service between the dates I have mentioned were actually in the service in the Spanish War or the Philippine rebellion or in the Boxer rebellion. I can not state offhand the number of men who were not, but most of the men in the Regular Army were in that service; at least that is the information I get from the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WILLIS. Now, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. WILLIS. I understand the purpose of the committee to be to amend this so as to include, in addition to the soldiers who served during the War with Spain and in the Philippine insurrection, only those who served in the Boxer insurrection, or whatever is the proper name of it. Is that the purpose?

Mr. ANSBERRY. That is my understanding.

Mr. WILLIS. Does not the gentleman think it would be better to let this language stay in the bill as it is; in other words, to vote down the amendment?

Mr. ANSBERRY. The difficulty with that proposition, as I said before, is that you would have to define just exactly what service means. For instance, suppose a regiment of the Regular Army were sent from Chicago to the Philippines between those dates, for service there in the rebellion, and they got to Manila, and were compelled to camp near the city, probably in the outskirts, in some of those swampy districts, and some of their number contracted fevers or diseases. Their widows might be pensioned because of the fact that they contracted disease, although they did not see any service at all. Does not the gentleman realize that it would be an extremely hard matter to take care of the cases of these men and their dependents if these men apparently recovered from their fevers, returned home without actually having seen service in the rebellion, although incapacitated because of that service, while serving in the regular establishment?

Mr. FOSTER. It is fixed by the dates here now.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that either with or without this language it will cover everybody in the Army between these dates here mentioned.

Mr. ANSBERRY. I agree with the gentleman that it does cover everybody in the Army between those dates.

Mr. MANN. Everybody—who served 90 days or more in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States, either as a regular or volunteer, between April 21, 1898, and July 4, 1902, inclusive.

And, then, if you add what you propose to leave out—during the War with Spain or the Philippine insurrection——

Mr. HAY. Will the gentleman permit me to make a suggestion?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. HAY. Under the act of February 2, 1901, the Army was increased, and between February 2, 1901, and July 4, 1902, there were from 40,000 to 50,000 men added to the Regular Army, some of whom, of course, saw service during the Philippine insurrection, none of whom saw any service whatever in the Spanish War, and a large number of whom never went outside of the country.

Mr. MANN. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. HAY. Under the terms of this bill the widows of those men would receive pensions.

Mr. MANN. Undoubtedly.

Mr. ANSBERRY. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. HAY. Certainly.

Mr. ANSBERRY. The gentleman says there were a large number. How many of the men in the Regular Establishment at that time who come under the provisions of this bill did not take part in one of these three services?

Mr. HAY. Does the gentleman mean outside of the United States?

Mr. ANSBERRY. Yes.

Mr. HAY. Of course, I do not know, but I should say at least 25,000 of them; and I would suggest to the gentleman that after the word "served," in line 4, you insert the words "outside of the continental limits of the United States."

Mr. MANN. Oh, you have got to cover the boys who were in the camps, at Chickamauga and elsewhere in the United States.

Mr. HAY. But the men who died then, or who contracted disease from which they have since died, leaving widows, come in under a law by which their widows, or most of them, have already been pensioned.

Mr. ANDERSON. Not those who died since.

Mr. MANN. If they died as a result of disease, of course their widows get pensioned anyway, no matter where they served.

Mr. LANGLEY. If that fact is established by proper evidence.

Mr. HAY. I think that is enough. Does not the gentleman think so?

Mr. MANN. No; I do not.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois has the floor.

Mr. MANN. I yield the floor.

Mr. ANSBERRY. Of course we all know that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] ought to be familiar with the number of men in the Regular Army who would be affected by this bill who, as a matter of fact, did not see service. Of course the gentleman has more knowledge on that question than I have, but my information is that the language that the gentleman proposes to put into the bill would, as my friend from Illinois [Mr. MANN] so well suggests, eliminate the Spanish War veterans who were in fever-infected camps at Chickamauga and other places that the gentleman knows of, and whose dependents could not after the soldier's death establish that the death resulted from disease of service origin, although, as I pointed out on Wednesday last, many of these soldiers had suffered from typhoid and malarial fevers, and in my opinion many of them died years afterwards as a result of these fevers, although the Pension Bureau said not and refused the widow and dependents a pension.

Mr. HAY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ANSBERRY. Certainly.

Mr. HAY. Does not the gentleman know that the number of those men who served within the United States can be ascertained?

Mr. ANSBERRY. Does the gentleman mean in the regular service?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. ANSBERRY. Yes; I know that.

Mr. HAY. And does not the gentleman think that before he asks us to pass this bill in its present form he ought to get that information?

Mr. ANSBERRY. Perhaps that is true, but, as I have already said to the gentleman, my information is that the number is small. When the gentleman tells me that there are 25,000 men who would be affected by that, it is a very astounding statement and is in conflict with the information furnished the committee.

Mr. HAY. I do not say that positively.

Mr. ANSBERRY. No; but approximately.

Mr. HAY. But I do say that on February 2, 1901, a law was passed authorizing the Army to be increased up to 100,000 men, and that as a result of that legislation a very large number of men, some 40,000 or 50,000 were added to the Army, partly during the Philippine insurrection. I am sure that I am not out of the way when I say that 25,000 of these men never went outside of the United States, never served in the Philippine insurrection. The Army was larger then than it was before or since.

Mr. ANSBERRY. I want to say to the gentleman that if the figures he gives are anywhere near correct, so far as I am concerned—and I am sure the committee will take the same view of it—the committee has been misinformed or is laboring under a misapprehension. If any such large number is affected, they should not be taken care of in this bill, although it is well to call attention to the fact that there were more men than that—Spanish War veterans—who did not leave the United States, and they will be taken care of in this bill.

Mr. GOULDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANSBERRY. Yes.

Mr. GOULDEN. I want to ask the gentleman a question. The purpose of the amendment striking out "during the War with Spain and the Philippine insurrection" is intended to include those who fought in the Boxer rebellion?

Mr. ANSBERRY. Yes.

Mr. GOULDEN. And also the men alluded to by the gentleman from Virginia?

Mr. HAY. We have troops in China now; does the gentleman think we ought to provide for them? These troops were Regular troops.

Mr. GOULDEN. The Regular Establishment; and they ought to be taken care of. I think, Mr. Chairman, the men alluded to by the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, though they did not go out of the country, ought to be taken care of if they fall within the provisions of this bill.

Mr. HAY. Why not take care of all the men in the Regular Army?

Mr. GOULDEN. We do if they served in the War with Spain or the Philippine insurrection or the Boxer rebellion.

Mr. HAY. You are not providing for death by service origin; you are providing in the bill that these people shall be taken care of whether they died from any disease contracted in the service or not.

Mr. GOULDEN. Only those who served between April 21, 1898, and July 4, 1902—four years.

Mr. HAY. You say the Regular Army people ought to be taken care of. Why not take care of all of them?

Mr. GOULDEN. How are you going to differentiate between soldiers of the Regular Army and the Volunteer? We take care of all of those between the dates mentioned.

Mr. HAY. Whether they served here or not?

Mr. GOULDEN. They served the United States, according to the gentleman's own statement, and if they did their wives and children ought to be taken care of.

Mr. HAY. According to the gentleman's argument, then, we should pension all the wives of soldiers who serve in the Regular Army.

Mr. GOULDEN. During the period of time that is mentioned here—yes; by all means.

Mr. HAY. Why not make it during any period?

Mr. GOULDEN. Because the bill does not provide for any period except between the two dates mentioned.

Mr. WILLIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANSBERRY. Yes.

Mr. WILLIS. I understand the purpose of the bill is to grant a pension to the widows and dependents of those who fought in the Philippine insurrection or the War with Spain. That is the purpose as originally intended. Now, the purpose of the committee amendment is to add to this so as to include those who fought in the Boxer insurrection.

Mr. ANSBERRY. That is my understanding.

Mr. WILLIS. Would not this language meet the objection and the suggestions that have been made here, to leave the language in the bill as it was originally introduced, so that it will read "during the War with Spain, the Philippine insurrection," and add to it "or the Boxer insurrection"? Would not that accomplish your purpose? I do not know whether that is the official title of that insurrection or not, but it is the Boxer rebellion in China. Does not the gentleman think that would meet the objection?

Mr. ANSBERRY. I should not want to assume the responsibility for saying that it would. However, my opinion is that it would.

Mr. WILLIS. If that is the case, the thing to do is to vote down the committee amendment, and then add the language I have suggested.

Mr. ANSBERRY. Yes; that would clear the matter up.

Mr. KEATING. If the gentleman from Ohio will allow me. Under the suggestion made by the gentleman from Ohio, would it not be possible to pension a member of the Regular Establishment who had enlisted between these dates? As a matter of fact, would not the proposed amendment include every soldier who was in the Army between those two dates?

Mr. WILLIS. In answer to the gentleman from Colorado, I think there is some merit in the suggestion made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that the way the bill reads it probably might include all those, but I do not believe that was the purpose of the framers of the bill. I had something to do with the bill, and I never heard of it before. The purpose was to grant a pension to the widows and dependents of those who fought in the Philippine insurrection and the Spanish-American War, or the War with Spain, and now the committee want to add widows and dependent children of the men who fought in the Boxer rebellion in China.

Mr. KEATING. This is the point I had in mind. The declaration of war was made April 31, 1898, and by official declaration hostilities ceased on July 4, 1902. Now, the war continued between those two dates. I do not see how it is possible to discriminate between men who enlisted at the beginning of the war and men who enlisted 90 days before the war closed for service in the war. All of these men to whom reference has been made enlisted for active service in the war.

Mr. MANN. Was there a proclamation issued July 4, 1902?

Mr. KEATING. I understand there was some form of official declaration that hostilities had ceased.

Mr. MANN. What hostilities?

Mr. KEATING. The hostilities connected with the Philippine insurrection.

Mr. WILLIS. Where does the Boxer insurrection come in?

Mr. KEATING. According to the War Department a state of war was supposed to exist between April 21, 1898, and July 4, 1902. That is the position taken by the War Department, and that covers the Boxer rebellion.

Mr. BATHRICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANSBERRY. Certainly.

Mr. BATHRICK. The gentleman's purpose is to amend this bill so it will include the so-called Boxer insurrection?

Mr. ANSBERRY. That is my understanding.

Mr. KEATING. Those engaged in the Boxer uprising.

Mr. BATHRICK. Why not amend the bill to include those who scaled that hill at Nicaragua and who lost their lives there? Why not amend it to include those who are fighting intermittently and have been almost every year since the Spanish War in the Philippine Islands? Why are they not as much entitled to consideration as those who by accident between these dates were in the Boxer uprising?

Mr. ANSBERRY. In reply to the gentleman I will say this: That the gentleman might propound queries here from now until doomsday by asking why this or that individual or this or that class of individuals was not included within the purview of this bill.

Mr. BATHRICK. Can the gentleman answer the question?

Mr. ANSBERRY. The gentleman declines to answer the question whether he can or not, because he does not care to waste his time in such futile endeavors.

Mr. BATHRICK. I presume it would be futile for the gentleman to attempt to answer the question.

Mr. ANSBERRY. I am afraid that answering any question the gentleman might ask would be futile.

Mr. BATHRICK. I think so here, in all cases.

Mr. ANSBERRY. Mr. Chairman, in reply to the gentleman from Ohio and others who have urged the objection to this bill that it would include members of the Regular Establishment who never saw service, I am going to say once more that, in my opinion, the committee did not intend to take care of any such large number of men as the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY], the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, has stated will be taken care of in this measure. Of course, I am not a member of the committee, but, as I said before——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has again expired.

Mr. ANSBERRY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last four words.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, there is an amendment already before the committee.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be permitted to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ADAIR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANSBERRY. Yes.

Mr. ADAIR. In view of the discussion that has arisen here in relation to this matter, what would the gentleman in charge of the bill think of letting it go over until these facts suggested by the gentleman from Virginia can be ascertained? I am in favor of this bill. I expect to vote for it, but I do not feel like voting for it in the dark. I would like to know whom it is going to affect before I vote for it, and if it could go over until some future time, until these matters could be brought before the House, I think it would be much better.

Mr. ANSBERRY. Of course, a similar objection could be raised the next time the House met and under the regular order had taken up the consideration of this bill, and so on ad infinitum.

Mr. ADAIR. It is not an objection. It is a question of facts. The gentleman himself admits that he does not know whether it is 25,000 or 2,500 men who would be affected, and I will say I am just as much interested in the passage of this bill as the gentleman is.

Mr. ANSBERRY. I realize that there is a sharp conflict as to the numbers that would be taken care of, but I do not think it can be as many as has been suggested.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, I am a member of the committee, and during the discussion of this bill the point now being discussed was raised, and at that time the best information in the possession of the committee was that 5,000 men would be the maximum to be affected in the way suggested by the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. HAY. Will the gentleman let me ask where he got his information?

Mr. KEATING. From the members of the committee, the gentlemen who raised the objection, just as I would expect to get it from the gentleman now when he raises his objection.

Mr. HAY. But if the gentleman wanted to get accurate information all he would have had to do was to ask the War Department to inform him how many men were stationed at posts in the United States during that period and how many men served in the Philippines. It is a matter of information that can be obtained without any trouble within 24 hours, or certainly within 48 hours, with the most perfect accuracy. There can be no question about that. Of course I do not know accurately how many, but I do know that there must be a very large number, and very many more than 5,000 men.

Mr. KEATING. That was the information which our committee had.

Mr. SUMNERS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANSBERRY. Certainly; but just a moment. I want first to answer the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ADAIR]. Of course I acquit the gentleman from Indiana of any ulterior motive in making the suggestion that he made. I consider it in a measure a valuable suggestion; but, as I said before, I am not the committee and I am not on the committee.

Mr. ADAIR. I was asking the gentleman his opinion as to whether or not it would not be better.

Mr. ANSBERRY. Mr. Chairman, in my opinion the gentleman who is chairman of the Military Affairs Committee, and who stated that there were fully 25,000 men who would be affected by this, in the Regular Establishment, who did not see service, is mistaken, because of the fact that the committee has in its possession figures from the Interior Department to the effect that some 450,000 persons, in round numbers, would be affected by this bill—that is to say, men engaged in these various wars and rebellions, so called—and that the Volunteers were in excess of 350,000. I do not know the size of the Regular Army at that date, June 28, 1898.

Mr. HAY. Twenty-five thousand at that time; but the point I make is that the Army was increased under the act of February 2, 1901.

Mr. COX. To what force?

Mr. ANSBERRY. To what force?

Mr. HAY. Authorized, 100,000; and between that date and July 4, 1902, at least 75,000 men went into the Regular Army. And certainly one-fourth of them did not go out of this country or serve in the Philippine Islands.

Mr. ANSBERRY. Well, there is a conflict——

Mr. HAY. And the matter can be ascertained without any difficulty.

Mr. ADAIR. If the gentleman will permit, does not the gentleman believe this information of sufficient importance to warrant the delay in action upon this bill until the facts can be ascertained?

Mr. ANSBERRY. I think not. If necessary, this can be cured by amendment.

Mr. KEATING. Will the gentleman allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. ANSBERRY. Certainly.

Mr. KEATING. What was the date just mentioned by the gentleman from Virginia?

Mr. HAY. February 2, 1901.

Mr. KEATING. On February 2, 1901, the Army was increased by legislation. Does the gentleman think that a man who enlisted as a result of that increase, and did not serve outside of the borders of the United States, should be pensioned under this act?

Mr. HAY. I understood that is the attitude of the committee—that they should not be pensioned.

Mr. KEATING. No; that is not the attitude of the committee.

Mr. HAY. Well, the committee believe they ought to be; then?

Mr. KEATING. As I said to the gentleman before, the information the committee had was that perhaps 5,000 soldiers were in the position suggested by the gentleman, and we decided to waive any attempt to exclude the 5,000. If in the opinion of the gentleman a greater number would be affected, it seems to me that the gentleman should offer an amendment which would carry out his ideas, and which I submit could very readily be drafted.

Mr. HAY. Well, but I understand the attitude of the committee is that they do not want to pension those men. Now, it is, of course, not my business to offer an amendment to carry out the wishes of the committee. I have not the time to sit down and draft the amendment. As I understand it, that is the attitude of the committee——

Mr. KEATING. No; that is not the attitude of the committee——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two lines. Mr. Chairman, I think this is a meritorious measure, and it may be that there is some ambiguity about what it means, but whether there is or not I do not believe there ought to be any question that the man who volunteered to serve his country during the Spanish-American War, whether in the Regular Establishment or in the Volunteer Service, should be taken care of. A good many men who went into this war went into the war because they thought the honor of the Nation was at stake, because they were in favor of relieving the iniquities that existed as between Spain and Cuba, and they offered everything they had when they offered their lives to their country, and whether they offered them through the Regular Establishment or through the Volunteer Establishment makes no difference. A great many men preferred to go into the Regular Establishment, because they believed they would get more active service there than in the Volunteer Service, and merely because they were in the Regular Establishment ought not to be a reason now to deprive their widows of the benefits of the legislation which is pending before the House. Whether the number of men engaged in that war through the Regular Establishment was 25,000 or 125,000, ought not to make any difference. The whole question that is involved here is, Is there any merit in the bill? Is the subject on which we are about to legislate one on which we ought to legislate? That is the question with me, not whether a man was in a Volunteer regiment or in a Regular regiment, but was he in the service, the result of which entitled his widow to consideration at the hands of the Congress of the United States. That is the whole question that is involved, and it seems to me there ought not to be any cheeseparing on this proposition. We ought to give the broadest latitude, and we ought to legislate so as to take in every person who was engaged in the war.

Mr. MOORE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I will.

Mr. MOORE. Is it possible anyone could have enlisted between April 21, 1898, and July 4, 1902, a period of four years, who did not enlist for the war?

Mr. MADDEN. Most of them enlisted for a period of three years, and all the men who enlisted in the Regular branch of the service enlisted for a period of three years, and during that period most, if not all, the men who so enlisted saw service outside of continental America.

Mr. MOORE. Well, the gentleman from Virginia has indicated that a large number of men, approximating 25,000, enlisted at a time when they might not have enlisted for service either in the War with Spain or the Philippine insurrection or for the Boxer trouble.

Mr. HAY. A large number enlisted in the Coast Artillery, and they did not intend to go outside of the country at all.

Mr. MADDEN. If these men were not engaged in either of the services enumerated in the bill, they would not be included in the benefits provided by the bill.

Mr. MOORE. That is what I wanted to have explained.

Mr. HAY. Yet, under the committee amendment, it is all who enlisted between certain dates.

Mr. MOORE. For any purpose?

Mr. HAY. For any purpose.

Mr. MADDEN. It is altogether likely that all men within the period that is borne in this bill——

Mr. MOORE. Four years.

Mr. MADDEN. Were sent out of continental America within that time.

Mr. MOORE. Do I understand the gentleman to argue that a man who did not enlist for war service whether in the Philippines or China is to be entitled to a war pension?

Mr. MADDEN. The man who enlisted between the periods mentioned in this bill, or nearly all, undoubtedly saw service.

Mr. HAY. How about the man who enlisted after February 2, 1901. Do you think that all of them saw service in the Philippines?

Mr. MADDEN. It may be not all of them saw service there.

Mr. HAY. That is what I wanted to find out.

Mr. WILLIS. Why is that date specified?

Mr. HAY. Because that is the date Congress authorized the increase in the Army up to 100,000 men.

Mr. MADDEN. The increase in the Army, however, was authorized on account of the war, was it not?

Mr. HAY. No; I think not. I think at that time there was no war anywhere except in the Philippines. That was the peace Army, and that number was fixed not because of their being any war then existing, but because it was thought that that was the number of men the United States ought to have in its Army during a time of peace.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment to perfect the text.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Illinois that there is a committee amendment pending.

Mr. MANN. The committee amendment is to strike out a portion of the text, and I offer a preferential motion to perfect the text.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 7, after the word "insurrection," insert the words "or in China."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, that suggestion was made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] as possibly solving the proposition. Of course this amendment should not prevail unless it is the intention to defeat the committee amendment. The committee amendment is to strike out the language "during the War with Spain or the Philippine insurrection." If this amendment should be agreed to, and the committee amendment should be disagreed to, then the language that would remain in the bill would be "during the War with Spain or the Philippine insurrection, or in China," between the dates named.

Mr. ANSBERRY. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. ANSBERRY. Then that would leave this bill in this position: The dates have already been officially declared between which the Spanish War occurred, I think. Now, then, it would put it back to a construction as to who fought that war. Is that correct?

Mr. MANN. I will not undertake to say what the construction would be. If you want it to be absolutely plain that it should be only those who served during the War with Spain, the language ought to be changed from "during" to "in." This would cover the point for which the committee offered the amendment. Or strike out the language in the bill, because the language which I have indicated in the amendment would cover the Boxer insurrection if it came within the dates mentioned in the bill.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I will say the committee is willing to withdraw the committee amendment. Therefore I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the committee amendment and accept the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. If the Committee of the Whole should agree to the amendment which has been offered, of course the same committee would disagree to the committee amendment.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Exactly.

Mr. MANN. The same question is involved.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I really think we ought to have more certain information about what this bill is going to do before we are asked to vote on it. Therefore I move that the committee do now rise and report this bill to the House with the recommendation that it be recommitted to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, I do not think the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] is entitled to the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognized the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. I yield the floor.

Mr. GARDNER. The motion of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] is not in order.

Mr. HAY. Why not?

Mr. GARDNER. Because the rules say the bill must be read for amendment.

Mr. HAY. That does not preclude a motion to rise with a recommendation to recommit.

Mr. MANN. Oh, yes. The gentleman can not make the motion. He can move to strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. HAY. I know I can. But why can not this committee recommend to the House like any other committee?

Mr. GARDNER. You can, if you read the bill.

Mr. ANSBERRY. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. HAY. Certainly.

Mr. ANSBERRY. The gentleman stated that in the Army at the beginning of the Spanish War were 25,000 men, but I think the gentleman is mistaken in that. I think it was 50,000 men.

Mr. HAY. Oh, no. I know that before the Spanish War the authorized Army was 30,000, and we never had more than 25,000 men before the Spanish War.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. McKENZIE].

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, this bill perhaps might be perfected by amendment as to details, but whether it is so amended I expect to support it. I do not believe in being too technical on pension legislation. I agree with the old veteran from Ohio, Gen. SHERWOOD, that when the Pension Commissioner construed the Sherwood Act in the manner in which he did he did a great injustice to the men who preserved our country. [Applause.] It is an easy matter to talk about war. Anyone can talk about war, and it is a glorious thing to think about, but when it comes it is, as Gen. Sherman said, hell. And I have always felt when men really faced hell on the battle field and disease in camp that they and those who were afterwards dependent upon them should be the special wards of the Government. [Applause.]

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKENZIE. I have only five minutes.

Mr. GORDON. This bill does not grant any pension to anybody that faced hell on the battle field. [Laughter.]

Mr. McKENZIE. I want to say to my distinguished friend from Ohio [Mr. GORDON] that the germ of typhoid fever or malaria may be just as deadly as the shot from a cannon's mouth. And while these boys did not have much service to render, they did not know when they enlisted but that they would have, and they went willingly and faced disease and all the dangers incident to their service. They showed their good will; and this bill provides for pensions for their widows.

I want to say that I am directly interested in that, because in my home county I know of one widow who is dependent and who can not get a pension because she can not prove that her soldier husband contracted in the service the disease from which he died.

I want to say another thing—that in my judgment this Government has never done entire and perfect justice to the real widows of the soldiers of the Union Army, for, in my judgment, the woman who was the wife of a soldier when he went to the front suffered more than the soldier did during that service, because he had his companions, had all the glamor and glory of the Army and the excitement of the battle field to cheer him up and keep his mind off his troubles, but the wife at home, with her little ones, with the thought ever on her mind that she might at any moment hear of the death of her husband, endured, in my judgment, a distress more trying and greater suffering.

Mr. SHARP. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. McKENZIE. I do.

Mr. SHARP. I am sorry to interrupt the gentleman's oratory.

Mr. McKENZIE. Oh, do not be afraid of that.

Mr. SHARP. Does not the gentleman think that the sympathy that all would feel in such a case should be extended to the wife who had not married the soldier for 10 years after the war closed?

Mr. McKENZIE. No; not to such a great extent. But I do believe that the women who were the wives of soldiers while fighting the battles of our country are entitled to as much pension as the soldier who fought the battle, and I would like to see the law so amended as to make this possible. I think it would be no more than simple justice to them. [Applause.]

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, on behalf of the committee I would like to make a brief statement showing how the bill will stand if the Mann amendment is adopted and the committee amendment is rejected. You will then have the Crago bill just as it passed this House in the last Congress, with the addition that the widows and children of the soldiers who served in the Boxer insurrection will be given a pensionable status. The House debated that bill and passed it during the last Congress. It met with the approval of this House by an overwhelming majority, and I can not understand why the House should not reaffirm that action now.

Mr. SUMNERS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLINE. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEATING. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING] takes his seat I would like to ask him whether, in view of the question that has arisen about this four years' period, the committee would be willing to consider the substitution of the word "in" for the word "during," in line 6, so that this would apply to the man who served in the actual war period?

Mr. KEATING. What does the gentleman mean by the war period of service?

Mr. MOORE. The period from the time that hostilities opened until they were officially closed, which I understand to be between the dates of April 21, 1898, and July 4, 1902.

Mr. KEATING. Yes. Still, those dates would remain in the bill.

Mr. MOORE. Of course. I am trying to get the gentleman to explain whether it is really the purpose of the committee to grant a pension to the widow of every man who enlisted in the service for any purpose, between April 21, 1898, and July 4, 1902, a period of more than four years.

Mr. KEATING. It was the purpose of the committee to grant a pension to the widow or dependent children of the soldiers who served in the War with Spain, the Philippine insurrection, and the Boxer insurrection. On that point we have here a letter from the Secretary of the Interior. You will find it in the report on this bill. He states in that letter:

> I am informed by the Commissioner of Pensions that in the consideration of claims filed on account of service in the War with Spain and the Philippine insurrection, April 21, 1898, has been accepted as the date of commencement of the War with Spain, and July 4, 1902, as the date of the termination of the Philippine insurrection.

Now, it is quite impossible to differentiate between the men who garrisoned the fortifications in this country during that period——

Mr. MOORE. Does the gentleman want to pension those? That is what I am trying to get at, and that is what I believe is in the minds of the Members in connection with the contention of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY].

Mr. KEATING. If you exclude those, would you not exclude also the volunteers who did not succeed in getting into action?

Mr. MOORE. Those whom we want to pension are the widows of the men who did the work, the fighting men.

Mr. KEATING. Who did work?

Mr. MOORE. Yes. That is the question.

Mr. KEATING. When you raised an army, you sent a portion of it into camp at Chickamauga, and you sent another portion of it to the Philippines, and another portion was assigned to the fortifications, and another portion was sent to Cuba. How can you differentiate?

Mr. MOORE. Were not these men enlisted in the War with Spain, or in the Philippine insurrection, or in the Boxer insurrection?

Mr. KEATING. Every man in the United States Army between these dates served in that war.

Mr. MOORE. If they were in it, let us pension their dependent widows. But if the contention of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] is correct that 25,000 men enlisted who may not have been in the War with Spain or in the Philippine insurrection or in the Boxer insurrection, then you may be adding a very large number of men to the fighting men, who perhaps might not be entitled to the same consideration. Our pensions should apply to the man who went to the front or who enlisted for the purpose of fighting.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING] has expired.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, I ask for 5 minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING] asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KEATING. The point I wish to make, Mr. Chairman, is this: I do not see how the gentleman is to differentiate between the two classes of service. The gentleman says he wants to pension the men who enlisted for the purpose of fighting. Why was this army increased? Why did these men enlist—the men referred to by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY]? They did not enlist to play croquet. They enlisted for the purpose of going to the Philippines or going to any place they were ordered. A state of war existed at that time. Gentlemen may question that statement, and I do not know anything about the facts. But the Pension Office says that a state of war did exist. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] says the men did not enlist for the purpose of fighting, but the Pension Office says that a state of war existed at that time, and if a state of war did exist it is to be presumed that those men enlisted for the purpose of fighting in that war.

Mr. HAY. I did not say that they did not enlist for the purpose of fighting. Of course if a man enlists in the Regular Army he enlists to do whatever he is ordered to do.

Mr. KEATING. Those men enlisted in the Regular Army at a time when a state of war existed.

Mr. MOORE. The gentleman answers my question to this extent: He assumes that the committee believed the men who enlisted within the dates mentioned enlisted with the expectation of being called on for the Spanish War service, which may pertain to the war in Cuba and Porto Rico or the service leading up to it, the war in the Philippines, or the insurrection in China.

Mr. KEATING. Yes.

Mr. MOORE. The gentleman makes the statement, then, that the men who enlisted during the period between April 21, 1898, and July 4, 1902, did actually enlist for service, if called upon, in the War with Spain, the Philippine insurrection, or the Boxer insurrection?

Mr. KEATING. Yes.

Mr. CLINE. If it is the understanding of the committee that all the men were actually in the service at that time, what is the purpose in setting out that the only persons to receive the benefits of this bill shall be those who engaged in the War with Spain, the Philippine insurrection, or the Boxer insurrection? What is the purpose of setting out those three services if all the persons who served between the dates set out by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] are to have the benefits of this act?

Mr. KEATING. I do not know. I will be frank with the gentleman and state that personally I do not see what you gain by this amendment. I think the committee were right when they struck out those words. In agreeing to accept the amendment I personally did so merely to satisfy the objection of the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. CLINE. May I ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] a question?

Mr. KEATING. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana for the purpose of asking the gentleman from Illinois a question.

Mr. CLINE. I want to ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] whether in offering his amendment it was his understanding that he was limiting the benefits of this act to those who were actually engaged in the Spanish War, the Philippine insurrection, or the Boxer rebellion outside of the limits of the United States?

Mr. MANN. I did not so understand it.

Mr. ADAIR. According to the statement of the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING] this applies only to soldiers serving in the Regular Army between the dates mentioned in this bill.

Mr. KEATING. No; Regular or Volunteer.

Mr. ADAIR. Regular or Volunteer; but it does not state here that they must have enlisted between the dates mentioned—April 21, 1898, and July 4, 1902.

Mr. KEATING. It provides that they must have served between those dates.

Mr. ADAIR. That they must have served between those dates. But a soldier in the Regular Army who enlisted prior to that date will come under the provisions of this bill. It applies to him just the same?

Mr. KEATING. Yes; and that was the purpose of it, because, as a matter of fact, those veteran Regulars were the men who put the backbone into our Volunteers in the early part of that service.

Mr. HAY. Every soldier who served 90 days before the 4th of July, 1902.

Mr. LANGLEY. The bill says that in so many words.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. I should like to make just one observation. In pensioning the Civil War veterans anyone who served

90 days and has an honorable discharge is entitled to a pension. It does not make a particle of difference whether that soldier was on guard at the United States Treasury here in Washington or whether he was a thousand miles from the seat of conflict, he is entitled to a pension just as much as the men who were right on the firing line; and as I view this I can not see why a man who was in the Regular Army, who enlisted for that service, even if the Government saw fit to station him up in Alaska, was any less in the service of the United States, and I can not see why his widow should be denied the right to a pension under this bill. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word of the Mann amendment. It seems to me that if the committee would accept the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and would agree to have the committee amendment voted down, that would clarify the whole situation.

Mr. KEATING. We have agreed to that.

Mr. MANN. They have so indicated.

Mr. KEATING. We will be very glad to agree to that.

Mr. WILLIS. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. BATHRICK. Will the gentleman yield to me to allow me to ask a question?

Mr. KEATING. I have agreed to yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS].

Mr. SUMNERS. I have been trying to get recognition for 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. SUMNERS. Mr. Chairman, under this bill it is proposed to pension the widows and children of every man who enlisted in the Army or Navy during the period of seven years and four months, regardless of whether he saw service or not. I believe it is right to protect the families of the men who fight to preserve the Union, and who defend it against its foes, but it is also incumbent upon the Congress carefully to prevent the extension of the munificence of the Government to those who ought not to receive it. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that under this bill all the men who enlisted in the Federal Army for three years preceding the beginning of hostilities, with the exception of the first 90 days of those three years, are entitled to receive a pension, whether they served one day in any war or not.

Now, I want to ask the chairman of the committee if it is the purpose to pension all the people who enlisted in the Army and Navy of the United States during the three years preceding the war, with the exception of the first 90 days, regardless of whether they enlisted for fighting in that war or not?

Mr. KEATING. It is the purpose of the committee to pension the widows and children of any man who served 90 days in the War with Spain, the Philippine insurrection, or the Boxer uprising.

Mr. SUMNERS. Regardless of whether they had any service in the war or not?

Mr. KEATING. If they served 90 days in this war. No pension legislation in this country has attempted to differentiate between the man who got into the fight and the man who was ready to get into the fight.

Mr. SUMNERS. Upon what theory are you giving a pension to the widow of the man who enlisted prior to the beginning of the war, and happened to be caught and forced to remain in service, but who saw no actual service?

Mr. KEATING. On the basis of his hard luck, I suppose. [Laughter.]

Mr. SUMNERS. He had no hard luck, for he went on drawing his pay and stayed in this country.

Mr. KEATING. We are following the precedent set by all pension legislation during our entire history.

Mr. SUMNERS. You have arbitrarily fixed the dates and given a pension to the widow and children of men who were in the service between those dates, but the widow of the soldier in the Philippines who dies to-day gets no pension.

Mr. KEATING. We took the dates fixed by the Bureau of Pensions.

Mr. SUMNERS. Is it not a fact that under the proposed bill you are dealing with the War with Spain, the Philippines, and the Boxer uprising, and under this legislation if a woman becomes the widow of a soldier now in the Philippines, she will get no pension unless she can show that he died of disease contracted there; whereas the widow of the man who was caught in the service and who did not go anywhere, but stayed at home in America, gets a pension?

Mr. KEATING. The gentleman might point out similar inequalities with every piece of pension legislation that has ever been enacted in this country.

Mr. SUMNERS. Does not the gentleman think that it is possible to begin to write pension bills so as to make them just?

Mr. KEATING. I think our pension legislation is based on that foundation; but, of course, we can not attain exact justice in all cases.

Mr. SUMNERS. Does the gentleman think it is just pension legislation to give a pension to the widow of a man caught in the service and who did not intend to fight?

Mr. KEATING. If he enlisted, he enlisted to fight if it became necessary.

Mr. SUMNERS. We had not had a war for a long time, and when he enlisted he did not expect to get caught.

Mr. KEATING. I submit that the gentleman from Texas is not in a position to testify as to what was in the soldier's mind when he enlisted.

Mr. LOFT. Mr. Chairman, the legislation proposed in the measure before the House is based upon justice, equity, and patriotism. Its enactment into law will prove that republics are not always ungrateful. And no men ever won the gratitude of a nation by their gallantry, their courage, and their patriotism more justly than did the brave lads who sacrificed their all in the Spanish-American War.

The hardships they endured, the sufferings they encountered, the sacrifices they made have justly won for them every mark of honor and every tribute of respect that a grateful country can bestow upon them. No pecuniary reward, however generous, no pension system, however liberal, can adequately compensate the gallant young fellows whose lives were wrecked and health ruined by the tropical diseases they contracted in the service of their country. Many a young life to-day is rendered hopelessly miserable by ill health contracted in the service, for which there can be no relief under the archaic pension laws that now burden our statute books.

Under these laws worthy cases can not be reached, meritorious claims can not be honored. There thus arises an imperative necessity for the enactment of legislation, such as is proposed in the pending bill. It provides for the soldier, the widow, and the orphan who are now beyond the operation of existing laws, and whose claims, based upon the intrinsic merit of their cause, are as justly entitled to consideration as those already provided for by law.

This bill should pass as an act of justice and equity. Its passage will show that the Republic is grateful to her gallant sons who made sacrifices for her sake; and above all it will demonstrate to future generations that the patriotic sons who immolate themselves upon the altars of their country will not have died in vain; that those who are near and dear to them will not have been doomed to distress and poverty; and that this generosity of the Republic will have been granted not as a gratuity, not as charity, but as a badge of honor to those to whom honor is due.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on the pending amendment and amendments thereto cease in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that all debate on the pending amendment and amendments thereto be limited to 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BATHRICK. Mr. Chairman, I have been trying for some time to ask the gentleman from Colorado a question. I am for this bill, but I want to ask this question: In lines 9 and 10 it says, and the language is italicized, "service to be computed from date of enlistment to date of discharge, including all furloughs." Suppose a soldier had enlisted within the last 30 days of this period between April 21, 1898, and July 4, 1902, he would not have served 90 days, and yet he might have been in several battles and would not come under the provisions of the bill. Is not that so?

Mr. KEATING. Yes; that is true, and that would undoubtedly be a great injustice to that soldier, but we have to draw the line somewhere, and so we made it a service of 90 days. But I want to say to the gentleman that if the soldier was injured during that 30 days' service, either by being wounded or by contracting a disease, he could be pensioned, or his wife could be pensioned.

Mr. BATHRICK. Under the present law?

Mr. KEATING. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Is it the purpose of the committee to pension the widows and dependent orphans of those who enlisted in the Regular Army in 1901 when the Regular Establishment was increased up to 100,000, and who did not during the term of enlistments serve in the Philippine insurrection or the War with Spain, the Boxer uprising having at that time closed? I want to say if it is the intention to exclude them, it occurs to me that he ought to substitute the word "in" for the word "during," and then vote the committee amendment down. That would pension the widows and dependent orphans of all soldiers, Regular and Volunteer, who served in the War with Spain, the Philippine insurrection, or the Boxer uprising between those dates.

Mr. KEATING. Let me ask the gentleman a question. How would that affect the man who volunteered for service in the war, but who remained in camp in this country?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. His widow and dependent children would be pensioned the same. The man who volunteered and who was in the Regular Army during the War with Spain but was in this country, I think, would be entitled to a pension.

Mr. KEATING. Does the gentleman understand that in case a man enlisted in the Regular Army he would not be entitled to a pension under this plan, but that if he enlisted in the Volunteer Army he would be?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I do not want it to be that way; I think he ought to get a pension in any event. If the purpose of the committee is to exclude a man who volunteered in the Regular Army after all the wars were over——

Mr. KEATING. All the wars were not over.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. All except the Philippine insurrection. If he served in the Philippine insurrection, he ought to be pensioned. I do not say that the others ought not to be pensioned.

But if it is the intention or desire of the committee to exclude them, it occurs to me that the language would not exclude them. In other words, a man who volunteered in 1901 in the Regular Establishment, who did not go to the Philippine Islands, would probably be construed as not having served in the Philippine insurrection. Does the gentleman catch the point?

Mr. KEATING. Yes; I see the point; and I think it is a dangerous one.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. It is just a question of what the intention of the committee was. Is it the intention of the committee that the widows and dependent children of these men who enlisted in the Regular Army in 1901 and who did not go to the Philippines should receive a pension along with the others?

Mr. KEATING. Yes; that would be the effect of this bill.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Undoubtedly it would be the effect of it, if that was the intention of the committee.

Mr. KEATING. That was the intention of the committee.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, there is one question that I would like to ask the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY]. I was not present when he made his remarks. He referred to some of these soldiers whose widows and dependent children would be pensioned, who enlisted in the Coast Artillery?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Of course they saw no service?

Mr. HAY. No.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Did those who enlisted in the Coast Artillery in any other war in the past receive pensions or their widows receive pensions?

Mr. HAY. I do not think we had a system of coast artillery during the Civil War.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Those in the Coast Artillery never have fired a gun at anyone?

Mr. HAY. No.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. And, I hope, never will.

Mr. HAY. I hope not.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Of course if an enemy wanted to land, he would go somewhere else than in front of the coast artillery, so that while the Coast Artillery is a necessary branch of our service, I anticipate that no enemy is ever going up against it.

Mr. HAY. Those men who enlisted in the Quartermaster's Corps are entitled to pensions also. They are enlisted men.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Yes; but they are not subjected to all of the hardships and dangers of war.

Mr. ADAIR. Mr. Chairman, in view of some statements I made in relation to this matter, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, in order that I may not be misunderstood.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question before the committee is the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

There was no objection, and the Clerk again reported the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that amendment can not be pending or voted upon until the committee amendment is acted upon.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that the point of order is not well taken. The Chair considers it a preferential amendment to perfect the text. The point of order is overruled. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I now ask unanimous consent to withdraw the first committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to withdraw the first committee amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the second committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Lines 9 and 10, after the word "inclusive," insert the words "service to be computed from date of enlistment to date of discharge, including all furloughs."

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Ohio a question. The gentleman from Ohio, Gen. SHERWOOD, a few moments ago said that this was not in the law which provided pensions for widows and dependent children of veterans of any other war. Is that true?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. I think that is true.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Can the gentleman give some reason why it should be put in this law, if it is not in the others?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I will endeavor to explain to the gentleman as best I can why we inserted this paragraph in this bill. In the first place, any soldier who might have been furloughed home was furloughed home because the Government was not in a position to take care of him in camp; that is, the surroundings and sanitary conditions were bad, or for any cause no longer desired his services. They were furloughed home against their will in a good many instances. Some 3,500 of them were furloughed home.

Mr. ANSBERRY. Four thousand three hundred.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. About 3,500 of these men were furloughed home against their will; to be exact, 3,413 officers and men. After they arrived home it was some 30 or 40 or 50 days before they were mustered out. These men were under military control, they were subject to call at any time, they were drawing their pay, and we contend and felt that if these men were under military control, being subject to court-martial if they left, the Pension Department, in computing that time, should compute the time they were furloughed home.

With reference to the distinction between the soldiers of the Civil War who actually had less than 90 days' service the conditions were different, because those in the Civil War enlisted for a period of 90 days, and they refused to enlist for a longer period of time, whereas the soldiers who enlisted in this war enlisted for a period of 3 years, or during the entire war.

Mr. MOORE. This provision was not in the former bill, the bill known as the Crago bill?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. No.

Mr. MOORE. Otherwise this bill is substantially the same, is it not?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Substantially the same, outside of that one provision.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the second committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will lay before the committee the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. POST].

Insert after the word "widow," in line 2, page 2, the words "who married such soldier prior to July 4, 1904."

And by striking out of lines 20, 21, and 22 the following language:

"Provided further, That said widow shall have married said officer or enlisted man previous to the passage of this act."

Mr. POST. Mr. Chairman, I think that this amendment ought to prevail. The object of the amendment is to limit the pensions extended by the bill to those widows who were wives of soldiers either during the period of any of the wars stipulated in the bill or for two years after that time. The bill as it now stands with the provision contained in lines 20, 21, and 22 would grant pensions to any widow of any soldier of any of the wars who had married the soldier from the close of those wars at any time up to the passage of this act and its signature by the President of the United States. I call the attention of the committee to the fact that this bill is a most drastic bill. This bill gives to the widows of the soldiers of those three wars a pension at the rate of $12 per month. The policy of our Government up until 1890 was to grant pensions to widows of soldiers of the Civil War, a soldier who had died from wounds received or disabilities incurred while in the line of duty. The policy of our Government was to pension widows up until 1886 at the rate of only $8 per month.

Mr. RUSSELL. 1908.

Mr. POST. Up to 1908. After that it was increased to $12 per month. Now, I can see no reason why an exception should be made in this legislation. I see no reason why any woman who would marry a soldier of either the three wars to-day, and the soldier should die immediately after the passage of that act, that that woman should be pensioned.

Mr. TALCOTT of New York. Do I understand the gentleman to say the law of 1890 to which he referred fixed a widow's pension at $12 a month?

Mr. POST. The law of 1908 fixes it at $12 a month.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. POST. Yes, sir.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. The date fixed by the gentleman's amendment is 1904.

Mr. POST. Yes, sir.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Two years after the last of these wars was concluded?

Mr. POST. Yes, sir.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Can the gentleman give any better reason for pensioning a widow of a man who married in two years after the war than the widow of a man who married 15 years afterwards?

Mr. POST. Yes; there is a great deal of difference between the two.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I fail to understand it.

Mr. POST. The woman who married a soldier immediately after the close of the war has lived with him and helped take care of him probably in disability and things of that kind. That is the reason for the limitation. I will say to the gentleman from Mississippi that if I had my way I would follow the early policy of pension legislation, limiting it to the close of the war.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. If the gentleman will yield again. The gentleman understands the average age of soldiers who participated in this war now is about 37 years, so that those who marry a soldier up to date would have plenty of opportunity to share the hardships and trials of that state.

Mr. POST. I understand that exactly.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I can not see the force of the gentleman's preference for 1904 over 1914.

Mr. POST. Simply for the reason I stated. I now yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEY].

Mr. KEY of Ohio. The gentleman from Mississippi asked practically the same question I intended to ask.

Mr. POST. Mr. Chairman, as I said a moment ago this is a most drastic bill. It is not in line with previous pension legislation in this House, and I think that this amendment ought to prevail.

Mr. SHARP. Mr. Chairman, I am heartily in favor of the amendment proposed by my colleague from Ohio [Mr. POST]. I think my attitude as to pension legislation has been pretty well known upon this floor since I have been a Member as being in favor of soldiers and their widows. I have consistently voted for all just legislation of that kind and I have no apology to make for so doing. But when the distinguished gentleman from Ohio, who fought in the Civil War with such a splendid record, my colleague, Gen. SHERWOOD, has taken the floor himself and found objections to and injustices in this bill, I do not think I can be accused of any lack of patriotism or interest in the soldiers of the country when I favor this amendment. Unfortunately it sometimes happens that one can not well or effectually protest against the passage of a bill containing a right principle, as this bill does, without voting against it; so that, while I am in favor of the principle of the bill—that of a better recognition of the widows of these soldiers—yet I must either declare myself in opposition to the whole bill or vote for some feature in it that does not meet with my favor. Rather than see the bill defeated, I shall follow the latter course.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHARP. I will.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. I would just like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions if he believes that the widows of Spanish War veterans are faring better than the widows of Civil War veterans? If he is so solicitous of their interest, why does not the gentleman draw up a bill and seek to remedy that evil? [Applause.] Why does he now seek to load down this bill with amendments because there happens to be certain bars to title to pension of certain widows of Civil War veterans? I, personally, will be glad to vote for such a bill, should the gentleman introduce one from his committee.

This committee would gladly have embodied that kind of a provision in this bill if it had the right to do so.

Mr. MURDOCK. But the gentleman does feel that the amendment is likely to be offered in the Senate?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. We have nothing to do with that. In the Senate there is only one Pension Committee, and they have jurisdiction and vote on the Civil War pensions and Spanish War pensions, but in the House there are two committees.

Mr. SHARP. Mr. Chairman, I did not yield the floor for a joint discussion between the gentlemen.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHARP] let me say that we are all praying the Senate will adopt that amendment?

Mr. SHARP. Unfortunately, my colleague from Ohio [Mr. KEY] has addressed his questions to the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions [Mr. SHERWOOD] and not myself, and so it is for that gentleman to answer and not for me. There has been considerable emotion displayed here on the part of those who favor this bill out of sympathy for the sorrow and privations of the widow of the soldier who went to the front. I share in that sympathy, and I am willing to go a long way to give such a widow a pension; but it requires no argument on my part to point out the fallacy of such an appeal when a pension under the provisions of this bill may be allowed to women who at the time of that war, doubtless in many cases, were mere schoolgirls of 10 or 12 years of age, for the widow of a soldier married to him at any time within 12 years after the war ended, substantially, may receive a pension under the provisions of this bill. So, Mr. Chairman, in the interest of justice and in the interest of the taxpayers of this country, who are my constituents quite as well as the soldiers of the Spanish War, I am in favor of this amendment, and I hope it may be adopted. [Applause.]

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, yes, I am opposed to an amendment limiting marriage to a date prior to that provided for in the pending bill.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman is opposed to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. POST]?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman is going to vote against it?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Yes.

Mr. SHARP. May I ask the gentleman from Ohio a question?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Yes.

Mr. SHARP. You speak of loading down the bill. Do you mean loading it down with amendments or loading it down with financial burdens? This amendment would result in reducing very much the annual expenditure, and so it could not load it down in that sense.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. I meant the loading of it down with amendments.

Mr. AUSTIN. May I ask what is contained in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. POST]?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee ask that the amendment be again reported?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield the floor in order to have it read.

The CHAIRMAN. If there is no objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. AUSTIN. I hope the amendment will be voted down. In answer to the gentleman's criticism about the difference carried in this bill for a widow's pension of $12 a month and the previous pension carried for the widow of a Civil War veteran of $8 per month let me call his attention to the fact of the difference in the cost of living now and at the time when the $8 pension was in force. There is certainly a difference of $4 in the actual purchase price of necessities that the widow of the soldier would have to purchase with this pension. It is not any argument against this proposed pension of $12, because living was cheaper then, or because an American Congress did not appreciate, as this Congress appreciates, the services of a soldier or the necessities of the widow and orphan children of a soldier. A great deal has been said in this discussion and a criticism drawn against this bill because it is more favorable in some features than the existing law, or previous law, as it affected the interest of the soldiers of the Civil War or their widows. That is not any argument against the merits of this proposition, but it is an indorsement of the action of this committee in that it appreciated, and it was just enough to bring up that standard and not fall into the error for which we are now criticizing our predecessors—failing to give the widows of the Civil War a good pension or a fair pension. Let the Committee on Invalid Pensions, through its honored chairman, bring in a bill here, if there is any discrimination or if there is any failure or lack of justice in existing law, and take heed and follow the patriotic example of the Committee on Pensions in dealing with this legislation, and come in here with a bill that will equalize and meet the criticisms made in reference to this matter. [Applause.]

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. AUSTIN. I will.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman state what justification or excuse there is for a young woman who marries to-day a man who was in the Regular or Volunteer Army of the United States between 1898 and 1902 for receiving a pension as long as she lives as the result of that war?

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, this bill does not propose to do what the gentleman states.

Mr. GORDON. It does just that.

Mr. AUSTIN. No; I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. GORDON. I will ask the chairman of the committee if it does not. I have read this bill. It does just that.

Mr. AUSTIN. I think we can all read, and if the gentleman is a poor reader or faulty interpreter of the English language, that is his misfortune, Mr. Chairman, and not ours.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to offer an amendment to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. POST], changing the date from 1904 to 1910.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment to the amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the figures "1904" and insert in lieu thereof "1910."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. GOULDEN].

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington is recognized.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I believe I am as patriotic as any of my colleagues in this House. Unfortunately, I am not a Spanish-American War veteran, but I believe you will agree that is not my fault. I resided at Lake Charles, La., the place of my birth, when the war broke out. I enlisted with the first troops, and our company went down to New Orleans, but when the Army surgeon got hold of me he was dissatisfied with the quality of my eyesight. [Laughter.] And so he would not allow me to serve. He was afraid I would not be able to defend myself against the pests round about Miami, Fla.

Mr. GORDON. Were you enlisted for 90 days?

Mr. BRYAN. No; I was in the service about two weeks. It is not necessary for me to draw upon my patriotism, however, to be able to say that I am friendly to this bill and will support it.

Some of you gentlemen who are opposed to giving destitute women and mothers, whether of veterans or not, a pension or some other kind of support in order that they may be able to live without becoming objects of charity ought to move out to some of the Western States, to the State of Washington, for instance—not necessarily to stay, but come out for a visit [laughter]—and observe the laws that we have in reference to destitute women. Out there the women vote and help to make the laws. The laws are not all passed for the benefit of men, but the women get some consideration in the statutes.

The people of my State all share in the privileges and responsibilities of enacting law. The women give their advice from the standpoint of a constituency conferring with their representatives. In other words, they are considered not only from the standpoint of chivalry, but of equality. As a result the statutes are enacted with a thought of the home, because the home is the natural sphere of woman. It comes as natural for women voters to look out for the home as it does for brewery voters to look out for the brewery. This is why the women should vote, because the home is her sphere and the home needs representation.

So, very soon after women were recognized as citizens in my State, there was enacted a statute for mothers' pensions. The men had voted since statehood, and there were thousands of bills introduced about the breweries, but never a legislative thought was given to mothers; perhaps I should correct that; I believe man chivalry took some steps to stimulate the beautifying of well-dressed men on mothers' day with a white flower in the lapel of the manly coat.

But the women voters took care of mother in a more substantial way, and, strange as it may seem, these women, whose sphere is the home, also took care of the children while they were at it. Here is the kind of a white rose with which they honored motherhood and childhood:

WASHINGTON'S MOTHERS' PENSION LAW.

SECTION 1. In every county it shall be the duty of the county commissioners to provide, out of the moneys of the county treasury, an amount sufficient to meet the purposes of this law for the support of women whose husbands are dead or are inmates of a penal institution or an insane asylum, or who are abandoned by their husbands and such abandonment has continued for more than one year, or because of total disability of their husbands, and who are unable to support their children, when such women are destitute and are mothers of children under the age of 15 years and such mothers and children reside in such counties.

SEC. 2. The allowance for each of such women shall not exceed $15 per month when she has but one child under the age of 15 years; and if she has more than one child under the age of 15 years, it shall not exceed the sum of $15 a month for the first child and $5 a month for each of the children under the age of 15 years.

The remaining sections provide the details of enforcement. This law, you will observe, provides that a woman who is the mother of children, or has been abandoned by her husband, or her husband is in prison, if destitute, receives a compensation of $15 a month if she has only one child and $5 each for any other children she may have. [Applause.] It is not necessary in the State of Washington that a mother prove that she served the country or that her husband served the country for 90 days or longer or that he followed the flag to martial music. Is not bearing children—bearing armies for the Republic—as great a service as bearing arms? It is only necessary for her to establish the fact that she is destitute and that her destitution comes within the terms of destitution as provided in that law. Then she obtains this allowance out of the public funds. If her husband is too worthless to fight, has deserted her, or is in the penitentiary, so much more the reason why she should have the care of the State.

Mr. SUMNERS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRYAN. I will.

Mr. SUMNERS. Is the gentleman in favor of this bill because it pensions destitute women, irrespective of the fact that her husband served in the Army, or is the gentleman favoring it solely because of the fact that she is the widow of some soldier who served at one time in the Army?

Mr. BRYAN. I believe—and it is a policy of my State—that any woman who is destitute and who has children ought to be paid out of the public funds. I am for making society care for all indigent mothers. [Applause.] I am for pensions to the widows of veterans who need it, too.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRYAN. Certainly.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Does not the gentleman know that they have to prove that they are destitute in order to come under this bill?

Mr. BRYAN. They must prove that they have not more than $250 income.

Out there for a long time we permitted the children to be put to work. We had a debate here the other day which showed that in some of the States they put children to work in factories as young as 10 years of age, and it is common and ordinary for them to work in factories, especially in those States that so fearfully and piously abhor the thought of women having a voice in the making of law, up to the age of 14 and thereafter. We have an orphans' home and other institutions of that kind, but we discovered that it is just as cheap to let the mother—the woman responsible for the children—take care of the children out of the public funds, where the children can have the priceless boon of mother love, as it is to put them in some orphans' asylum or home. What is a marble front orphanage compared with a hut and mother love? We found the pension plan economical, and so with the aid of woman's counsel we adopted that kind of legislation.

I certainly should not oppose a statute here that would authorize the Federal Government to make payments to women—no doubt to a number in the State of Washington—which would perhaps result in relieving our State from a part of our financial burden. The truth is that it is a policy in line with humanity. It is a policy in line with decency and order; it is the progressive way to handle such cases, and for that reason I am in favor of the bill and am glad to support it. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. GOULDEN] to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. POST].

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. MURDOCK. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 13, noes 52.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. POST].

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. POST. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 35, noes 65.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill and amendments to the House with favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LINTHICUM, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 13044) to pension the widow and minor children of any officer or enlisted man who served in the War with Spain or the Philippine insurrection, had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Oh, no; not on the third reading.

Mr. MURDOCK. We did that yesterday, and it was no good. [Laughter.]

Mr. CALLAWAY. I withdraw my demand, Mr. Speaker.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. CALLAWAY. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. CALLAWAY] demands the yeas and nays.

Mr. DIES. I make the point that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The yeas and nays are demanded. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES] makes the point of no quorum. The Doorkeeper will lock the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 256, nays 74, answering "present" 5, not voting 96, as follows:

So the bill was passed.

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:

Until further notice:

Mr. POU with Mr. BARCHFELD.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland with Mr. GUERNSEY.

Mr. WEBB with Mr. CALDER.

Mr. SLAYDEN with Mr. CAMPBELL.

Mr. SIMS with Mr. KELLEY of Michigan.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD with Mr. PETERS of Maine.

Mr. MCANDREWS with Mr. SINNOTT.

Mr. LEVER with Mr. STEENERSON.

Mr. FINLEY with Mr. LINDQUIST.

Mr. DICKINSON with Mr. MONDELL.

Mr. COVINGTON with Mr. HINDS.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina with Mr. STAFFORD.

Mr. BLACKMON with Mr. WINSLOW.

For the balance of the day:

Mr. MAHER with Mr. PADGETT.

On this vote:

Mr. THOMAS (for pension bill) with Mr. BARKLEY (against).

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I answered "present" on the first roll call, but I understand that the gentleman with whom I am paired has voted, and I want to kill his vote by voting "no."

Mr. HUGHES of West Virginia. I voted "aye," but I am paired with the gentleman from Alabama, Mr. TAYLOR, and I desire to withdraw that vote and to be recorded "present."

Mr. BARKLEY. I voted "no." I am paired with the gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. THOMAS. I desire to withdraw the vote and to answer "present."

Mr. QUIN. I voted "no." I desire to withdraw that vote and to answer "present." I am paired with the gentleman from West Virginia, Mr. AVIS. If he were present, I would vote "no" and he would vote "aye."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present. The bill is passed. The Doorkeeper will unlock the doors.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend the title.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the title will be amended to conform to the text of the bill.

Mr. MANN. Let us have the title reported.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. I offer the following amendment to the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the title to read:

"A bill to pension widows and minor children of officers and enlisted men who served during the War with Spain or the Philippine insurrection or in China, between April 21, 1898, and July 4, 1902."

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Speaker, I think the words "and helpless" children ought to be included, as well as the minor children, and I suggest that if there be no objection the word "helpless" be included in the title. The bill itself covers helpless children.

The SPEAKER. If the Chair had any opinion about it, it would be that the suggestion is a good one.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. That will be accepted by the committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] asks unanimous consent to insert the words "and helpless" before the word "children" in the title. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The amendment to the title was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. KEY of Ohio, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

SENATE BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills and joint resolutions of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

S. 4943. An act to amend section 1 of an act of Congress approved April 9, 1912 (37 Stats., p. 80), entitled "An act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to secure for the United States title to patented lands in the Yosemite National Park, [illegible] 1 for other purposes"; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. ASHBROOK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 13612. An act making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1914 and for prior years, and for other purposes.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. ASHBROOK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following bills:

H. R. 2733. An act authorizing J. A. Matheny, of Colony, Wyo., to make homestead entry;

H. R. 4618. An act to increase the limit of cost for increased quarantine facilities at the port of Portland, Me.;

H. R. 1262. An act for the relief of Hugh P. Strong;

H. R. 11102. An act providing that the marriage of a homestead entryman to a homestead entrywoman shall not impair the right of either to a patent, after compliance with the law a year, to apply to existing entries; and

H. R. 8683. An act to authorize and direct the Secretary of the Treasury to relinquish the rights of the United States in and to a part of a certain alley in the city of Marshalltown, Iowa.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. THOMAS, indefinitely, on account of business.

To Mr. BORCHERS, for two weeks, on account of sickness in his family.

PENSIONS.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 10138, a pension bill, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title.

The Clerk read the title, as follows:

H. R. 10138. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of such soldiers and sailors of the Civil War.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill, of which the title has just been reported, disagree to all the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. RUSSELL, Mr. ADAIR, and Mr. LANGHAM.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, April 2, 1914, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of Labor, submitting an item of appropriation to be inserted in the sundry civil appropriation bill, authorizing the Secretary of Labor to execute a lease for office quarters for the United States Immigration Service at Montreal, Canada, for a period of four years, beginning July 1, 1914, at a rental not exceeding $4,500 per annum (H. Doc. No. 874); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Acting Secretary of War submitting an estimate of appropriation in the sum of $15,000 for the reconstruction of a bridge across Weymouth Back River, in the town of Hingham, Mass. (H. Doc. No. 875); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

3. A letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting report of survey and investigation by experimental tests of coal in Aaska for use on board ships of the United States Navy, and upon coal and coal fields available for said purpose (H. SENATE.

THURSDAY, April 2, 1914.

(Continuation of legislative day of Wednesday, April 1, 1914.)

The Senate reassembled at 11 o'clock and 50 minutes a. m., on the expiration of the recess, and the Vice President resumed the chair.

Mr. CUMMINS. I assume that we are in executive session. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. When we took a recess last night we were in executive session. My understanding is that when we meet this morning, it being a part of the legislative day, we meet in executive session.

The VICE PRESIDENT. We, however, went into legislative session for the purpose of receiving resolutions on the death of the late Representative RICHARDSON.

Mr. THOMAS. My purpose is merely one of parliamentary inquiry. If I am wrong, of course I do not want to interrupt the roll call.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks the RECORD so discloses. The Chair will examine the RECORD.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not know what the RECORD shows, but we did not pass into legislative session before taking the recess.

Mr. THOMAS. Such is my recollection, although it may be that we did.

Mr. CUMMINS. I was here at the time.

The VICE PRESIDENT (reading):

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The RECORD shows that after 2 hours and 45 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, when action was taken with reference to the death of the late Representative RICHARDSON.

Mr. KERN. That is a mistake.

Mr. THOMAS. The doors were not reopened.

Mr. KERN. The doors were never reopened. The fact is that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], as in open session, moved the adoption of the resolution, and the doors were never reopened.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It must be perfectly apparent that there could not have been any record here if we were in executive session, and it must be perfectly apparent that when a motion is made as in legislative session that that is action upon the part of the Senate of the United States to return to legislative business.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, may I suggest that under that construction by the Chair the RECORD ought to be corrected? The RECORD, as I read it rather hurriedly, would seem to indicate that the business was done in executive session.

The VICE PRESIDENT. No; the RECORD does not disclose that. The RECORD discloses, on the contrary, that it was done in legislative session after 2 hours and 45 minutes spent in executive session.

Mr. CUMMINS. We were carrying out yesterday a unanimous-consent agreement for the consideration of the nomination of Mr. Daniels, of New Jersey, as a member of the Interstate Commerce Commission. However, I ought not to state what occurred, but this can be said, that the question was raised as to whether we should consider the matter in open executive session or with closed doors, and the occupant of the chair ruled that it would be a violation of the unanimous-consent agreement to consider the nomination otherwise than in secret executive session. There was no motion made, for I was here all the while, to open the doors and go into legislative session. The Senator from North Carolina at one point offered a resolution with respect to the death of a Member of the House of Representatives. There was no objection made to the consideration of that resolution, and it was adopted. Thereupon the Senator from North Carolina moved to take a recess until 11.50 to-day, because the unanimous-consent agreement provided that the matter under consideration was to be disposed of during the legislative day. That is the situation. So far as I am concerned, I have no objection to continuing the consideration of the nomination in open session.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is of opinion that hours are wasted here in the discussion of questions that are not of any moment. There is no trouble about either striking out this record, which could not have been made in executive session, or immediately upon the roll call disclosing the presence of a quorum, going into executive session again.

Mr. KERN. I think the shortest way is to return to executive session.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Indiana.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. KERN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, April 2, 1914.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We bless Thee, infinite Spirit, our heavenly Father, for the discipline to which Thou hast subjected us in the gift of choice, without which there could be no such thing as intellectual, moral, or spiritual attainments. Help us, therefore, to meet the conditions with fortitude and learn the lessons with patience, and thus prove ourselves worthy of the trust reposed in us, for it is writ: "He that overcometh shall inherit these things; and I will be his God, and he shall be my son." So may we struggle, so may we attain, so may we enjoy the fruits of righteousness. In His name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

GOVERNMENT EXHIBIT AT PANAMA-PACIFIC EXPOSITION (H. DOC. NO. 877).

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Industrial Arts and Expositions and ordered to be printed.

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a report by the Secretary of State recommending an appropriation of $500,000 for the erection of a building within which to install, display, and safeguard at the Panama-Pacific International Exposition at San Francisco the Government exhibit authorized by the sundry civil appropriation act of June 23, 1913.

As pointed out by the Secretary of State, many of the Governments officially invited by the United States to participate in the exposition are erecting buildings within which to house their exhibits at the exposition. The Government of the United States should not be behind these in appropriately providing for its national exhibit.

I commend the recommendation to the favorable consideration of Congress.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE, March 31, 1914.

PRIVATE CLAIMS BILLS.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a request for unanimous consent. There are about 90 bills on the Private Calendar reported from the Committee on Claims. I am aware that the Appropriations Committee is going to consume the time of the House to-day and probably will to-morrow, and that under the ruling of the Chair and the rules of the House appropriation bills of course have the right of way. Therefore I ask unanimous consent that the House meet to-morrow night at 8 o'clock and remain in session until 11 o'clock for the consideration of bills from the Committee on Claims. I am aware of the fact that any gentleman, by making the point of no quorum, can probably block the passage of any bill at the session of the House for which I am asking, so that, practically speaking, the committee would have about three hours for the consideration of bills by unanimous consent.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, are the bills which the gentleman proposes to call up private bills?

Mr. POU. Yes; bills from the Committee on Claims.

Mr. PAYNE. I would suggest to the gentleman that he confine the business exclusively to bills on the Private Calendar.

Mr. POU. That is my request, that the House meet to-morrow night at 8 o'clock and remain in session until 11 o'clock for the consideration of bills reported by the Committee on Claims, now on the Private Calendar, and that these bills be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POU. Yes.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Why does not the gentleman include in his request the bills reported from other committees than the Committee on Claims? There are a few bills on the calendar reported from the Committee on the Public Lands and from the Committee on Indian Affairs and from other committees.

Mr. POU. I would say to my friend that the Committee on Claims has had only part of one day. The committee has been working diligently and there are probably 90 bills reported from that committee now on the calendar. The three hours would be certainly more than consumed in the consideration of bills from that committee. I think there will be no trouble about getting unanimous consent for another night session, and I hope there will be no objection.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I am not going to object, but it occurs to me that there are a very few, perhaps not to exceed half a dozen, trifling bills of the character indicated, and unless they are considered under this unanimous consent they may not be considered at all.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman that the Committee on Claims does not hope to complete the calendar to-morrow night. We will be forced, probably, to ask for another night. The pressure is very great to secure consideration of these bills. There are quite a number to which I think there can be no objection at all.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I would suggest to the gentleman that he make his request for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar that are not objected to. That would prevent complication arising from some one trying to force a roll call. There are probably a great number of bills to which there is no objection, and if they could be considered and disposed of it would facilitate matters.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House meet to-morrow night at 8 o'clock and remain in session until 11 o'clock for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar, reported from the Committee on Claims, to which there is no objection, the bills to be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that there be a session of the House to-morrow night, beginning at 8 o'clock and extending until 11 o'clock, for the purpose of considering bills on the Private Calendar that are not objected to from the Committee on Claims, the bills to be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, would not the gentleman be willing to make that all bills on the Private Calendar that are not objected to, and that those reported from committees other than the Committee on Claims shall be considered subsequent to those reported from the Committee on Claims?

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman will not insist upon that, because there will be more than 100 bills from the Committee on Claims, probably, by to-morrow morning, and we can get another night session.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, I would say that the Private Calendar has had but little chance in this Congress. I think some arrangement ought to be made at a later date to call all of the bills on the Private Calendar, by unanimous consent, when it can be arranged so as not to interfere with supply bills and matters of great importance that have to be pushed now. I will say to the gentleman from Ohio that I intend to ask unanimous consent that we may have a day on which the bills on the Private Calendar may be called, by unanimous consent.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman that the only object I have in having bills on the Private Calendar considered at an early day is that I have a small bill on the calendar which will permit a man to take an examination for the Revenue-Cutter Service, which occurs in the month of April. April is now here, and if the month goes by the work that has been done in getting that bill on the calendar—and it has already passed the Senate—will be of no avail. I am very anxious to have that passed during the month of April. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, as I understand the legislative status the Committee on War Claims has precedence over the Committee on Claims when the next Friday is given over to the consideration of private business. To-morrow is to be given over to the consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill under the five-minute rule. There will be some here who will be occupied some six hours in the consideration of that important bill. If the gentleman will make his request some time later in the session, when we may have general debate and we would not be kept here in the consideration of a bill under the five-minute rule, I would not feel inclined to object, but under the circumstances I am constrained to object at the present time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin objects.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request for to-night?

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. I object, Mr. Speaker.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up from the Speaker's table the District of Columbia appropriation bill (H. R. 10523) and ask unanimous consent that the amendments of the Senate may be disagreed to and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PAGE] asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the District of Columbia appropriation bill, to disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I realize there are over 200 amendments that have been added to this bill by the Senate. When the bill passed the House there were two amendments which were seriously mooted on this side of the Chamber and on which there was no roll call. I refer to the Borland amendment providing for taxing the improvement of highways to the adjoining property owners and also the amendment stricken out by the Senate embodied in section 8 which invades the half-and-half principle. I would like to ask whether there will be any opportunity for a separate vote upon each of those amendments before a full agreement is reached upon the bill?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I think I can give the gentleman as full assurance as is possible now that there will be an opportunity given the House to vote on those amendments.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have no objection, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will announce the following conferees.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina, Mr. SISSON, and Mr. DAVIS.

WITHDRAWAL OF REPORT.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw a report from the Committee on Indian Affairs which I made on House bill 14869, for the purpose of inserting a letter in the report which was omitted in the printing.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arizona asks unanimous consent to withdraw a report for the purpose stated. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MOSS of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes on a resolution that I have introduced.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, there is going to be debate on the appropriation bill, and the gentleman will have to get his time that way.

Mr. GOOD. I will yield time to the gentleman when we go into the committee.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill; and, Mr. Speaker, pending that motion, I would like to ascertain if we can reach an agreement as to the time for general debate. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] is the ranking minority member of the committee.

Mr. GOOD. I will say to the gentleman there have been a good many requests on this side. I think the total requests amount to about four and a half hours on this side, and I would suggest to the gentleman that we let general debate run for to-day and then take up the bill to-morrow under the five-minute rule, if that is satisfactory.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that general debate be concluded when the committee rises this afternoon, one half of the time to be controlled by myself and the other half by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent that general debate shall be concluded when the House adjourns to-day, one half of the time to be controlled by himself and the other half by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD].

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, the language of the request of the gentleman from South Carolina is a little obscure when he asks that general debate shall be concluded when the committee rises this afternoon. Of course the committee might rise in half an hour. I suppose the intention of the gentleman is that general debate shall conclude with to-day's session of the House?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Some gentlemen who have asked for time are not here, and we do not know they will be here, and for that reason it would not be well to fix any exact time. However, I have no objection to the language used by the gentleman from New York.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. HINEBAUGH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to have some understanding as to the portion of the time that the Progressive Party is to have in this debate.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. GOOD. I will at least yield the gentleman that proportion which the membership of the Progressive Party bears to the Republican Party—maybe more, I think.

Mr. MURDOCK. How is the gentleman going to determine that, when it is indefinite as to the time of debate?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. HINEBAUGH. Thirty minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Oh, I will give the gentleman that much time myself.

Mr. MURDOCK. I suggest to the gentleman that he take it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina——

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object for the purpose of asking the distinguished chairman a question. I want to know if the gentleman does not think it rather unfair to this House to have a bill reported from the committee only yesterday, giving no opportunity for its reaching the hands of the Members of the House until this morning at 9 o'clock or after—does he not think it unfair to the committee to take up a bill of this magnitude, and does he not think it rather treating the Members of the House as dummies, instead of real living, vital mortals? [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, we will engage in general debate during the day. The report on this bill is very elaborate, and I have no doubt the very industrious gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER], before we take up the bill under the five-minute rule, will be familiar with every item in the bill; and besides, I expect to make a very full explanation of it myself.

Mr. FOWLER. I will be very glad to listen to the gentleman's explanation of the bill, because it will be about the only opportunity that I will have to investigate the merits of it. Mr. Speaker, I also desire to ask the gentleman if there will be an opportunity to go through this bill during the general debate, with a view to picking out all of the changes which have been made in the bill over the appropriations of last session?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that the report in this case takes up every department of the Government and shows whether there has been an increase in the force or a decrease and whether there has been an increase or decrease in the salaries, so that there will be absolutely no difficulty in learning in a few moments any item that is subject to a point of order.

Mr. FOWLER. I will say to the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee that I applied this morning at about the hour that Joel Grayson reached his office—9 o'clock a. m.—for the bill and the report, but the report had not reached his office, so I have not had an opportunity to see it yet.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I will see that the gentleman has a copy.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw any intention of objecting.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

So the motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 15279) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, and for other purposes, with Mr. GARNER in the chair.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSON] asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, in presenting the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill to the committee I feel justified in saying that it is a good, clean bill. Were I not familiar with the bill I might have had some suspicion about it after reading a sensational report as to its contents. This bill provides for the salaries of more than 15,000 Government employees, from the President of the United States to the humblest worker in the departments. There are two salaries reduced in all of that number. One salary in the Post Office Department was reduced from $5,000 to $4,800 and another from $3,500 to $2,750.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the chairman of the committee let me ask him why the committee thought it was necessary to make those slight reductions?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Those reductions were made at the request of the Postmaster General, under whom these people work. The places were filled with men who were notified when they accepted them that this reduction would be made in order to make the salaries of those divisions conform to the salaries in other like divisions. Now, that is the extent of the cutting in this bill.

It is also indicated that a great number of people are to be thrown out of employment or out of the Government service. There is not a word of truth in that statement nor any justification for making it. The law now provides that only one vacancy out of four shall be filled at the Pension Office. That provision has been carried in the appropriation bills for many years, so that the vacancies as they occur are not filled, in order that it may not be necessary as the work diminishes to discharge anybody from the service. In the estimate submitted by the Commissioner of Pensions he asked for the reduction of about 145 places. The committee, believing that certain work was being duplicated in the disbursing office, provided a slight reduction there.

We have provided for an additional force to take care of the new post office near the Union Station. We have also provided for an additional force to take care of the old Bureau of Engraving and Printing, to which will be moved all the auditing departments of the Treasury Department, except the Auditor for the Post Office Department. There is a reduction in force at the Census Bureau, because the Secretary said that if we would move them to a modern office building he would not need certain employees that are now on the pay roll to keep up the old building in which they are doing business. There will not be the slightest difficulty in taking care of that force either at the new post-office building or at the old Bureau of Engraving and Printing or at other places where we have provided for an increase in force.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I hope the gentleman will let me conclude my statement.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is right in connection with the item on which the gentleman is just speaking.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Very well.

Mr. STAFFORD. Do I understand the recommendation of the committee in authorizing the Secretary of Commerce to lease quarters for the use of the Census Office is predicated upon the idea of the abandonment of the present census quarters?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Yes, sir. If that appropriation remains in the bill, the quarters now occupied by the Bureau of the Census will be vacated.

Mr. STAFFORD. As I understand, the Government owns the present quarters occupied by the Bureau of Census?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Oh, no. We have been renting it for 17 or 18 years.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman give us the amount of the rental?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. We have been renting it at a rental of $21,000 a year.

The estimates on which this bill is based call for $39,633,249.70. The total appropriations for the current year for items included in this bill amount to $36,323,727. That includes $1,151,292.50 carried in the tariff and other bills. This bill appropriates $36,449,169.70, but makes provision for 15,507 salaries. Compared with the appropriations for the current year, it appropriates $125,442.70 more than was appropriated for the same service for the fiscal year 1914. It appropriates $3,184,080 less than the estimates submitted to Congress. It provides for 141 fewer salaries than are now provided for, which I have explained already.

Mr. MADDEN. That is due——

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. That is due to the reduction in the force in the Post Office Department by removing the Dead Letter Office and by reductions in the Pension Office and other places.

This bill provides for the taking of the manufactures census. The census of manufactures is taken every 10 years at a point midway between the periods for the taking of the regular decennial census, and this bill carries the necessary appropriation for the taking of the census of manufactures.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question right there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from South Carolina yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman has made a statement that this bill provides for the taking of the manufactures census, and he says that the census is taken every 10 years. Is it not taken every 5 years?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. This is the census of manufactures that is taken midway between the decennial censuses. A part of the decennial census includes the census of manufactures.

Mr. MADDEN. So that it is really taken every five years?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Yes; so that the manufactures census is really taken every five years. The increase of $481,000, which provides for the taking of the census of manufactures, exceeds the amount of $125,442.70, which represents the whole increase of this bill over the bill of the current year of $355,557.30. Or, to state it in another way, if no increase had been required on account of the taking of the manufactures census, this bill would have carried $355,557.30 less than the bill for the current year.

The subcommittee found in its investigations that there was no uniform rule in the departments for the purchase of typewriters. No two departments of the Government were paying the same price for the same kind of typewriter, with one or two exceptions. The prices varied from $62.50 to $80. The committee has accordingly inserted in this bill a provision that the President shall appoint a board of Government employees, without additional compensation, to look into this question and to report at the next session of Congress a method to be adopted in the purchase and in the exchange of typewriters.

The only changes made in the force of the House of Representatives were simply those to take care of employees authorized. The sensational story to which I referred a while ago indicated that this subcommittee had provided fat, juicy places on the pay roll of the House. That statement is absolutely false. We have appropriated in this bill for a clerk to the Committee on Good Roads and certain other employees whose positions have been created by law. Resolutions have been brought in from the Committee on Accounts, and this House has adopted those resolutions and created those places, and all that the committee has to do with the matter is to provide the money to pay them for their services. They are now being paid out of the contingent fund of the House. So this committee has made no places whatever——

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Either fat or juicy.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. No. We increased the force in the office of the Civil Service Commission. I wish to call attention to the fact that in the appropriation bill for the current year, made up before the inauguration of the present Executive, we allowed the Civil Service Commission a very large increase of force, because it was not desired by the committee that any excuse could be made that we were trying to hamper the Civil Service Commission by denying it ample force. So the law that went into effect on the 1st day of July, 1913, gave them a very large increase in force. But notwithstanding that increase the commission comes back and asks for a large increase for the next fiscal year, basing their recommendations upon the ground that the Government service is constantly growing, that the Civil Service Commission must hold examinations for people in the Interstate Commerce Commission, must hold examinations for fourth-class postmasters all over the country, and that therefore they must have increased force. We accordingly increased the force, not so much as the commission asked, but about 50 per cent of what they asked; and the committee believes that that increase is ample.

There is quite a number of increases of salaries in this bill, I will say to my friend from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER], and the first place in the bill is where we increase the salares of 135 people in the Library of Congress. I want to say that those who are employed in the Library of Congress are, in my judgment, very poorly paid. They receive very much smaller salaries than are paid in the governmental departments for the same kind of work and the same measure of liability.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from South Carolina yield to the gentleman from North Carolina?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I desire to ask the chairman of the subcommittee if these employees in the Library of Congress are in the classified service—if they are under the civil-service regulations?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I do not think they are.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. The gentleman is not positive about that. Other gentlemen about me say they are not. Can the gentleman tell me, if they are not under the civil service, whose patronage they are—who appoints these people?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I do not know. I suppose the librarian's. I am sorry that I have no personal knowledge, either direct or indirect, of how any places have been filled.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from South Carolina yield to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. I think the gentleman must have overlooked the testimony of Mr. Putnam in regard to that. He went into the matter quite fully, and the hearings are very explicit in regard to the manner in which appointment of persons in the library is made. The facts are that if anybody recommends a person for appointment in the library a record of that recommendation is kept, and that record is open to the public. It is an admirable scheme that the librarian has worked out, a scheme that absolutely precludes political appointments.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. If the Chairman will allow me to ask the gentleman from Iowa a question along that line, does he regard it as being as admirable as a civil-service examination to fill these places?

Mr. GOOD. Those positions are not under the civil service.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I know; but does the gentleman think they should be or should not be?

Mr. GOOD. I think that practically all of these positions, or most of them, should be under the civil service, because I believe in the civil service. But I think that for any place where the civil service does not apply there is not a department of the Government where the appointments are made on merit, without regard to political influences, to a greater degree than they are in the Library of Congress.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the chairman permit me to ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I do not want to interrupt the chairman of the subcommittee.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. I want to ask the gentleman by whom is the librarian appointed?

Mr. GOOD. By the President of the United States.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. For how long? What is his tenure of office?

Mr. GOOD. I think there is no fixed tenure of office. As I understand it, the President can make an appointment at his pleasure.

Mr. HUMPREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Good] says a large number of them are not under the civil service. None of them are in the civil service. Is not that a fact?

Mr. GOOD. I would think that, perhaps, is a true statement. I think none of them are, except, perhaps, the charwomen and some laborers.

Mr. SLAYDEN. If the gentleman will permit, I will say that I do not think there is an employee in the Library under the civil service. They are appointed under rules established by the Committee on the Library, which is an organ of this House.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, when I was interrupted I was stating that we have increased the salaries of 135 people in the Library of Congress. Those salaries were all $900 a year or less. The increase is $60 a year for each person, or $5 a month. That is a very small increase, and yet the committee felt that where people are living on such moderate salaries even that increase will help. I think practically everybody in the Library of Congress working for less than $900 a year was increased, except the watchmen. I do not understand why there is any distinction between the watchmen at the Library of Congress and those around the Capitol. Here we call them policemen. There they are called watchmen. Their duties are substantially the same and their compensation is utterly inadequate.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. I will ask the chairman if, in his opinion, the watchmen of the Library of Congress have not more responsible duties than the ordinary watchmen of other public buildings?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I think the watchmen in the Library differ in some respects from watchmen anywhere else in the Government service, because that Library is visited by vast throngs of people day and night, and these watchmen must be men of good appearance and good address to come in contact with the public.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. GOULDEN. What is the salary provided for these watchmen in the Congressional Library?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. It is $60 a month.

Mr. GOULDEN. Did the committee take into consideration any advance for them?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. We did not give them any.

Mr. GOULDEN. It would seem to me that that is a very small salary, especially in comparison with what men of similar grades get elsewhere. In common justice their salaries should be increased to $75 per month.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I have already indicated what I think about it.

Mr. GOULDEN. I know; but I hoped that the gentleman, being the chairman of the subcommittee in charge of this bill, would have given the matter more serious consideration and applied a remedy. These watchmen certainly ought to have the $75 a month, and I trust that the committee will not object to an amendment to that effect.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. The gentleman from South Carolina is only one member of a very large and powerful committee.

Mr. GOULDEN. Yes; but he is an influential member of that committee, permit me to say.

Mr. FOWLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I will yield, but I hope that gentlemen will let me conclude my remarks.

Mr. FOWLER. I mean to interrupt the gentleman only once. On page 23 of the bill there is an effort to increase the pay of these inferior-salaried employees, and I discover that $60 a year has been added, as the gentleman has indicated. Beginning with line 8, on page 23, 14 employees at $900 receive an increase to $960, 4 who received $800 get an increase to $860, and 13 who formerly received $720 will receive $780 by this bill; but there are 13 receiving only $600, which they have received heretofore, and in other places there has been a like neglect to increase the lowest-salaried employees. I want to ask the distinguished gentleman what reason the committee had for not increasing the lowest-paid men?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I can not remember every item where we are dealing with over 15,000 people. We have increased the salaries of people not only in the Library of Congress, who were receiving small salaries, but we have increased the salaries of those who were receiving low compensation in all the departments of the Government. Just why the particular employees referred to by the gentleman from Illinois were not increased is a matter that I will probably be able to explain to his satisfaction when we reach that item under the five-minute rule.

Mr. Chairman, we have provided that all of the bureaus and departments of the Treasury Department that are now occupying rented buildings shall remove to the old building of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. It is not quite sure that that building will be adequate for all purposes, or whether there will be room to store all of the documents that are now stored elsewhere. That fact could not be ascertained when we completed the bill, and it will be necessary to make certain examinations and investigations with respect to that before we can definitely know whether we may not have to rent a little space outside.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. A moment ago the gentleman from Illinois asked why the committee did not raise 13 employees under the catalogue, transportation, and shelf division of the Library of Congress. I want to say to the gentleman that as a matter of fact those employees did receive increases, because there were originally 10 at $540, and they were given salaries of $600 under this bill; so, as a matter of fact, the committee did not make any exception with reference to those particular employees.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I am very much obliged to my colleague from Tennessee, who is well acquainted with every item. As I stated, I am sure that when we reach the item under the five-minute rule there will be no difficulty in explaining it. In other words, these employees formerly received $540, and we have increased them to $600.

Mr. FOWLER. No; that is not quite true, Mr. Chairman. I do not desire to interrupt the chairman of the committee, because he is making a very illuminating explanation, which I am trying to take in; but heretofore that bill carried 3 men at $600, and the bill now carries 13 men at $600. In other words, there are three men who have been receiving $600, whose salaries were not increased.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Perhaps there are and perhaps there are not. These places may be vacant now, and they may be filled by people who were getting less than that before.

Mr. FOWLER. I have examined that, and I know.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I think it best not to go into the explanation of little items like that until we reach them in the reading of the bill.

The Department of State asked for no increase over the current law. There is a slight reduction in this bill. The Post Office Department asked for a slight decrease from the current law. It is true that this bill carries a small sum more than the one for the current year, but that is because we had to take care of the new Post Office Building down here at the Union Station.

I want to call attention to the fact that in this bill we have provided for the Department of Commerce quite a large sum in order to take advantage of the opening of the Panama Canal, for trade purposes in Central and South America. But those items will be discussed when we reach them, and I have no doubt are of great interest to the House and to the country.

There is very little legislation in this bill. The first item is in respect to mileage.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Has the gentleman concluded the enumeration of the increases in the various departments?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. No; I have not, but I can do that if the gentleman would like to have it.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I had just as lief have it when we read the bill. That will suit me as well as any other way.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I was going to insert it as a part of my remarks, and not burden the committee by going over it now.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. The particular point I had in mind was the Department of Justice, but it will suit me just as well to discuss that when we reach it.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. We have not only increased the force, but the salaries of some of those on the pay roll. I may say in a few words that the Attorney General appeared before the subcommittee and stated that the Government was engaged in very important litigation, that the ablest lawyers in the country were employed by the great corporations and those who were litigating with the Government, and he felt that the force at his disposal was not sufficient for the immediate requirements, and he felt that the salaries paid were inadequate to secure the kind of talent that he desired to have around him and to keep permanently. The subcommittee believed that the argument of the Attorney General was based upon sound reasoning and decided to increase the force and to increase the pay of some who were already in the force. That we will be glad to explain more fully when we reach the item under the five-minute rule.

The first item of legislation, and one that Members generally are interested in, is the provision repealing the law touching your compensation, or mileage, as it is commonly called. The general public believes that a Congressman receives 20 cents a mile mileage, but an examination of the law will show that a Congressman receives as compensation $7,500 a year and 20 cents a mile to and from his home. But, as I stated, the general public believes that this money is paid as mileage in the ordinary sense of that term.

As mileage, your committee believes that 20 cents a mile each way can not be justified. It is the small matters that are not worth contending over that give people an opportunity to criticize Congressmen for indirect efforts to increase their salary.

The committee discussed 5 cents a mile, 10 cents a mile, 6 cents a mile, 7 cents a mile, with a view to determining what would be the proper amount to pay a Member of Congress to come to Washington and return at the close of the session of Congress. Some men who come to Congress have large families, some have small ones, and some have none. Some bring the members of their family and some do not. The committee finally decided, after considering the matter as carefully as time would permit, that a provision that paid the actual traveling expenses of the Member and the actual and immediate and dependent members of his family, coming and going, would not do anybody injustice. We have therefore incorporated that provision in the bill for the consideration of the committee and of the House.

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I will.

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. Will the chairman of the subcommittee give the committee the benefit of his definition of the words "immediate and dependent members" of a man's family?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I do not think there is any great difficulty in construing the words "immediate and dependent members" of a family. I do not believe that the officials whose duty it will be to pass upon this question, if it ever becomes a law, will have any difficulty in determining who are the immediate members who are dependent.

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. I would like to get the committee's idea of what it had in mind when it incorporated that provision.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. If the gentleman wants to know why we use the words "immediate and dependent," I will say, suppose a gentleman is coming to Congress, and he says to some young lady, a friend of his daughter, "Come to Washington and spend the winter with us." That would not be an immediate and dependent member of his family.

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. I had in mind the Member's wife and his son and his daughter.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. His wife, son, and daughter, and children would be immediate members of his family.

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. Or a niece or a nephew.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. It includes the people who live in his household who are dependent upon him; the permanent members of his household who are dependent on him for sustenance; they are the immediate and dependent members of his family.

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. Would it take in the Member's servants—his butler and nurse?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. No; the Government of the United States is not going to bring butlers, nurses, or cooks to Washington. That was never intended.

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. I would like to ask the gentleman why a man with a large family, a Member of the House of Representatives, should have any more consideration than a man who is not married or has no family.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Probably I can best answer that question by asking another. Can the gentleman tell me why a man living on the Pacific coast should have $1,200 or $1,500 more compensation than the man who lives in Maryland or Virginia?

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. Yes; because he actually pays out that much money.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. He does not pay out any such amount of money coming and going.

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. Then, why did not the committee put it at 10 cents a mile, say?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. We say the actual expenses. That puts every man on an equality.

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. But you do not say the expenses of a Member and his family, but you say the expenses of himself and the immediate and dependent members of his family.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. If the gentleman does not think that the Member ought to bring his wife and children, he can move to strike that out.

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. It may be that a good deal of this will be stricken out before the bill becomes a law.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Does not the gentleman from South Carolina think that if the mileage was fixed at 10 cents a mile that that in itself would work an inequality, when you take into consideration that many Members have large families and some have none at all?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Yes; it makes no difference. The only way to put Members on an equality is to pay the actual expenses coming and going.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. If the gentleman from South Carolina will pardon me, I understood the gentleman to state at the outset that this was a part of the compensation of Members. He has just stated that he had increased the compensation of the Assistant Attorneys General and others in the Department of Justice, so that the Attorney General might get more efficient and competent men. I assume, therefore, that the committee thought when they reduced the compensation to Members of the House that the Members were already sufficiently efficient and competent and that there was no occasion to hold out any further inducement. [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Unquestionably so. We have no criticism to offer of the House or any Member.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Not criticism, but quite a compliment.

Mr. BOOHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Certainly.

Mr. BOOHER. I would like to ask the gentleman who is to determine who the dependent and immediate members of the family are? How is the matter to be determined? Who is going to say whether my daughter or son is dependent or not dependent?

Mr. BRYAN. Suppose the wife has more money than the husband. [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. She would come under the words "immediate" member of the family.

Mr. BOOHER. I do not think the gentleman is correct. The person must not only be immediate, but a dependent, under this provision.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I think the important thing is to get the law on the statute book and then we will take care of the construction of it when we get to it. We have auditors and people on the pay roll of the Government who properly construe all these statutes.

Mr. BOOHER. Is it true that after a Member of Congress certifies that he has brought here to Washington certain dependent and immediate members of his family that that is to be questioned by some subordinate?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. It is not to be assumed that Members of Congress are not sufficiently intelligent to know who are the members of their families and who are dependent upon them or that they would render an account for anybody else.

Mr. BOOHER. That may be perfectly satisfactory to the gentleman, but it does not answer who is to determine that and who is to question whether or not a certain person is a dependent member of the family of a Member of Congress.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman another question. Who determines when the gentleman files his account for mileage under the present law whether it is correct or incorrect?

Mr. BOOHER. Why the Committee on Mileage. You have a committee for that.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Very well. We can have a committee on this question, too.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. GOULDEN. I think the mileage questions will all be settled, as the gentleman suggests, at the time it is necessary to consider them if this measure becomes a law, but I want to make this observation, and that is to commend the committee for bringing in an amendment of that character. I served, as the gentleman knows, for four years at a salary of $5,000 a year, and we had the same mileage at that time. It was thought simply additional compensation. We are now getting $7,500 a year, a 50 per cent increase, and I think the amendment proposed by the committee a wise and proper one, and I hope this House will see to it that it becomes a law. There is no valid reason for the present obsolete practice of paying Members, or any officials of the Government, 20 cents a mile. When adopted in the days of stage coaches or private vehicles and small salaries to Members it might have been justifiable, but certainly not in this age.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, as I understand it, mileage is now paid upon the certificate signed by a Member and passed upon by the Committee on Mileage. This provision, as I read it, settles the controversy suggested by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BOOHER], if there is any difficulty. It says:

> The same to be paid on certificates duly approved and in the manner heretofore prescribed for the payment of mileage.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Certainly. There is no difficulty about that. The only question is, Do you want to pass this kind of a law? After we pass it, we will construe it.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. It construes itself. It is to be paid on a certificate made and approved just as the other is.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Certainly.

Mr. TALCOTT of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Certainly.

Mr. TALCOTT of New York. When this present law in regard to mileage went into operation it practically was a mileage statute, was it not? It more nearly approximated the expenses of a Member than it does now?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Oh, I presume that away back, when men had to come here in stagecoaches, on horseback, and in any way they could get here, the present amount probably did not more than cover their actual expenses.

Mr. TALCOTT of New York. And this law has been in effect for 50 years?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. It has been the law for a long time. Mr. Chairman, I ask leave to print certain data that I have here as a part of my remarks.

Mr. LONERGAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. LONERGAN. Has this question of mileage of Members ever been presented to Congress for its consideration?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Oh, it has been before Congress in one form and another ever since I have been here.

Mr. LONERGAN. With what results?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. With the result that the law has not been changed.

Mr. LONERGAN. I want to say to the gentleman that I am very much in favor of the proposed change, that Members receive only actual traveling expenses, as provided for in this paragraph.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I think the committee is perhaps right in the main feature of its recommendations. I dare say the committee was confronted with and recognized a certain degree of embarrassment in the details of legislation of the kind proposed. This has occurred to me in considering the proposed change. Some Members have been accustomed to living with Spartan simplicity all of their lives—economically in a word. Others have not, and it may be that this has cultivated in them habits of extravagance and luxury, and they may have learned that they must have the drawing-room on trains in coming from their homes to Washington. Others have lived simply, and, let us hope, they will continue to live as they have lived heretofore and travel as inexpensively as they have traveled when paying the bills themselves; but other Members traveling the same distance, without any departure from their accustomed ways of living, will turn in expense accounts for precisely the same distance two or three times as great. There you invite criticism of Congress and scandal, and I personally would prefer, if the committee can find any means of doing it, that they fix a definite sum so that there will be no necessity for keeping accounts, so that Members will not be forced to put down every item of expense. Fix it as low as you please, but let it be fixed definitely. My reason for that is based largely on what a distinguished and honorable gentleman, a member of the Federal judiciary, once said to me in respect to traveling and keeping judicial expense accounts. He was a scrupulously exact and honest man, and he begged me to endeavor to have the law amended to reduce the amount, if desired, but to fix it definitely, so that when a judge went from one part of the city to another he would not be compelled, if he were going to his court, to charge the money paid for car fare or for cab hire, or something of that kind. I think it would be wiser to fix a definite, moderate sum, and, I think, most Members would prefer it on that basis.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that these are all interesting questions. We have brought this matter before Congress and it can be amended. Personally, I do not think the traveling expenses ought to include anything except actual railway fare and Pullman fare—not a drawing room, but an ordinary Pullman berth.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Then say so in the law.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Certainly.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. I just wanted to say, though I do not know that it is necessary now, in view of your response to the question asked by the gentleman from Connecticut, that this matter has been before Congress every session since I have been a Member, and I have advocated consistently heretofore a reduction of the mileage. I have heretofore stated on this floor that I would vote to reduce the mileage to 10 cents per mile, to 5 cents per mile, or any other reduction, and that I would vote to allow no mileage at all, if there was a possibility of getting a majority to join me. I state now I favor any reduction we can secure, and I commend the committee for making an effort to secure it. And I favor myself a reduction to the actual expenses, or I will vote to eliminate the whole thing.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. So will I.

Mr. BRYAN. If the gentleman will permit me again, I tried to bring out a moment ago my objection to these words, "immediate and dependent." Now, in our section of the country no legislator would for a moment refer to the wife of a Congressman as "dependent." We have laws out there which make the husband just as much dependent upon the wife as the wife is on the husband.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. They are immediate members——

Mr. BRYAN. But it says "immediate and dependent." The husband is as much dependent as the wife, and why use a word that is absolutely obsolete, so far as the relations between husband and wife are concerned?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. The gentleman must know the word "and" means "or."

Mr. BRYAN. The word "and" does not mean "or" any more than "Johnson" means "Smith." [Laughter.]

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit me another question on another subject in regard to the Attorney General's Office. This bill only carries appropriations, I understand, for those who are employed here in the department in Washington.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. This carries an appropriation for the district attorneys and assistants out in the country?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. There is an appropriation in the sundry civil bill, a lump-sum appropriation, for the enforcement of the law. Now, under the law some very large fees have been paid. The Attorney General believes that instead of going outside and employing special attorneys in special cases that he ought to have a force of his own, trained men sufficiently able to go out and try those cases without resorting to outside counsel.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. There is an instance in my State in the northern district of Mississippi. They have always had—for many years, at any rate—an assistant to the district attorney; one or more. At the present time there is no assistant there, although one is needed, and the reason that there is no assistant at the present time, as stated by the Attorney General, is that there is no appropriation available now for the payment of assistants to the district attorney. I want to know if that was a matter that would be provided or could be provided for in this bill, or would it have to be taken up when we have under consideration the sundry civil appropriation bill?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I believe the matter to which the gentleman refers would have to come under the sundry civil bill, but I am not sure; but I will let him know before we reach the item in the bill.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I will be very much obliged, because it seems to me to be a matter of importance in the northern district of Mississippi that there should be some provision made for an assistant to the district attorney.

Mr. PAYNE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Yes, sir.

Mr. PAYNE. I understand the provision for the traveling expenses of the President comes under the sundry civil bill?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Yes, sir.

Mr. PAYNE. Has the committee yet taken up that bill to see whether they could not fix that upon the basis of the actual expenses by the usual traveled route?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I will say to the gentleman from New York that we have troubles of our own and we do not care to borrow more. That matter is considered by another committee.

Mr. PAYNE. Then this provision is purely on account of troubles of our own?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I understand the present Executive has used very little of the $25,000, so it will be covered into the Treasury. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. BRYAN. If the gentleman will permit me, I notice the committee allows practically $4 apiece per month for the Senators to bathe over in the Senate Office Building all the year round, although we are not in session all the time. Does not the gentleman think that $4 a month for a Senator to bathe is too much, or ought it to be increased? I understand not more than 10 per cent of the Senators use these baths. That would make it $40 a month for those who use them.

Mr. PAYNE. I want to say to the gentleman I do not think anyone ought to object to a very liberal amount for bathing purposes to the gentlemen over at the other end of the Capitol.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I will say to the gentleman, by an examination of this bill he will find the appropriations made for the United States Senate are very large. There has always been a comity existing between the House of Representatives and the Senate, and the practice is that each House will provide for its own services, pay such salaries as it believes ought to be paid, and take the responsibility before the country. We are not responsible for the salaries at the Senate end of this building.

I append here as a part of my remarks a portion of the report of the Committee on Appropriations:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Under authority of resolutions of the House, provision is recommended for the following additional employees:

Office of the Clerk: One messenger and assistant Journal clerk at $1,800.

Committee clerks: Clerk to the Committee on Election of President, Vice President, and Representatives, $2,000; clerk to the Committee on Roads, $2,000; janitor to the Committee on Roads, $720.

Post office: Four messengers at $100 per month during the next session, the same being provided for on account of the present session in the deficiency act.

Minority employees: The continuance of 1 minority special employee at $1,800, authorized by a resolution, is provided for.

Doorkeeper's office: The salary of 1 special employee at $1,800 is omitted.

INTERIOR DEPARTMENT.

Indian Office: An increase is recommended as follows:

Two clerks, at $1,600 each; 4 clerks, at $1,400 each; 7 clerks, at $1,200 each.

Pension Office: A reduction is recommended as follows:

Ten principal examiners, at $2,000 each; 10 clerks, at $1,800 each; 15 clerks, at $1,600 each; 25 clerks, at $1,400 each; 45 clerks, at $1,200 each; 21 clerks, at $1,000 each; 4 copyists, at $900 each; 45 special examiners, at $1,300 each.

A provision is recommended requiring the Commissioner of Pensions to reorganize the finance division and the office of the disbursing clerk for the payment of pensions so as to eliminate useless work and prevent duplication of labor.

The provision heretofore prohibiting the filling of more than 25 per cent of the vacancies occurring in the Pension Office is continued for the fiscal year 1915.

Patent Office: A first assistant examiner of trade-marks and designs at $2,400 is recommended, 3 laborers at $480 each are omitted, and an increase in the pay of 42 laborers from $480 to $540 each and of 40 messenger boys from $360 to $420 each is recommended.

Bureau of Education: An increase is recommended of 1 translator at $1,800, 2 clerks at $1,800 each, 1 clerk at $1,600, and 1 clerk at $1,400. The appropriation for the investigation of rural and industrial education is increased from $15,000 to $30,000.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

An additional assistant attorney at $2,500 is recommended in the division of the Assistant Attorney General for the department.

Provision is made for 77 employees, including assistant engineers, electricians, elevator conductors, watchmen, laborers, and charwomen, with salaries amounting to $48,540, for the new Washington City post-office building.

The Topography Division is omitted and its duties and employees consolidated with the Division of Supplies.

The clerical and other force of employees in certain offices of the department is reorganized, resulting in a net reduction of 56 employees, with salaries amounting to $43,250, for the fiscal year 1914, as compared with the ensuing year 1915.

In accordance with the recommendation of the department, the salary of the Director of the Postal Savings System is reduced from $5,000 to $4,800 and the salary of the Superintendent of the Money-Order Division is reduced from $3,500 to $2,750.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE.

Attorney General's Office: The salaries of 6 Assistant Attorneys General are increased from $5,000 to $6,000 each. An increase is recommended of 2 attorneys, at $3,500 each; 2 attorneys, at $3,000 each; 3 clerks, at $1,400 each; 4 clerks, at $1,200 each; 3 clerks, at $1,000 each; and 1 messenger, at $840. A reduction is recommended of 1 clerk, at $1,800, and 5 clerks, at $900 each. The salary of the clerk to the Attorney General is increased from $1,600 to $1,800.

Solicitor for Department of Labor: An increase is recommended of 1 clerk, at $1,800, and 1 messenger, at $840.

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE.

Secretary's office: An increase is recommended of 1 elevator conductor, at $720, and 7 charwomen, at $240 each.

Census Office: A reduction is recommended as follows: 1 clerk, $1,200; 1 electrician, $1,000; 1 skilled laborer, $1,000; 1 skilled laborer, $900; 5 skilled laborers, at $720 each; 4 watchmen, at $720 each; 2 firemen, at $720 each; 5 unskilled laborers, at $720 each; 9 charwomen, at $240 each.

Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce: The salary of the chief of the bureau is increased from $4,000 to $6,000, and the salary of 2 assistant chiefs of the bureau are increased from $3,000 to $3,500 and from $2,750 to $3,000, respectively.

An increase is recommended of 1 translator, at $2,000; 2 clerks, at $1,800 each; 1 clerk, at $1,600; 1 clerk, at $1,400; 4 clerks, at $900 each; and a reduction is made of 2 clerks, at $1,000 each; 1 messenger, at $840; 2 assistant messengers, at $720 each; 2 laborers, at $660 each; and 1 laborer, at $480.

A new appropriation of $50,000 is recommended for promoting commerce in South and Central America, including the employment of experts and special agents; also the sum of $100,000 for commercial attachés to be accredited through the State Department, to investigate and report on conditions in the manufacturing industries and trade of foreign countries as may be of interest to the United States.

Steamboat-Inspection Service: One clerk, at $900, and a traveling inspector, at $2,500, are recommended.

Bureau of Standards: An increase is recommended of 1 elevator boy, at $360; 1 woodworker, at $1,000; and 1 photographer, at $1,200.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOR.

Secretary's office: An increase is recommended as follows:

One clerk, at $1,800; 1 clerk, at $1,600; 1 clerk, at $1,400; 2 clerks, at $1,200 each; 1 clerk, at $1,000; 1 clerk, at $900; 1 telephone operator, at $720; 2 assistant messengers, at $720 each; 1 messenger boy, at $480; 1 engineer, at $1,000; 1 skilled laborer, at $840; 3 laborers, at $660; 1 watchman, at $720; 3 charwomen, at $240 each; 2 elevator conductors, at $720 each.

Bureau of Naturalization: The salary of the commissioner is increased from $3,500 to $4,000 and the deputy commissioner from $3,000 to $3,250. An increase is recommended of 1 clerk at $1,400, 3 clerks at $1,200, and 1 clerk at $1,000.

LIMITATIONS.

Limitations with respect to expenditures or legislative provisions within clause 2 of Rule XXI of the House, not heretofore enacted, are recommended as follows:

On page 2:

"Hereafter, in lieu of the mileage now authorized by law, each Senator, Representative, Delegate, and Resident Commissioner shall be entitled to and be paid the traveling expenses, including the traveling expenses of immediate and dependent members of their respective families, actually incurred in going to and returning once from each session of Congress by the nearest route usually traveled, the same to be paid on certificates duly approved as in the manner heretofore prescribed for the payment of mileage."

On page 32:

"The operation of the Executive order of March 20, 1912, for the annual submission to the Civil Service Commission of an outline of organization of the Government of the United States is suspended until otherwise provided by law."

On page 42, with reference to piece-rate employees in the Office of the Auditor for the Interior Department:

"Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury may, during the fiscal year 1915, in his discretion, diminish the number of positions of the grades below that of clerk at $1,200 per annum in the Office of the Auditor for the Interior Department and use the unexpended balances of the appropriation for the positions so diminished as a fund to pay, on a piece-rate basis, to be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury, the compensation of such additional number of employees as may be necessary to tabulate by the use of mechanical devices the accounts and vouchers of the Interior Department: Provided further, That under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, piece-rate employees in the Office of the Auditor for the Interior Department shall be entitled to the same leave of absence with pay as is provided by law for clerks and employees in the executive departments in Washington. The pay of any piece-rate employee during such leave shall be determined by the average quantity of work done by such employee and the pay therefor.

On page 47, with reference to the Treasurer's Office:

"And the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to transfer and appoint in the office of the Treasurer of the United States such of the employees, in his discretion, as are now employed in said office under details authorized by the act of March 4, 1913."

On page 54:

"In addition to the offices of the four auditors of the Treasury required to be removed to the old building of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, the General Supply Committee and offices of the Treasury now occupying rented quarters, and such other offices or parts of offices of the Treasury Department as the Secretary of the Treasury may determine, shall be removed thereto; and the Bureau of Engraving and Printing shall entirely vacate all of said buildings on or before June 1, 1914."

On page 67:

"Hereafter the estimates for expenses of government in the Territories shall be submitted through and be subject to revision by the Department of the Interior."

On page 98:

"The Commissioner of Pensions shall, on or before July 1, 1914, rearrange the finance division and the office of the disbursing clerk for the payment of pensions in the Pension Office and reorganize the forces employed therein so as to eliminate useless work and prevent duplication of labor."

On page 99:

"The First Assistant Commissioner of Patents and the Assistant Commissioner of Patents shall hereafter perform such duties pertaining to the office of Commissioner of Patents as may be assigned to them, respectively, from time to time by the Commissioner of Patents."

On page 114, with reference to the Solicitor for the Department of the Interior:

"Provided, That this change of title shall not affect the status of the present incumbent or require his reappointment."

On page 114, with reference to the Solicitor for the Post Office Department:

"Provided, That this change of title shall not affect the status of the present incumbent or require his reappointment."

On page 129:

"Apprentices in the Bureau of Standards may be promoted after satisfactory apprenticeship, with the approval of the Civil Service Commission, to positions corresponding to the journeyman grades for which their duties logically prepare them without regard to apportionment: Provided, That they thus acquire no rights to transfer to other lines of work."

On page 133, with reference to rent for the Census Office:

"* * * and the Secretary of Commerce is authorized to enter into a contract for the lease, for a period not to exceed five years, of a modern fireproof office building or modern fireproof addition to the present Department of Commerce Building, containing no less than 50,000 square feet of available floor space for use of the Census Office, at an annual rental at a rate per square foot of available floor space not to exceed 35 cents."

On pages 143, 144, 145:

"SEC. 4. That no part of any money appropriated by this or any other act shall be used during the fiscal year 1915 for the purchase of any typewriting machine at a price in excess of the lowest price paid by the Government of the United States for the same make and model of machine during the period of the fiscal years 1913 and 1914; such price shall include the value of any typewriting machine or machines given in exchange, but shall not apply to special prices granted on typewriting machines used in schools of the District of Columbia or of the Indian Service, the lowest of which special prices paid for typewriting machines shall not be exceeded in future purchases for such schools.

"Within 30 days after the passage of this act the President shall appoint a board, consisting of three persons in the employment of the Government, who shall serve without additional compensation, and two of whom shall be experienced in mechanical manufacturing; it shall be the duty of said board to make an investigation of typewriting and other machines of like character and to fix a mechanical standard to be required for typewriting machines for each class of work in the public service requiring the use of such machines; it shall also ascertain and report as nearly as may be practicable the probable maximum cost of producing each such machine, based upon such mechanical standard, and shall communicate the same to Congress through the Secretary of the Treasury at the beginning of its next session.

"The head of every executive department and other Government establishment shall transmit to Congress, on the first day of its next session, a statement showing, for the first three months of the fiscal year 1915, the following relative to typewriting machines purchased during that period: The model, character, contract price, and make of each machine purchased; the model, character, amount allowed, and make of each machine given in exchange; total number purchased and total number given in exchange; aggregate cost, aggregate allowance on exchanges, and aggregate net cost of all machines. And there shall be submitted to Congress, on the first day of the session following the close of the fiscal year 1915, statements of all of the foregoing facts for the entire period of that fiscal year."

On page 145:

"SEC. 5. That appropriations made in this or any other act shall not be available for purchase, maintenance, or repair of motor-propelled vehicles unless specific authority be granted by law for such purchase, maintenance, or repair, or unless authority therefor be specifically stated in any appropriation used for such purposes."

RECAPITULATION.

As a part of this report there is submitted a comparative statement showing in parallel columns as to each item in the bill the current appropriation, the amount estimated for 1915, and the sum recommended in the bill for that year, together with the number of salaries in each office or bureau and in the aggregate in each department under the three conditions mentioned.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, 50 years ago, when Gen. Garfield, of Ohio, chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, reported the bill making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenditures of the Government, he made the observation that if a deluge should destroy all the history of this country, after the waters had receded and dry land had reappeared and there only remained the annual budgets of the Congress, from them alone the future historian could write a true and correct history of our country. A review of the annual appropriation bills that have been reported to this House within the last few years is a magnificent tribute to the wonderful advancement which our country has made in all the arts and sciences. But, Mr. Chairman, it also reveals to my mind a great weakness. While the country has advanced by leaps and bounds, Congress has not kept pace with this great development of our country in meeting the demands of our people with regard to legislation. One of the reasons for our dereliction in this respect is found in the fact that we are following an antiquated system in making appropriations.

Mr. Chairman, hearings on the bill which we now have under consideration were taken up by the subcommittee on the 14th day of January, and hearings were held almost daily for almost a month and finally concluded on the 9th day of March. If this subcommittee follows the same course that it adopted two years ago, it will be necessary about the 1st of next November for this subcommittee again to hold hearings and pass on the same identical items for 1916 which we passed on in the bill before us for the year 1915. The making and passing of an annual budget is a great waste of time and money. It is all the more regrettable when we remember that this time could be so well spent considering remedial legislation. There are too many people who feel that the Congress should be kept busy most of the time on supply bills, but this reactionary doctrine will soon be a thing of the past.

We now appropriate every year more than a billion dollars for carrying on the work of the Government. These appropriations are contained in 14 or 15 great appropriation bills, and aside from the tremendous loss of time in considering these bills annually, hearing the same witnesses year after year on the same identical items, there is a great expense in taking down and printing these hearings. After these bills are annually reported more than six weeks of solid time of the House is consumed in consideration and debate on the floor of this House.

I have hoped that some one on that side of the House would introduce in this Congress a bill making these appropriations for a biennial period instead of annually, so that these great questions that are now pending before the various committees of Congress in bills that can not, because of the lack of time, have the deliberation and consideration of this House and of Congress. If we could make this change, we could save at least six weeks of the time of the House at each short session of Congress. That Congress could do something, then, other than to consider only supply bills.

Mr. Chairman, the bill which we have before us is, in my humble judgment, a good bill. I want to say just a word in regard to the manner in which the chairman of the subcommittee, Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina, conducted the hearings. Day after day he sat in the committee room patiently listening to the testimony of witness after witness who appeared before the committee, and when the time came for decision regarding hundreds of disputed items, without fear or favor and with a sincere desire to observe the spirit as well as the letter of his oath of office, he struck down a proposed advance where it was wrong just as freely and willingly as he gave an increase in salary where it was meritorious. [Applause.]

There are some provisions in the bill with which I do not agree. I regret that there were appropriations asked for that were not granted, but in the main I think the bill is a very good one. I do not agree with the majority of the committee with regard to this question of mileage. I do not see why one part of our compensation should be cut off and the other part remain. Under the decisions of this House the mileage is a part of the compensation of a Member; if we desire to reduce our compensation, let us do it and not play politics over such reduction.

I recognize that there is an inequality in the law that gives to a Member from the Pacific coast $1,200 a year of compensation, that is denied to a Member from Virginia, for instance. This inequality exists by reason of the present law fixing salaries of Members. If we are to change the law and cut off a portion of the compensation to Members and grant instead only the actual expenses of traveling to and from Washington, perhaps the provision which the committee has adopted is as good a provision as can be found. But whatever provision is adopted, there will be those who will find points of criticism.

There is another provision of the bill which I was in hopes would receive a little kinder treatment at the hands of the committee, and that was the one in regard to the Children's Bureau. One hundred and six thousand dollars was asked this year for this great department of the Government and in addition $48,000 for contingent expenses. We gave them, as I recall, about $25,400, the same appropriation that was given to them last year, with nothing for contingent expenses. It must be remembered that this is a new department of the Government, and increases should be gradual. When we consider the great work of this bureau and consider what we are doing to protect the agricultural interest of the country from the ravages of insects and bugs, and then remember that we are only giving $26,000 a year in the prosecution of this great work, it seems to me that it is inadequate, when we consider the great objects of the bureau as well as its power for good.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. GARRETT of Texas). Will the gentleman from Iowa yield to the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. GOOD. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman recalls, of course, that the items of expense for that bureau are fixed by statute?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. And any increase of appropriation would have been subject to a point of order, even if the committee had recommended it?

Mr. GOOD. Any increase except the increase for contingent expenses, and a few things of that kind.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. But the gentleman will recall that the $106,640 recommended over and above the $26,000 as being used during this year, was for personal expenses of the bureau, and therefore clearly subject to a point of order.

Mr. GOOD. I do not think all of it was subject to a point of order. I think most of it was. There were some clerks, as I recall, that would be subject to a point of order. But the gentleman is right in the main. Practically all of the increases asked for would be subject to a point of order. Fifty-eight thousand dollars was asked for contingent expenses, for which we allowed nothing, and no part of which would be subject to a point of order, of course.

Mr. Speaker, there are some other provisions of the bill with which I am not in accord. I do not believe that we ought to strike the blow that Congress has already struck right at the roots of the civil service of this country. When the tariff bill placed within the power of the Treasury Department the appointment of deputy collectors without regard to the civil-service rules, it was, to my mind, a great mistake. In this bill in appropriating money for persons who are to do that work it has occurred to me that we ought to limit the payment to those only who have been appointed as the result of a civil-service examination.

Mr. Chairman, I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. Moss].

Mr. MOSS of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, as a part of my remarks I would like to ask the Clerk to read a resolution which I wish to offer through regular channels.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas this House has enacted into law a bill introduced by Mr. SIMS on the 9th day of March, 1914, to repeal the following provision, to wit: "No tolls shall be levied upon vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States," contained in section 5 of an act entitled "An act to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal and the sanitation of the Canal Zone," approved August 24, 1912; and

Whereas a due and formal protest on the part of the Government of Great Britain to this Government was filed against such exemption clause on the ground that it violated what is known as the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, concluded between the high contracting parties on September 18, 1901; and

Whereas there is a difference of opinion between Great Britain and the United States as to the proper construction and meaning of said treaty, relating to the right of the United States to exempt such vessels, and it is desired, as a matter of international courtesy, to enter into negotiations with the said Government of Great Britain for the peaceful and proper settlement of the question so pending. Therefore be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives, That it is the sense of the House of Representatives of the United States that the enactment by it of the said Sims bill and the repeal by it of the said clause granting such exemption are in furtherance of the desire of the United States to facilitate such negotiations between said two Governments, and are in no sense to be construed as waiving or denying any right possessed by the United States to grant exemption from tolls to her vessels of war and commerce.

Mr. MOSS of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the courtesy of being permitted to speak on this at the present time, and I want to assure the House that nothing that I shall say can be construed as partisan or as wishing to revive the controversy which has just ended.

The more I think on this subject, and the more I study it, however, it seems to me that this House, now that the smoke of battle has blown away, should in some way clearly indicate that by the repeal of this law it does not express an opinion one way or the other on this question of the construction of the treaty.

Now, this is not a privileged resolution, but I wanted to call it to the attention of the House, and I presume it will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. I sincerely trust that the said committee will act upon that resolution one way or the other at an early date. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that the sense of this House as embodied in that resolution, which does not even take sides in favor of the United States, should be transmitted to the Senate of the United States before that honorable body decides this great and important question. And I sincerely hope that the committee to which this resolution will be referred will give to it its earnest and prompt consideration.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 45 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, since I can not have read in the time allotted to me all the papers I desire to present, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, it is just about one year since the new President of the United States entered this Chamber and delivered his message calling an extra session of Congress to revise the tariff. There were many Republicans, of course, who had their doubts about the wisdom of attempting a revision of the then existing tariff law, but the Democratic Party was insistent upon it, and the Underwood bill, after careful consideration in this House, was finally passed in October and is now the law.

The general assault upon industries, so far as they are controlled by manufacturers or employers of labor, made during the discussion of the Underwood bill will not be forgotten. It was generally felt upon this side that the Democratic Party, headed by their President, intended that there should be a cutting down of the industrial establishments of this country if it appeared in any way that they were protected by the tariff. It was openly stated by the leaders on the other side that all profits were to be disregarded. It was also stated that there was to be no protection in the bill. On one or two occasions gentlemen on the other side, and I believe the distinguished floor leader of the Democratic Party, asserted that even labor considerations were not the purpose of the bill, but that it was a revenue measure, and a revenue measure only.

WISDOM OF TARIFF LEGISLATION DOUBTED.

Many of us who come from large industrial centers, having vivid recollections of the baneful effects of a former Democratic tariff-for-revenue-only measure, had very grave doubts about the consequences of this new kind of legislation. From our point of view there did not seem to be any necessity for it. The country was prosperous. Labor was employed. Business men generally were happier than they had ever been, and there was no real occasion for interfering with the general trend of industry. But the majority of this House decided otherwise, and the bill lowering tariff duties and providing for the encouragement of imports was passed and is now the law.

It has been in operation in some respects for about six months. Perhaps there has not been a fair chance to test whether it will be a good or a bad law. It has gone far enough, however, to enable us to observe a most remarkable lack of employment for labor that was employed prior to its passage. Thousands and tens of thousands of men who were working under the operation of the old Payne law have been thrown out of employment either by reason of the agitation for the new law or because of its operation.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. MOORE. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. Why do you say there has not been sufficient time to test the effect of this new tariff law, when you had previously declared that the panic of 1893 was caused by a tariff law that was not enacted until August, 1894?

Mr. MOORE. Trouble always comes from tariff agitation. There is as much fear on the part of a business or a financial community over prospective legislation of a revolutionary character as there is over legislation actually enacted. It is the terror of legislative changes that affects the business man.

Mr. GORDON. If that is so, why has not that terror struck the American people before?

Mr. MOORE. It has struck them before; it struck them so hard in the days of Grover Cleveland that they did not forget it until the gentleman arrived in Congress. He and his younger constituents probably imagined that because the country had been restored to a prosperous condition under wise Republican legislation it would always be so, and that conditions could be changed at will by mere dreamers in tariff matters. [Applause on the Republican side.]

UNEMPLOYED PROBLEM AGAIN.

Now, Mr. Chairman, since this agitation began, and particularly since the passage of the Underwood law, there has been this condition of nonemployment, concerning which many of us had our fears. It seemed futile during the campaign period, and especially in debate in this House, to tell the younger generation just what the effect of this kind of legislation would be. All things had come so easy under a Republican administration, prosperity was so broadcast, that an unexperienced generation could not see how anybody would be so inane as to change conditions. But the Democratic Party had the courage to do it. It had been professing that it would do it for 16 years. It had to have something to go upon in its campaign for popular support, and it used the argument that the tariff—the Republican tariff—was the sum of divers kinds of evil that even Democrats themselves did not quite understand.

Mr. MADDEN. What does the gentleman think is the cause of the laying off of vast numbers of men by the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. and the reduction of the number of trains?

Mr. MOORE. I will not say that that is directly due to the tariff, but it is incidentally due to the tariff and to the condition of unrest and uncertainty that has prevailed since this tariff agitation began. And since the gentleman brings my attention to it, I will give the Democratic version of this unfortunate situation by quoting the editorial explanation of the Philadelphia Record in the issue of March 27:

The Pennsylvania Railroad—

says this friend of the Wilson administration—has laid off 15,000 men; but we doubt very much if the members of the Manufacturers' Club, or even the American Economist, will indict the Underwood tariff on this account, much as they would like to. Railroad earnings are falling off and expenses are increasing. Of course the tariff might be held responsible for the decrease in the transportation business, just as it might be for short crops or floods, but we do not believe it will be. In Chicago 156,000 men are out of work in the building trades, but there has been no increase in the importation of buildings to throw American mechanics out of their jobs. Besides, 6,000 men are on a strike, and the other 150,000 can't work till these go back.

I shall not debate with the writer of the article at this time, but submit his statement of facts concerning the nonemployment of labor as evidencing the truth of the charge that labor has suffered from nonemployment under the Underwood law as it did not suffer during the previous corresponding period under the Payne law. It should also be remembered that many of the men who voted to destroy our national business activities under the Payne law did so upon representations made by the advocates of the tariff-for-revenue policy, that protection was special to a few men and did not benefit the masses of the people. You have asked me specifically about the discharges of Pennsylvania Railroad employees. Here is some additional information about that from the Philadelphia Bulletin of last evening:

FORTY THOUSAND PENNSY MEN IDLE—ONE HUNDRED AND EIGHTEEN PASSENGER TRAINS ON LINES EAST OF PITTSBURGH ARE WITHDRAWN FROM SERVICE.

The recently announced retrenchment policy of the Pennsylvania Railroad was realized in its effect to-day by the withdrawal from service of 118 passenger trains on the lines east of Pittsburgh. About 120 passenger trains also are taken out of operation on the lines west of Pittsburgh.

Upward of 40,000 Pennsylvania employees, trainmen, enginemen, clerks, and others, are temporarily out of work because of the cutting down of the service and the recent order to all department heads to reduce their forces to the barest necessities.

At all of the offices of the Pennsylvania Railroad clerks have been laid off, at least 500 having been furloughed at Broad Street Station. Some are affected for a week or more, after which they will be allowed to resume work, while others are forced into temporary idleness.

THE ISSUE MISREPRESENTED.

Constant and insistent misinformation about protection and Republican policies led the people to elect a tariff-for-revenue administration. There certainly was no such lack of employment amongst the railroad men under the Republican system as has developed since the change took place.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Washington?

Mr. MOORE. Yes.

Mr. BRYAN. When the President's present policy produces a reduction of railroad rates by the use of the Panama Canal and the charging of tolls down there, does not the gentleman think that the railroads will be in better condition than they now are?

Mr. MOORE. I do not know whether the gentleman wants the canal closed or whether he wants it opened for the benefit of Great Britain or what his position is.

Mr. BRYAN. I was merely trying to see what was the gentleman's idea as to the reduction of those rates when tolls will be charged on the American coastwise shipping passing through the canal below the reduction that has already taken place in railroad rates.

Mr. MOORE. The gentleman will have to state his position a little more clearly to get himself within the purview of my tariff argument.

Mr. BRYAN. I guess that is true.

Mr. MOORE. Apparently the Republican Party was wrong in the eyes of the Democracy and many of the younger men of the Nation in the last campaign for maintaining too much prosperity. Because of other conditions and without regard to the tariff, the cost of living had increased the world over, but our friends on the other side made much of it and insisted that it was due in the United States to Republican mismanagement and to the operation of Republican protection. That which kept us prosperous was declared to be the sum of all evil.

COST OF LIVING HAS NOT BEEN REDUCED.

Mr. MADDEN. How much has the cost of living been lowered since the passage of the Underwood bill?

Mr. MOORE. It has not been lowered. On the contrary, it has continued to rise from the day the Underwood bill passed. Those who opposed the Republican Party upon that ground in the last campaign did so in spite of a wise administration and a real prosperity that the country is not enjoying now. The truth of the matter is that the tariff had nothing to do with the increase in the cost of living. That was a world-wide condition that came naturally and logically along with other events. It may have produced certain inequalities, subject to local regulation, but the tariff was not to blame.

Mr. COPLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. COPLEY. Has the cost of living been reduced any since the Underwood tariff bill went into effect?

Mr. MOORE. It has not. I just answered that question. The cost of living has not been reduced. The cost of living has constantly and steadily increased. Here is a recent report of the existing Department of Labor, created by the aid of Republican votes, but organized by a Democratic administration, which demonstrates clearly that during the past year the cost of living to the consumer of commodities everywhere in this country has gone up. And if there be any better evidence than that of a man's own home and fireside, or any better evidence than that afforded by purchases made by his own wife, I would like to know it, because my wife tells me, after keeping a careful account of domestic expenditures, that the price of beefsteak and pork chops and other food supplies has constantly increased since the beginning of the Democratic administration. Let any man who doubts it consult his own pocketbook.

Mr. MADDEN. And since the passage of the Democratic tariff bill?

Mr. MOORE. Yes; I have already said that, and I presume as the truth is unfolded by practical experience to those who look for a reduction in the cost of living under a Democratic system the next campaign will result in sending back here enough Republicans to change this tariff-for-revenue system that has undermined the industries of the country and interfered with the employment of our people. [Applause.]

WAGES REDUCED—LIVING COST SOARS.

Mr. MADDEN. What does the gentleman say as to the opportunity that the masses of the people of the country have had for increased employment and increased wages to meet this increased cost of living since the operation of the Underwood tariff law?

Mr. MOORE. Why, the gentleman well remembers what we heard about the "burden upon the backs of the American people," that was supposed to be placed there by a Republican protective tariff. If such a "burden" ever existed as we heard so often in this House during the last four years, it has since been increased 100 per cent, not only by raising the cost of living that the consumer has had to pay, but by reducing the wage he earns with which to pay the cost of living. He has been saddled with a double burden by reason of the infernal system of cheapness that was placed upon his back under the pretense that the "burden" of prosperity was to be removed.

Mr. SIMS. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. MOORE. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. Then, the prediction that was made that as a result of the Underwood bill farm products would go down in value has not been realized, and the protection upon farm products was a fraud, because prices have not gone down since that protection was removed?

Mr. MOORE. Is the gentleman from Tennessee speaking in the interest of the farmer, whose prices have gone down, or is he speaking in the interest of the consumer, whose prices have gone up?

Mr. SIMS. I am speaking of the prices of farm products.

DEMOCRATS STILL SEARCHING FOR A REMEDY.

Mr. MOORE. That was the question you Democrats were going to settle for the farmer, and the consumer, too, when you passed the Underwood bill; but that question is not settled and is more serious to both producer and consumer to-day than it was when you made your arguments in this Hall a year ago. The farmer generally has been getting less for his products and the man who buys them has been paying more. Did your bill remedy that situation?

Mr. SIMS. Did that condition exist before the bill was passed?

Mr. MOORE. I do not think it did; but you did not have the remedy, whether it did or did not.

Mr. SIMS. How could we have a remedy if the condition did not exist?

Mr. MOORE. Apparently you do not know the remedy, and your tariff-for-revenue law does not cover it. You are trying to find it now in antitrust bills and other legislation which continue to harass the public. You do not know the remedy. You did not know it then, and you do not know it now.

NO HORSE MEAT FOR FOOD IN AMERICA YET.

Mr. FOWLER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MOORE. I yield to my genial friend from Illinois.

Mr. FOWLER. The gentleman says that the protective tariff in America has had nothing to do with the increased cost in living. I desire to ask the gentleman if it is not a fact that the rate of increase within the last 12 years in America has been greater than that in any other country in the world except one?

Mr. MOORE. No.

Mr. FOWLER. I will put in the RECORD statistics to show that it has.

Mr. MOORE. I think the gentleman will find that even the price of horse meat for consumers in France, Belgium, and Germany has gone up coordinately with other foodstuffs in the last 10 years, and we have not yet come to that pass in the United States where we have got to eat horse meat. I believe once in a while goat meat does get in. [Laughter.]

Mr. COPLEY. Does not the gentleman believe we are headed that way?

Mr. MOORE. I think we are, under this administration; yes.

Mr. SIMS. If that is so, then the price of horses will go up, and the farmer will get something out of it.

THE AGRICULTURIST NEAR THE CITY.

Mr. GOULDEN. Will my friend yield?

Mr. MOORE. I yield to my friend from New York.

Mr. GOULDEN. I know the gentleman is an agriculturist. He says that the price of farm products has gone down, and that the price to the consumer in the city has gone up. I hope he will enlighten us how and in what particular farm products have gone down in price. I happen to be a farmer selling farm products, like the gentleman himself, and I hope he will enlighten this House wherein farm products have gone down, because mine have not gone down.

Mr. MOORE. I get the gentleman's point exactly. The gentleman is one of those agriculturists who reads the farm journals very carefully and possibly cuts out all the patent-medicine advertisements; then he goes down to his little farm next door to the city of Baltimore, where he gets the Baltimore papers in the morning, to find out what the retail price is; and then jumps into his market wagon and drives into Baltimore and gets the good old retail price. [Laughter.] But if the gentleman lived out in Nebraska and had to get his corn into Philadelphia or Baltimore, he would have a different story to tell; or if he had to lay his eggs by from April to December or get some storage man to do it, it would not be so easy. There is a vast difference between being a real farmer and a gentleman agriculturist.

Mr. GOULDEN. The gentleman's explanation is in keeping with his knowledge of actual farming and of the prices secured by the farmers of this country for their products. [Laughter.]

MULE MEAT AND DONKEY MEAT ALSO SUGGESTED.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. MOORE. I do.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Does the gentleman think that the Democratic Party is responsible for the increased price of horse meat in foreign countries?

Mr. MOORE. Relatively, yes. [Laughter.]

Mr. HELVERING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE. Pardon me a moment, please. I said to the gentleman from Illinois yes, relatively, the Democratic Party is responsible. The Democratic Party is essentially a party of low wages. The Republican Party is decidedly a party of high wages. Will the gentleman bear that in mind? We believe in high prices both in wages and in products. The Democratic Party has trained with Great Britain, Germany, and France on the wage question, and it trains with them on the price question. You believe in low prices, we believe in good prices, and if you have low prices, which enable people to get nothing better than horse meat in Belgium and France, we in the United States believe in having sirloin of beef if we can only earn enough money to buy it.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Have they begun to eat mules anywhere yet?

Mr. MOORE. They do say the Missouri mule is an animal of very fine quality, but I am not authorized to speak for that State.

Mr. KAHN. How about the Democratic donkey?

Mr. MOORE. Very good eating—perhaps. And so long as the question has arisen, especially in view of the promise that the free listing of beef would give us cheaper beef for the dinner table, let me put in the RECORD a statement from the so-called Beef Trust, the octopus that was to be shorn of its tentacles by the Democratic tariff bill. I quote from one of yesterday's papers:

NO CHEAP MEAT SAYS ARMOUR—HIGH PRICE TO CONTINUE ALL SUMMER, PREDICTS PACKER.

OMAHA, April 1.

Ogden Armour, head of the packing interests, takes a gloomy view of business conditions.

Mr. Armour has been making a tour of inspection of his packing houses and spent yesterday in Omaha. "There may be some improvement this spring," he said, "but I see no reason for believing that there will be any change for the better soon. Crop conditions I find splendid. There seems sufficient moisture in the ground to assure good yields.

"I do not look for a drop in prices of meats, either this summer or even next winter," he added. "There will be no reduction in prices of fresh meat until there are more cattle in this country."

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Of course all of the Republicans do not believe in a protective tariff; but the Republican protectionists argue in favor of high protection to keep up the price of the commodity so they could pay higher wages. The tariff was reduced and the price still remains. Does not that rather take the ground from under the argument that the high tariff kept up the price of the commodity so that the manufacturer could pay higher wages?

Mr. MOORE. No; it does not. If abuses creep in under the tariff, the tariff itself is not at fault. Under a protective system, as we understand it in the United States, wages are always higher than they are when we admit cheap-made foreign goods. A man is better off when he is working than when he is out of work. Protection helps to keep him employed by giving encouragement to those who employ him. If the tariff comes down and the price remains up, it may be due to local manipulation, but it is not due to the tariff itself. In such an event the Government loses its revenue and the laborer is not benefited. What the gentleman complains of is a matter for regulation at home. Breaking down American protection against foreign-made commodities will not help any.

THE TARIFF AND ORGANIZED LABOR.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Does not the gentleman know that the only thing that kept wages up was organized labor, and that all these tariff beneficiaries have been working against labor and trying to crush it down?

Mr. MOORE. Does the gentleman tell me that under the Democratic system for which he stands organized labor or unorganized labor is generally employed in this country to-day?

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. I think so. My information is that it is as generally employed as it usually is at this time of the year.

Mr. MOORE. May I ask the gentleman, when he makes that statement, which I think I can disprove, whether the American wage scale of organized or unorganized labor is not twice as high in this country as it is in Great Britain?

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. I have not that information.

Mr. MOORE. Then may I ask the gentleman, who speaks for organized labor as well as for Democracy, if the British workingmen are not more thoroughly organized than they are in the United States? I am putting the question to the gentleman as a fair question, because he is an expert.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. What is the gentleman's last question?

Mr. MOORE. If the laboring men in great Britain are not more thoroughly organized than they are in the United States?

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. I do not think so.

Mr. MOORE. It has been admitted by Secretary of Labor Wilson and by Mr. Morrison, of the American Federation of Labor. I ask the gentleman why it is that organized labor, which is more thoroughly organized in Great Britain, can only get one-half the wages that organized or even unorganized labor can get in the United States?

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Because they are only half as efficient.

Mr. MOORE. With all respect to the gentleman from Illinois, he simply does not know what he is talking about.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is mistaken; I do know what I am talking about.

EUROPEAN CHILD LABOR.

Mr. MOORE. The gentleman may know about the structural ironworkers, but he does not know the history of the textile industry in Germany and Great Britain. Did the gentleman hear the gentleman from New York [Mr. METZ], of his own party, on the floor the other day, when he said that the men and women in the German mills work side by side with the children, and that the child takes the place of the parent and the grandparent, and that the efficiency of the workmen is thus maintained all along and down the line? Did not the gentleman from New York also say that the American textile worker was forever and constantly looking for some other place because of the restlessness of his nature and his desire to do something better for himself?

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. I want to say to the gentleman that from the information which I have and which I think is reliable, the labor cost of the construction of a building in London by American workmen is cheaper than it is in London by London building craftsmen at their scale of wages.

FOREIGN VERSUS AMERICAN WAGES.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, as the gentleman puts it, that is an unusual statement. I do not believe American workmen work in Great Britain for less than the British workmen do.

Some building-trades wage figures reported by the Bureau of Labor in March, 1911, as coming from the British Board of Trade apply to the question raised by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN] and I shall insert them.

Figures like these do not confirm the statement of the gentleman from Illinois, nor are they calculated to cheer those who have taken to heart the new "efficiency" notions of the Democratic administration with the expectation that American business men or American workmen should be made to compete with the wit or wages of foreign countries. And now, as showing the state of unemployment in the building trades for which the gentleman assumed to speak a moment ago, I present a letter from the secretary of the Builders' Exchange of Philadelphia in response to my request for a statement comparing conditions a year ago with conditions prevailing now:

BUILDERS' EXCHANGE,
Philadelphia, March 20, 1914.

Hon. J. HAMPTON MOORE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. MOORE: Answering your inquiries of the 19th instant relative to the building trade of Philadelphia, would say:

First. The general contractors and builders are not busy, many of whom I know have comparatively nothing on hand, and very little prospects for this year; not nearly so busy as a year ago.

Second. They are not employing as many men.

Third. From 25 to 50 per cent less men employed.

Fourth. Carpenters' wages are 5 cents an hour higher than a year ago, others in proportion.

Fifth. Most building material is about the same price, excepting cement, which is higher, and 30 cents a barrel higher than it was in 1912.

Sixth. Lumber and shingles are the same price as last year, but as a rule quality poorer.

The general outlook for the building trade in Philadelphia for this coming season, so far, is not very encouraging.

Yours, very truly,

CHAS. ELMER SMITH, Secretary.

FAVORS LABOR OF FOREIGN LANDS.

Observe that work has fallen off, but that material prices have advanced or remained the same. It is the work of American workmen that has fallen off. Mark that—American workmen.

Now, I want to say that the trouble with the gentleman from Illinois is—as it is with most of his compatriots who argue the case of the Democratic Party for the workingman—that, whether inadvertently or not, they persistently advocate an economic system that favors labor in foreign lands and injures the labor of their own land.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE. Yes.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. I want to say to the gentleman that in 1908 in Chicago there was 50 per cent less labor employed in building than there was the year before. The Republican Party was in control at that time. Does the gentleman think that that was due to some Democratic administration at some other time?

Mr. MOORE. When was that?

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. In 1908.

Mr. MOORE. There was a panic in 1907, and it was not due to the tariff. Can the gentleman tell us what the condition of the money market was at that time? What was going on in the industrial world? Did business people have any incentive to build buildings? All these things are factors.

Now, gentlemen will have to excuse me. I have yielded so much time that I am in danger of neglecting the things I intended to say.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. The gentleman has not answered my question.

BUSINESS UNCERTAINTY AND DEPRESSION.

Mr. MOORE. The gentleman from Illinois does not say what the condition of the money market was at that time. To-day the business man can get all the money he wants to support any enterprise for the employment of labor at 3½ per cent, an extraordinarily low figure. But nobody wants the money under the present Democratic administration. They have not the courage to go into any enterprise; they do not want the money at any price. Few men will undertake to start a large business with the risk that confronts them now. That accounts, in great measure, for the existing state of nonemployment. Business men must have confidence in their government and their laws, or they will not risk their capital and their energy. This leads to nonemployment. Business men do not know where they are at now. That necessarily affects the wage-earner. As to the gentleman's Chicago building troubles, I can only suggest to the gentleman that lowering or raising the tariff on buildings could not have cut a very great figure, because we have not yet developed sufficiently to import buildings from abroad. His Chicago trouble was a financial, not a tariff trouble.

TRUE FACTS BEING WITHHELD.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I started to say that we had our grave doubts about the efficacy of the Underwood tariff bill. I do not want in any particular to increase the lack of confidence that prevails in the business world to-day, but I have observed, as every one of you must have observed, that there is almost a conspiracy of silence with regard to the true condition of industrial business in this country. The newspapers do not want to tell the story. They do not want to see distress added to business stagnation. But, nevertheless, thousands of men in Chicago seek employment, thousands of men in San Francisco are seeking employment, thousands of men in Philadelphia are seeking employment. There are plenty of them here in the city of Washington seeking employment, and not all of them Democrats who have been waiting 16 years to get a job, either, but men who actually need days' labor in order to get bread and butter for their families. Thousands of men in Boston are seeking employment, and many of them have gone to the soup houses. There are thousands and tens of thousands of unemployed in New York. Indeed, unemployment during the pendency of the new low-tariff bill has become one of the real problems of the large cities.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to yield to the gentleman from Ohio, but I can not now.

OPINIONS OF PRACTICAL MEN INVOKED.

This condition did not prevail last year when the agitation for a change from the Payne tariff law was under way. It did not prevail then because that law was in effect and working well; business was being conducted under it successfully and safely. Oh, some one said a little while ago perhaps we had not had a fair chance to test the new law. I may have echoed that sentiment myself. But we have had it in operation about half a year, and during that time we have seen the most complete change from happiness, prosperity, contentment, and employment everywhere to a condition of nonemployment and business uncertainty. The condition now confronting us with regard to the future is one the end of which we can not foretell.

I have taken the trouble during the last two or three weeks to invite opinions of men who are practically concerned in the operation of a tariff law. I will not have time to introduce all of them. Here and there one says that business is fairly satisfactory. Here and there one who manufactures a specialty, possibly a patented article, says he is doing well, but wherever there is competition with the cheap foreign labor brought forward by the Underwood tariff law to break down the American wage scale and depress the American workingmen, there is doubt and uncertainty as to the future. I intend to read a few of these letters, but before I do so I want to give some of the reasons for the concern that generally prevails.

CHINESE AND JAPANESE LABOR PRODUCTS.

Do we want to compete with the labor in Japan? Do we want to compete with the labor in China? We are receiving hosiery from Japan now in competition with the hosiery that is manufactured in this country.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. KAHN. In that connection and in connection with the organization of labor unions, may I be permitted to call to the gentleman's attention a quotation from the speech of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MURRAY], in which he quotes from a work by F. H. King, called Farmers of Forty Centuries; or, Permanent Agriculture in China, Korea, and Japan, in which he says:

> Everywhere we went in China the laboring people appeared generally happy and contented, if they have something to do, and showed clearly that they were well nourished. The industrial classes are thoroughly organized, having had their guilds, or labor unions, for centuries, and it is not at all uncommon for a laborer who is known to have violated the rules to be summarily dealt with and even disappear with no questions being asked.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I will supplement what the gentleman from California has just read by referring to a headline in the Public Ledger, of Philadelphia, of March 31, only two days ago, which reads, "Hosiery from Japan awakens Philadelphia knitters to possibility of new competition—Women in the Orient work for 17½ cents a day." Seventeen and a half cents a day! Do our Democratic labor friends get that? That is for hosiery from Japan.

COTTON KNITTING WAGES IN EUROPE.

Or, Mr. Chairman, suppose we take knitted cotton underwear. How do the wages compare there? I quote now from Philadelphia workmen, who submitted their data to the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee in 1911 as a protest against a reduction of duties:

The average rate of wages paid to skilled women sewing-machine operators in the United States varies from $1.50 to $2 per day. The same class of labor in France, Germany, and Switzerland receives from 30 cents to 50 cents per day.

Wages paid winders or spoolers in the United States varies from $1.50 to $1.75 per day. The same class of labor in the countries named receives from 35 cents to 40 cents per day.

Wages paid knitters in the United States varies from $1.25 to $2 per day. The same class of labor in the countries named receives from 35 cents to 75 cents per day.

Mr. Chairman, there you have a sample of the European wages with which American labor is now compelled to compete. I do not want to see that foreign wage condition overcome the United States. Surely the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN], who speaks so well for organized labor in this House, does not want to see that condition prevail, yet he consistently votes for these measures that put the American labor in competition with the labor of these countries where the wage scale is infinitesimally small in comparison with what it is here.

A MATCHING OF THE WITS.

We were speaking a while ago about the effect of the new tariff. It appears that some men who can or do not manufacture profitably begin to import. That may be so. There is less risk in importing and acting as commission men than there is in manufacturing and carrying a labor pay roll. They go abroad and investigate the markets and buy cheap foreign goods and bring them in. If they are altogether successful, they are satisfied with this Underwood tariff law. But many of them, I am persuaded, who have sent their agents into Germany and England, where the manufacturers are as shrewd as our own in the United States, and where we are compelled to match our wits against the wits of the foreign manufacturers, just as President Wilson told us to do, they have found the foreigner raising prices on all commodities that we need, sticking into their own pockets the duties which we had formerly levied against them, and which you took out of the Treasury of the United States. Thus the foreigner has the advantage of the lower wage scale, plus the American tariff duty which you removed, and you who gave it all away have added an income tax to the burden of the American people to make up our losses.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN] said that the European mechanic was inferior to the American mechanic. Does the gentleman believe that statement to be correct, in view of the fact that imported textiles are preferred to domestic textiles?

WHAT GERMAN COMPETITION IN HOSIERY MEANS.

Mr. MOORE. With regard to the hosiery imports from Germany, he is inferior only in the matter of wages. He is certainly not inferior, except as to wages, with regard to the imports of woolens and worsteds from England, and he is certainly efficient, except as to wages, with regard to certain silks and high-fashioned things from France. This is also the rule with regard to a great number of manufactures that come in from various countries on the other side and which the bargain hunter seeks in America in preference to American-made goods. At this time, in view of the interest of the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN], who is as much a friend of labor as any man in this House, I intend to show what foreign competition superinduced by a low-tariff bill means. I submit a statement prepared by Mr. C. H. Brown, of New York, special representative of the National Association of Hosiery and Underwear Manufacturers. Mark closely what he says:

The common hosiery known as the "poor man's" hose, cotton lisle, and retailing at 25 cents per pair is now entering the United States at $1.36 per dozen. The United States mills' selling price is $1.85 per dozen; the cost price, without profit, is $1.70 per dozen.

The foreign manufacturer, however, is only landing the goods at $1.36 per dozen pairs; they are selling at the American price of $1.85, and the difference, or 49 cents, is going into the pocket of the importer, jobber, and retailer, but with no difference in cost to the consumer.

Under the Payne law this class of hosiery entered at between $1.85 and $1.90 per dozen pairs.

Under the Underwood law the foreign manufacturer can undersell the American manufacturer whenever he makes up his mind to do so, but for the present he is taking all he can get.

RUSHING KNIT GOODS INTO AMERICA.

That's it, he is taking all he can get. The German manufacturer is not driving us too hard all at once, because for the present, so long as he can obtain the old American price, he is making money by saving the duty he formerly had to pay under the Payne law. Why give up a good thing so long as you can hold on to it? says the German manufacturer. Thus he matches his wits against the insufficiently protected American competitor.

Here is another statement relating to knit goods, showing how the foreigner takes advantage of the low tariff law to enter the American market. It is incredible that the American production can be thus curtailed without displacing American labor employed in the manufacture of these goods.

Imports of knit goods under Underwood law compared with same months under Payne law.

October, 1912	$307,804	October, 1913	$375,134
November, 1912	210,306	November, 1913	413,727
December, 1912	213,063	December, 1913	472,815
January, 1913	240,820	January, 1914	544,383
Total	971,993	Total	1,806,059

Eighty-five and eighth-tenths per cent increase.

And here it is fair to stop and ask if any American consumer, who was to derive so much benefit from a reduced tariff, has bought his underwear cheaper this year than he did last year when protection was still in effect?

BRINGING UP THE IMMIGRATION QUESTION AGAIN.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE. Yes.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. The gentleman ought to be fair. I was referring to the building trades. I know little about textiles, and, if the gentleman will yield further, I would like to ask him when he is talking about American and European workmen how it is he votes against restrictions of foreigners coming into this country?

Mr. MOORE. It is because, as I told the gentleman before and as I said in the debate. That is not a question of foreign goods, it is a question of flesh and blood. When a foreigner comes into the United States to better his condition he does not carry the foreign wage scale with him. He works here at the American wage or he is not welcome.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. But he keeps down the American wage.

Mr. MOORE. The admission of the immigrant is a problem of humanity. We are all immigrants or descendants of immigrants. I have stated before, and the gentleman knows, there is a vast difference between admitting men who come to America to work at an American wage and admitting goods that are manufactured at a foreign wage. If the foreigner who comes to America works at the America wage or joins the union, I presume he would be unobjectionable.

THE IMMIGRANT LEAVES THE FOREIGN WAGE SCALE BEHIND.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. He is brought here and adds to the unemployed the gentleman talks of.

Mr. MOORE. I have answered the gentleman, and the gentleman knows the answer. The gentleman can not raise that question without having it come back to smite him. As a friend of labor, he can not turn down his own flesh and blood if that flesh and blood is willing to work for the same wage that he does, or is willing to do the drudgery that he refuses to do. If we admit the foreigner, as we have done from the beginning, we admit him on our terms and not his own. We do not permit him to bring his European wage scale with him. We do not stand for the British or Japanese wage scale in this country; we do not stand for the French wage scale or that of any other country. We maintain an American wage scale here, and when a man conforms to that, whether he be native or foreign, he does all that we ask of him. Moreover, he becomes a consumer of American products and aids in the development of the country.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Does the gentleman contend that the foreigner gets the same wages here that the American does?

Mr. MOORE. As a rule, yes. My time is limited, and the gentleman has taken much of it; and, although I must close the debate with him now, I will say that the garment workers in the United States are organized in a subsidiary branch of the American Federation of Labor, and most of them are of foreign birth. They demand and obtain American wages. It is also true that most of the 400,000 miners in the United Mine Workers, which is affiliated with the American Federation of Labor, are foreign born. They work at a wage rate that is sanctioned by the unions. The gentleman will find this statement borne out if he will examine the testimony of Secretary Morrison, of the American Federation of Labor, who appeared recently before the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization in opposition to further immigration. I think it can be fairly asserted that wherever the foreign workman who has come to the United States in good faith has settled down to his work he manages to get as much pay as the native workman for the same kind of work. I venture that as a general proposition.

FOODSTUFFS COMING FROM ABROAD.

Now, the average business man——

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I thought he yielded to me.

Mr. MOORE. But I do not now have time to yield further.

I suggested a moment ago that the average manufacturer or business man will doubtless find something to do if during the pendency of the new law he finds it unprofitable to continue in business and employ labor. Some of them have already gone into the foreign market to buy goods made by foreign labor at the cheap foreign wage, and they have begun to bring that stuff into the United States. Others engaged in the business of importers are increasing their foreign orders and preparing to avail themselves of every advantage offered by the American market. One day's arrivals at the port of Philadelphia affords an example of the new order of things. I read from one of the daily papers:

Arrivals of foreign wool at Philadelphia yesterday were 1,500 bales. Among the consignees were the Roosevelt Worsted Mills, the Genesee Roof Manufacturing Co., John P. Holt.

Pray tell me why these American business men might not have bought the wool from Colorado farmers or from Montana farmers? On the same day—

Noils which last week were bought in Philadelphia for Bradford, England, also are being imported with wool tops and woolen yarns.

These are manufactures. They are woolen products. They are what have been manipulated by the hand of the workman in various stages, work that ought to have been done in the United States. What shall you say to the spinners of the United States who could have made those particular noils that were imported at that one port? The men who made them were employed in England, in Bradford; they are not employed here. The American workmen who might have had the job may, perhaps, be found amongst those who are walking the streets seeking employment.

Here is another:

The Philadelphia Pickling Co. and F. H. Fromm, importers of 200 barrels of sauerkraut, and mackerel are in for Thomas Roberts & Co.

WHERE DOES THE CONSUMER BENEFIT?

Great Scott! has it come to this? Listen, please. What will the farmers say when they learn that the people of the Atlantic seaboard have gone abroad to get their sauerkraut? Will it please the good old Pennsylvania Dutchmen who make the best sauerkraut in the world and who ought to have this market? What, too, has become of the fishermen who used to catch the mackerel off the coast? Must we go abroad to buy those things? This is under the Underwood tariff bill in active operation. We are getting these food commodities abroad now because production by foreign labor is cheaper. The list of imports which I hold in my hand is not confined to wool and sauerkraut and mackerel. Sugar-beet seed and shelled peanuts are in the list; crockery from Belgium and cloth from Great Britain. Could not we grow them or make them in this country? And does the consumer get them cheaper because of a reduction of the tariff? Gentlemen, they never reach the consumer until the foreigner has been paid, and until the importer and the department store and the retailer and the advertiser and the distributor all along the line have had their whack at it. And when the confiding consumer gets it, under the benevolent influence of a tariff-for-revenue only, he finds that the duty that the Government sacrificed for him, was absorbed before he got it, and that the price is about the same as it always was, or just a little more.

FRESH (?) EGGS FROM CHINA AND RUSSIA.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MOORE. For just one question.

Mr. KAHN. Does the gentleman know that eggs are now coming from China by the hundreds of thousand dozens?

Mr. CARTER. Those are china eggs. [Laughter.]

Mr. KAHN. Chinese eggs.

Mr. MOORE. Eggs are coming from China supposedly fresh and broken and frozen in cakes of ice. They are going into the great cities, where the bakers turn them into bread and cake for the consumer, who does not know what he is getting. I presume he believes he is getting genuine simon-pure American eggs. Eggs are also being imported from Germany and Russia. And so long as the gentleman has called attention to the subject, I am reminded that one of the Philadelphia papers to-day reports the condemnation as rotten of 9,000 dozen of a total cargo of 14,000 dozen eggs brought into this country from Russia for the delectation of American breakfast tables.

It may interest the American farmer to know that up to the 1st of March, according to the latest bulletin of the Department of Commerce, 3,362,495 dozen foreign eggs have been admitted under the free-trade provision of the new Democratic tariff law.

ANOTHER PROOF OF LOW FOREIGN WAGES.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman permit an interruption for just a moment?

Mr. MOORE. I will.

Mr. COOPER. I desire at this point to call the gentleman's attention to something in a speech of a Democratic Member of the House, the Hon. WILLIAM H. MURRAY, of Oklahoma, page 6119 of the RECORD. This is a quotation from Dr. King's book of a statement made in an official report by Consul General Williams, one of our consuls in China. United States Consul General Williams says:

As to the price of labor in this part of China, we learned through United States Consul General Williams that a master mechanic may receive 21.5 cents a day—

That is practically 21½ cents a day for a master mechanic. They have expert mechanics in China—and a journeyman 7.75 cents gold.

That is less than 8 cents a day.

BETTER FOR JOHN BULL THAN FOR UNCLE SAM.

Mr. MOORE. I thank the gentleman from Wisconsin for this Democratic authority. It is the same old story of cheap foreign labor, a condition which confronts the American workingman under the present low tariff. Why, gentlemen, a woolen manufacturer, who is also an importer of wool, an Englishman by birth and tradition, who does an extensive business in the United States and still retains his establishment in the old country, which I am told is one of the greatest in the whole world, who deals in the wools of Australia and the wools of Argentina, as well as the wools of the United States, told me in Philadelphia on Saturday night last, that the only difference he found in the Underwood tariff bill, in so far as it affected his business, was that he had found it advisable to transplant the larger part of his working force from the United States to Great Britain. The law increased his business there, while it reduced his force here, but he held the American market just the same.

IMPORTS THE PRODUCT OF CHILD LABOR.

Mr. WILLIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. WILLIS. In connection with what the gentleman was just saying, I wondered whether his attention has been called to the statement made in the House the other day by a very distinguished Democrat, the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LEWIS], in opposing an amendment to exclude the products of child labor, in which he said that probably one-half of many imports under the present tariff law were the products of child labor.

Mr. MOORE. I realize the importance of what the gentleman says, and, although I have not the time to go into it now, I stop to say that the Democratic Party, through the Labor Committee, of which the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LEWIS] is chairman, had a fine opportunity when that convict-labor bill was up to bar unfair manufactured goods that come into competition with goods made by fair labor in the United States. That gave them an opportunity.

Mr. WILLIS. And they did not seize it.

Mr. MOORE. No. The convict-labor bill gave them the opportunity to say whether they were opposed to the importation of commodities to the consumer in the United States that were made by child labor, which is prohibited in the United States. They were further given an opportunity to say whether they would forbid the importation into this country of goods made by labor employed more than eight hours a day, which they oppose in the United States. But when called to book and given an opportunity to vote, they voted—the Labor Committee and all—in favor of the admission into this country of commodities made by child labor abroad that compete with honest American labor, and of goods made abroad by labor employed more than eight hours a day, contrary to the doctrine they have been preaching with respect to American conditions.

THE PRICE OF WOOL AT HOME AND ABROAD.

Mr. THACHER. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. MOORE. I will.

Mr. THACHER. The gentleman referred a few moments ago to the importation of wool from Argentina and Australia. Is the gentleman aware that at the present time, in spite of the fact that the duty of 11 cents per pound has been removed, wool is selling in Montana and elsewhere higher than a year ago—in spite of that importation?

Mr. MOORE. I think that is due to a speculative condition. Coming from the hub of the universe, and perhaps the center of the wool trade in the United States, the gentleman certainly can not object to giving the farmers a fair price.

Mr. THACHER. I think the farmer is getting a fair price, considering the international conditions. But the price of domestic wool has gone up, in spite of the free importation of wool.

Mr. MOORE. I want to show you how this matter works. We were once asked to take the duty off of hides to reduce the price of shoes to the consumer. The price of hides went up and the price of shoes did not go down. The Government lost the revenue. Evidently it went to somebody between the producer and the consumer. In that instance the tariff had no effect upon the price. Now we have made wool free and the gentleman says the price of wool has gone up. As the gentleman says, there is an "international condition" in the wool trade. The price of wool has gone up all over the world.

ADVANTAGE IS AGAIN WITH THE FOREIGNER.

The foreigner saw the advantage of the reduction in the American tariff and prepared to avail himself of it. He desired to sell us cloths and woolen goods. The foreign demand for wool increased and the price went up. The American importer put in his demands and for a time the American bonded warehouses were filled to bursting. It would be strange if prices did not advance under such a movement. To a certain extent that was speculation incident to a tariff change. Under such circumstances it was only natural that the American woolgrower should go along with the general trend. But the benefit is decidedly foreign, and how long the American condition thus described will continue remains to be seen. There is a very pronounced adherence to the "watchful-waiting" policy in the wool trade. The importers and those who have large quantities of wool on hand are more optimistic than the manufacturers who buy the wool; and if the manufacturers are compelled to meet the foreign competition in woolen goods made under foreign wage conditions, it is doubtful if they will need as much wool, either foreign or domestic, as heretofore.

AN OMINOUS LOOKING CHART.

Fortunately, I happen to have before me an extract from the Weekly Wool Chart, of Bradford, England, which bears upon this matter. It will be surprising to American farmers and manufacturers to observe these British figures showing the success of the foreign campaign for the American market under the new tariff bill. Examine these figures and then tell me, if you can, how long American mills can stand the tremendous increase in competitive woolens and dress goods imports.

Board of trade returns for United Kingdom gives exports to United States of America, published in the Weekly Wool Chart (Bradford England) of March 12, 1914, as follows:

Exports to United States.

FEBRUARY.

	1914	1913	Increase.
			Per cent.
Worsted yarns.....pounds..	123,000	None.	.....
Worsted cloth.....yards..	2,742,000	381,000	619
Woolen cloth.....do....	699,000	220,000	218

JANUARY AND FEBRUARY.

Worsted yarns.....pounds..	230,000	9,000	2,455
Worsted cloth.....yards..	6,962,000	1,787,000	290
Woolen cloth.....do....	1,681,000	548,000	207

What else does this chart show, if it does not demonstrate the generous treatment the Underwood law has accorded to British manufacturers against the manufacturers of the United States? And even if the American woolgrower managed to sell some of his raw material to the British manufacturer, what satisfaction does he get out of the displacement of American labor engaged in the manufacture of these worsted and woolen yarns and cloths? The American farmer's best market is in the United States and it avails him nothing to aid in reducing the purchasing power of that market.

INCREASE PERCENTAGES THAT STARTLE.

And here is another chart which is well worth perusal. Look at the percentages of increase in imports. How it must delight the shrewd business men of England, Germany, and France to watch the steady growth of their hold upon the American market!

Weekly Wool Chart, March 12, 1914, published at Bradford, England, gives exports to port of New York (goods taken out of bond):

Exports to port of New York.

WOOL CLOTHS.

	January, 1914.	January, 1913.	Increase.
			Per cent.
From France.....	£31,900	£3,100	930
From Germany.....	86,100	1,500	5,640
From Great Britain.....	193,000	59,600	224

DRESS GOODS.

			Per cent.
From France.....	£91,700	£16,000	473
From Germany.....	53,400	8,600	521
From Great Britain.....	78,500	3,900	1,913

And bear in mind we are losing revenue all the while this foreign business development in the wool trade is going on—losing the tariff and cutting down our pay rolls while the foreign-made merchandise is coming to us at the American price.

OPTIMISM IN THE DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE.

Mr. Chairman, I am aware the Department of Commerce, through our former colleague, the Secretary of Commerce, Mr. Redfield, is sounding a note of optimism. His firm belief in the "efficiency" of the American workman to combat the handicap of the foreign wage scale and overhead charges is echoing throughout the land in a press so buoyant that it seems like "whistling to keep its courage up"; but the reckoning has not yet come. The Secretary tells us to be of good cheer, but now and then the official consular reports that issue from his own department present a note of discord. The gratification of the foreigner is hard to conceal. Glimpses of his wonderful activity since the American imposed upon himself a low tariff, occasionally breaks forth. In the Daily Consular and Trade Reports of Monday, March 23, 1914, we obtain a view of the situation in Huddersfield. Here it is:

ENGLISH WOOLEN-MILL TRADE IMPROVEMENT.

[Consul Franklin D. Hale, Huddersfield, March 3.]

The general improvement in business and the more hopeful attitude of manufacturers that have been noticed since the beginning of the year continues, and although there is not yet anything in the nature of a trade boom, present operations are much more favorable than at any time since October, 1913. The outlook for 1914 seems most encouraging. There is a brisk demand for fancy tweeds and serges in the home market; but fancy worsteds are in only moderate demand owing to high prices. This is perhaps more than offset by a greatly improved continental trade and the great expansion in the general textile trade with the United States.

There is no doubt that Huddersfield manufacturers are benefiting materially by the new American tariff. Many of the mills are again on full time after many weeks of depression. The value of all kinds of textile goods invoiced through this consulate to the United States in February, 1914, exceeded by $199,000 the exportation of similar goods during the same month of 1913.

I cite this case of Huddersfield because, while "many of the mills are again on full time" there, I shall show later on that many of the mills in America are not now so fortunate.

MR. REDFIELD'S CHEERFUL SPEECHES.

Now, Mr. Chairman, referring once more to the cheerful optimism of the Secretary of Commerce, Mr. Redfield, I take up the Consular Trade Reports of Saturday, March 7. Here we find a very interesting report from Germany. The consul at Kehl gives us this information, and the editor, evidently conforming to the spirit of his superior officer, labels it "Increase not due to tariff." Well, let us see whether the increase is due to the tariff or not. Sometimes you know the headlines are not borne out by the body of the article. In this case they surely are not, for, although the department headline repels the notion that the new tariff is responsible for the increase of imports, the text declares it is. Here is what the consul reports, despite the editorial opinion expressed in the headline, which is carried along for illustrative purposes:

INCREASE NOT DUE TO TARIFF.

The increased value of exports to the United States in 1913 was largely attributable to the shipment of potash fertilizer salts, $584,189, which have not formerly been invoiced at this consulate and have been produced here only during the last two years. There was also a considerable increase in the exports of textiles, the amount for 1913 being $343,763 greater than in 1912, which was the record year. During the second and third quarters of the year the exportation fell off considerably, but in the last three months the increase was sufficient to bring up the total for the year to the highest figures for textiles ever reached at this consulate.

The increase in the declared exports of textiles to the United States in 1913—they having an aggregate value of $2,280,875 in that year, contrasted with $1,937,112 in 1912, $1,514,293 in 1911, $1,136,206 in 1910, $1,110,025 in 1909, and $474,463 in 1908—may be regarded as a normal growth of the textile trade with that country and not as specially due to the reduction of the American tariff, although doubtless the tariff had something to do with it. In the last quarter of the year the fact that several firms that had not previously been shipping textiles to the United States began to do business with American importers indicates that an increasing business in this line of goods is to be anticipated under the revised tariff.

As the foregoing table shows, there was a material increase in the declared exports of calfskins and cow and ox hides, while rabbit and hare skins were not exported to the United States at all in 1913. It is probable that Leipzig gets a portion of the hare-skin trade that was formerly done here. The sale of hops to the United States increased.

Therefore although these German textiles found an increased American market in competition with American textiles, and the optimistic department says the increase was "not due to tariff," the consul making the report says "the tariff had something to do with it."

ACCEPTING THE DUTIES WE SURRENDER.

Mr. Chairman, my opinion is that good reason exists for preaching optimism. The foreign manufacturer has been getting in his work and the American manufacturer in textiles especially, is not sure of his ground.

Here is the letter of an American importer, forwarded to me, and which I shall not have time to read, in regard to chemicals, colors, and so forth. He tells the jobber in the United States that he wants his trade, but that "it will not be made any easier by this reduced tariff." It will not make easier in this particular because the foreign price for goods to the United States has gone up. The foreign price has been raised to match the duty we took down.

ANOTHER "MATCHING OF WITS."

But showing further how the foreign manufacturer improved upon the opportunities of the Underwood tariff law, I shall quote a letter written to me at my request by Mr. Charles M. Biddle, one of the most respected citizens of New Jersey, who has a large business place in Philadelphia:

BIDDLE HARDWARE CO.,
Philadelphia, June 2, 1913.

Hon. J. HAMPTON MOORE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Confirming conversation I had with you a few days ago, I send you the following quotation from a letter written May 9, 1913, by a German importer, returning the conditional order that we placed with them for 200 dozen pocket knives, to be sent us under the proposed revised tariff.

The order was placed at the price that they were being sold for under the present duties (Payne law). You will notice that they proposed to increase the price about 50 per cent, which will even more than cover the difference in duty between the present and proposed.

"MAY 9, 1913.

"GENTLEMEN: We were unable to place this order abroad; the fact is, that they want an advance of nearly 50 per cent of what we paid for it before. This will give you an idea of what the situation is in Solingen regarding prices on German knives.

"We regret we are compelled to cancel your specification, and trust you will make note of same on your records.

"Very truly, yours."

In other words, Mr. Chairman, our German brothers say: "You may lower your tariffs, thank you; but that does not necessarily mean that you will lower your values in the United States. You have taken down the bar which you had against our goods coming into the United States, thank you; but do you think we are foolish enough to keep our prices down just because you took the duty off? If your Government did not want the revenue you took from us, and you insist upon giving it away, it looks good to us, and we will keep it on our side of the water." [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

ANOTHER INSTANCE OF OUR GREAT GENEROSITY.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. MOORE. I thank the gentleman from Iowa. Mr. Chairman, here is another illustration. The gentleman from whom I now quote was one of the most independent of Republicans in the last campaign, and had no especial inclination to oppose anybody who was undertaking a revision of the tariff. He was engaged, however, in carpet manufacturing. I asked him what effect the Underwood bill was having upon his business. Mr. James Pollock—for that is the name of the gentleman—for the Pollock-Huston Co., carpet manufacturers, Dauphin and Tulip Streets, Philadelphia, under date of March 16 last, replied:

I beg leave to say that it [the Underwood law] has not been beneficial. As you are aware, it is very important to get raw material at the minimum price. For this purpose the Underwood bill put wool on the free list, and it took 4 and 7 cents per pound duty off, which the Government loses; and we pay the same price for the woolen yarn as we did before the duty was taken off; and because we expected to get yarns at a reduced price we were compelled to reduce the price of our goods 5 per cent, which is just so much more profit to the department stores, as the goods are retailed at the same price.

We are paying the highest price we have ever paid for linen, jute, and cotton yarns; in fact, we have had no relief at all under the operation of the new bill.

The wages remain the same, as our industry is all organized in labor unions, and any move in that direction would only cause trouble and strikes.

We have not had time to feel the effects of foreign goods yet, as it takes them some time to get our designs and colorings and qualities suitable to the American markets. This will come along in due time, perhaps too soon for the workman and working woman. When that time arrives wages will have to be reduced to meet that competition. "The worst is yet to come."

As our looms are made in England, we have had to pay 45 per cent duty to the Government to get them. Under the new bill the duty is 25 per cent, so we have had to charge off the 20 per cent reduction, which makes our plant worth that much less, and prevents us competing with the English manufacturer, who pays no duty at all, and with a new manufacturer, who will get his looms at the reduced duty.

Our carpets and rugs are made out of foreign wools, and the owners of these wools have taken the 4 and 7 cents per pound that went to the revenues of the country.

IT'S THE FOREIGNER WHO GETS IT.

So there you have it from a practical man. When you take the duty off the foreigner who sells you the raw material gets it, or the department store or some one else gets it, and the price to the consumer is the same.

Mr. PAYNE. I think the gentleman ought to mention there the fact that carpet wools are not produced in the United States, but are all imported for the manufacture of our carpets.

Mr. MOORE. That is correct. I thank the gentleman for referring to it.

Mr. PAYNE. So that we are simply taking this from our Treasury and putting it into the hands of the foreigners.

Mr. MOORE. That is exactly it. We are robbing ourselves to enrich them, and that is the whole effect thus far of the Democratic tariff bill.

"The worst is yet to come," says Mr. Pollock. He fails to indulge the spirit of optimism on the basis of efficiency as manifested by the Secretary of Commerce.

CARPET MILLS RUNNING SHORT-HANDED.

Here is another letter, from a large concern engaged in manufacturing carpets in Philadelphia:

Replying to your inquiry concerning business conditions, we regret that we are compelled to report them very unsatisfactory. We have been running a part of our machinery only four days a week for many months; the production is not more than half of the maximum and no present outlook for improvement. As our business extends to about every State and Territory, this would seem to indicate the general business conditions over the country.

This letter is dated March 12. I do not use the name of the firm because it does not want to have the story told. From two of the largest employers of labor in the carpet world I have letters confirming the general statement of slackness in the industry. They are as follows:

JOHN BROMLEY & SONS,
OFFICE, LEHIGH AVENUE BELOW FRONT STREET,
Philadelphia, March 9, 1914.

Hon. J. HAMPTON MOORE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In answer to yours of the 7th instant, addressed to Mr. John H. Bromley, beg to say that the usual number of people are employed, but they are not working full time. According to our reports they are making about 20 per cent less time than usual and at this time a year ago.

Yours, truly,
JOHN BROMLEY & SONS.

FALLS OF SCHUYLKILL CARPET AND PLUSH MILLS,
Philadelphia, March 11, 1914.

Hon. J. HAMPTON MOORE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: In answer to your inquiry of March 7, addressed to John & James Dobson, Falls of Schuylkill, Pa., I beg to reply as follows:

There are in the John & James Dobson Corporation several distinct plants. The Bradford Mills are running about 70 per cent of their machinery at the present time. A much larger quantity was stopped during the preceding 12 months; in fact, only about 25 per cent was running.

In our plush department we have been and are still running to capacity.

The carpet department is running full time, with about 20 per cent of the looms stopped.

The blanket and cloth mills are the least satisfactory of all; there not more than 20 per cent of the looms and machinery are running to capacity.

Believe me to be,
Very respectfully, yours,

JOHN & JAMES DOBSON (INC.),
Per ARTHUR SPENCER.

SILK INDUSTRY ACTIVE: WOOL DRAGGING.

In the silk industry, Mr. Chairman, there seems to be a better tone. The demand for dress goods is running to specialties, and both importers and manufacturers of such goods appear to be getting along fairly well. But that is a matter of taste; even the tango is said to have its effect upon this line of industry. My correspondence indicates, however, that the changes of style are always watched with great concern. The optimism in the silk field may be contrasted with wool and woolens, the more substantial and essential commodity. One of the largest firms, which does not care to be named at this time, says:

The unemployment in the woolen and worsted industry at this time is probably about 20 per cent of the normal total. This indicates an unsatisfactory condition, as the manufacturing costs in this industry are predicated on full employment.

As compared with December 1, there has been a slight gain in activity, the unemployment at that time being about 25 per cent. This slight gain is a temporary situation, due to the necessity of supplying customers with their initial deliveries for sample requirements.

Present indications point to a progressively increasing proportion of unemployment from the middle of April onward, probably reaching the maximum by the latter part of June.

As will be observed, the pay roll is the serious question with these mill owners. They want to maintain their organizations. They can not do it by laying off their hands. How can they keep their hands employed, if foreign competition absorbs their market?

BUSINESS LETTERS FOR THOUGHTFUL MEN.

Since I will not have time to read them, I submit herewith a series of letters from men who know what they are talking about on this question of employment and the tariff. I trust these letters will aid the House and the country to a better understanding of the difficulties that confront the men who have the courage, under adverse legislation, to keep the wheels of industry going. These letters were not sent at the volition of the writers. They are not seeking to tell of the disadvantages under which they conduct their business. They were requested by me because, as a representative of the people believing in the protection of American industries, I desired to have the Congress know at first hand what it means to industry to lower our standards on the pretense of obtaining cheap commodities from foreign lands.

LETTERS RELATING TO THE EFFECT OF THE DEMOCRATIC TARIFF LAW UPON THE WOOL, WORSTED, AND WOOLEN INDUSTRIES.

JAMES DOAK, JR., CO.,
Philadelphia, March 9, 1914.

Hon. J. HAMPTON MOORE,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Your letter of inquiry of the 7th instant in regard to the present status of the worsted spinning industry has been received.

At the present moment our factory is running full time, with a maximum complement of help. It is doubtful how long this will continue.

Sufficient business was secured to keep all our help employed and to meet the flood of foreign competition, but at a sacrifice of all profit.

This state of affairs can not endure and the alternative is approaching of closing down our plant in the face of increasing imports or reducing wages.

The Democrats demanded a reduction in the profits of manufacturers. To this extent their new tariff law has been a success. Profits are eliminated, but with absolutely no resultant benefit to the consumer.

Yours, very truly,

JAMES DOAK, JR., CO.

THOS. WOLSTENHOLME SONS & CO. (INC.),
Philadelphia, Pa., March 11, 1914.

Mr. J. HAMPTON MOORE,
United States House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The writer is in receipt of your favor of the 7th instant, inquiring how the new tariff law has affected us. In giving you my straight, fair, and honest opinion, will say it has been very disastrous, indeed.

I presume for the last 8 or 10 years we have operated night work. Toward the close of last year, October or November, we entirely suspended all night work, and there is absolutely no chance of ever starting it up again. Not only that, we have had to suspend considerable of our daytime force. This, you will naturally see, runs up our overhead expenses, and unless things improve I am afraid it will be entirely necessary for us to close our plant in the daytime, with the exception of just one mill.

The people whose business we have had year after year have imported yarns from the other side cheaper than we can make them.

No doubt our next corporation tax to the Government will prove more clearly the situation than anything we can say.

Yours, very truly,

ROBERT WOLSTENHOLME.
GEO. C. HETZEL CO.,
Chester, Pa., March 13, 1914.

Hon. J. HAMPTON MOORE,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. MOORE: Several days' absence accounts for the delay in replying to your inquiry of the 7th instant.

I can not speak specifically as to the percentage of production of other manufacturers in our line of business, but we are running about 60 per cent of capacity.

I can recall no year since 1896 when this mill was not running to its full capacity in the month of March.

Ever since the extra session of Congress was convened to enact a so-called competitive tariff the wool-manufacturing business has suffered, and suffered severely.

The uncertainty as to the outcome of the interminable discussions in Congress destroyed confidence in values so that purchases were curtailed, and the final enactment of the tariff bill has completely demoralized the market. Wherever goods have had a free sale since January 1 it has been only at the sacrifice of profit or at actual loss.

The amount of wages paid in our mill in 1913 was over 21 per cent less than in 1912.

This does not represent a reduction in the rate of wages, but a reduction from full-time employment which, so far as the employees' income is concerned, is the same thing—and there was no reduction in their cost of living.

The exports of wool manufactures from England alone for the months of January and February, 1914, were three and three-fourths times the exports for January and February of 1913.

This means a corresponding loss of home production and home employment.

I look for these exports to increase as the foreign wool manufacturers become more familiar with the requirements of the American market.

A duty that is low enough to permit such imports as these is low enough to permit a volume limited only by the capacity of the foreign woolen factories.

Yours, sincerely,

GEO. C. HETZEL.

WM. B. RILEY & CO., MANUFACTURERS,
Philadelphia, March 11, 1914.

Hon. J. HAMPTON MOORE,
House of Representatives, United States, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. MOORE: Yours of March 9 duly received. So far as our business is concerned, we find ourselves very much behind, and the outlook with us is not at all reassuring.

We feel that a great many goods that heretofore have been made on this side of the Atlantic that come within the range of our business will be imported.

Very truly, yours,

WM. B. RILEY.

MURPHY & BRO.,
Philadelphia, March 9, 1914.

Hon. J. HAMPTON MOORE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Agreeable to your letter of the 7th, we would advise you that we find conditions in the textile business to be anything but satisfactory. Before the new tariff law went into effect it was fully anticipated, and business has not recovered. We are running full time but about 60 per cent of the equipment. We have been shown samples of foreign goods at prices that would make it absolutely impossible for any American manufacturer to produce them.

Yours, truly, MURPHY & BRO.

REPRESENTATIVES OF THE HOSIERY INDUSTRY IN THE UNITED STATES TELL OF THE LOW TARIFF'S EFFECTS UPON THEIR BUSINESS—THE ADVANTAGE GIVEN TO THE FOREIGN COMPETITOR.

The same story of uncertainty and unemployment is told with very great frequency. The hosiery business seems to be one that is particularly marked for slaughter under the new system. The following letters from representatives of the trade best tell of existing conditions:

CHAS. CHIPMAN'S SONS,
New York, March 13, 1914.

Hon. J. HAMPTON MOORE,
House of Representatives of United States, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. MOORE: I am in receipt of your inquiry of the 12th and in reply would state that our mills have been fairly busy up to the present time. I noticed, however, during the past month a great falling off of business on everything except the cheapest grade of goods. My explanation of this is that the hosiery buyers all over the country are holding up their purchases and not buying anything that they don't have to have at the moment, pending their annual trips to Europe, which occurs during the months of May and June.

As far as the hosiery business is concerned, the fact that the American people have recently taken to wearing silk hosiery, especially the cheaper grades, has been the one thing that has saved us. If the demand for cotton goods should come up that we had two or three years ago on anything above 15-cent goods, our mills would be practically out and I am fearful with the new tariff law that next season a great many 15-cent goods will be imported. The facts of the case are, we have not had time to feel the blow which this bill is going to hand us. The goods we are delivering were bought last June, July, and August, and I personally think that inside of one year we will find ourselves high and dry for business on anything over these cheap goods, with the exception of the silk goods, which we hope to be able to hold the market on.

Most popular 25-cent goods are manufactured out of a combination artificial silk and cotton, and a great many 50-cent goods out of a combination of artificial and Japan silk. Now, under the Underwood bill, artificial silk takes an ad valorem duty instead of specific, and the numbers of silk which are largely used in our industry, namely Nos. 120 and 130 Den., costs more under the Underwood bill than it did under the Payne bill, and the only accounts that are cheaper are the very heavy accounts, which are used in very small quantities. All of these silks are controlled by one concern, viz, the American Viscose Co., with the exception of a different process silk which is called "Tobays," which is not suitable for the knitting industry on account of its weakness.

We had contracts for this silk from abroad at $1.88 per pound under the Payne bill, with the understanding if the duty should be changed, we should have the benefit of it. Under the Underwood bill they want to charge us 3 cents more per pound, saying this was the difference. We made a strenuous fight and succeeded in maintaining the price the same. Notwithstanding these facts, our duty has been cut, as you know, on the finished article.

Very respectfully, yours,

F. L. CHIPMAN.

Mr. J. HAMPTON MOORE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

HONORABLE SIR: Inclosed please find some figures taken from our books at this particular time, which speak for themselves:

During the period of three months, including December, January, and February and ending March 1, 1913, we paid out to our employees $54,946. For the same period ending March 1, 1914, we paid out $46,213, making a difference of $8,733. This difference, if continued for a year, would mean that our employees would receive $34,932 less for a period of one year under the present conditions as compared to the conditions during 1913.

Please note that this time one year ago our mill was running 100 per cent full; to-day we are operating exactly 70 per cent of our machinery.

Yours, very truly,

JOHN BLOOD & CO.,
ROBERT C. BLOOD.

Hon. J. HAMPTON MOORE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. MOORE: I am in receipt of your favor of the 7th instant, and in reply beg to say that the goods we are manufacturing in our mill at the present time are orders taken prior to the passage of the Underwood bill. We have received no orders of any amount on our cotton, lisle, or mercerized hose such as we have been in the habit of getting from our trade. It would seem to us as if the buyers were waiting to see what the foreign market was going to be on this class of merchandise. If it were not for some orders we have on silk goods, on which there is no competition in Germany and which the tariff does not affect, our mill would be closed. If anybody says that our business has been prospering since the Underwood bill went into effect, they do not state the truth. We have received a number of cancellations amounting to many thousands of dozens since the Underwood bill went into effect on cotton, lisle, and mercerized goods. This is due to the fact, as written above, the buyers are interested in knowing what the foreign market is going to do. They all have the impression that goods are going to be cheaper, and consequently are cancelling from every direction where it is possible to do so. This is the correct situation in our mill at the present time.

Yours, very truly,

W. PARK MOORE, Treasurer.

BERKSHIRE KNITTING MILLS,
Reading, Pa., March 18, 1914.

Mr. J. HAMPTON MOORE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Your kind letter of the 12th was duly received and answer delayed on account of the absence of the writer.

Our Mr. Oberlaender was in Chemnitz, the chief center of German hosiery manufacture, during November and December of last year investigating conditions, and found that the German manufacturers had advanced their prices all along the line as soon as the Underwood bill passed. In other words, they were smart enough to discount the conditions by raising the price on account of the lower rate of duty. The American buyers generally held off, but there can not be the slightest doubt that importations will increase, as the imports for last month will indicate.

In our business we unhesitatingly give you the following figures on our mercerized hosiery: 1913, orders on hand for February delivery, 35,147 dozen; 1914, orders on hand for February delivery, 7,092 dozen; 1913, orders on hand for March delivery, 41,101 dozen; 1914, orders on hand for March delivery, 5,935 dozen; and we are willing to make an affidavit as to their correctness.

Relative to employment, we have been able to keep the mill going on full time by working on stock in the hope that with the opening of spring business we will be able to dispose of the same. Of course if this revival should not take place, something will have to be done in May and later.

Very truly, yours,

BERKSHIRE KNITTING MILLS,
G. OBERLAENDER,
Secretary and Treasurer.

GLOBE KNITTING MILLS,

Hon. J. HAMPTON MOORE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Replying to your favor of the 7th instant, the writer delayed answering your letter, thinking he might have better news for you or something more definite.

The latter part of 1913 business fell off and was worse with us than it had been for some years. About the first of the year, or a little after, business picked up somewhat and we were encouraged and commenced to think we were going to have a fairly good business in spite of the low tariff, but a few weeks ago business again fell off and it is now practically at a standstill with us. We have been trying to hold our organization together by running up stock, but we have now about reached the limit. All the future orders we have, to be delivered away up into next fall, are finished and packed up ready for shipment, and practically nothing coming in. For that reason our dyehouse and press-room have been doing almost nothing for the last couple of weeks. This is very annoying to us, as we lose our help, which we have trained. For the last week or 10 days we have been debating almost every day whether we shall run our factory part time or close down entirely for a while. As much as we dislike to do either, because of disrupting our organization, if we do not get business very soon we will be compelled to do it; and if we do, it will be the first time that we have stopped for the want of orders since during Cleveland's last administration.

Yours, very respectfully,

RAMBO & REGAR (Inc.),

Philadelphia, March 16, 1914.

Hon. J. HAMPTON MOORE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Answering your inquiry as to business conditions at this time, wish to say that same are anything but good. We have received no business of any account on our cotton goods since the Underwood bill went into effect. On the contrary, our customers have canceled large quantities and held us up otherwise on deliveries. This time last year we were sold ahead on cottons from 10 to 12 months, and now, if it were not for our silk business, on which Germany can not compete with us, we would be very dull, as the trade is holding off from buying cotton goods, expecting to get much lower prices from our competitors in Germany.

Very truly, yours,

BROWN-ABERLE CO.,

RADMOOR MILLS, THOS. E. BROWN & SONS,
Philadelphia, March 10, 1914.

J. HAMPTON MOORE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We have your letter of March 7, and take pleasure in advising you as follows:

Our seamless-hosiery plant has been practically at a standstill since the new tariff has gone into operation. As you possibly know, we are both full-fashioned and seamless manufacturers, while the greatest portion of our production is full-fashioned.

Our production on seamless hosiery which we above refer to is from 300 to 400 dozen per day. This affects about 50 employees.

Other hosiery manufacturers in Philadelphia must be in equally as bad shape, or worse than we are, because almost daily we have from a dozen to two dozen applicants at our mill, whereas prior to this time it was always necessary for us to advertise for help.

Yours, very truly,

THOS. E. BROWN & SONS,

UPHOLSTERY MANUFACTURERS, GLOVE MAKERS, AND OTHERS REPORT ACTUAL CONDITIONS AS INFLUENCED BY TARIFF LEGISLATION.

Here are several other reports affecting industries where labor is feeling the effects of tariff depression:

BURK BROS.,
Philadelphia, March 9, 1914.

Hon. J. HAMPTON MOORE,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: Your favor of March 7, 1914, asking us whether we are employing the usual number of people in our industry at this time and whether we are working full time as usual at hand.

For the past six months we were working about 60 per cent of our production, but the last two weeks we went up to about eighty-odd per cent of our production, not that business looked sufficiently good to warrant that, but this is the time of the year when we get good skins and is the best time of the year to manufacture leather. A year ago at the main gate of our factory where we employ our people there would be an occasional straggler in the morning looking for a job; it is putting it very conservatively to say that at the present time we have a good-sized crowd there looking for jobs every morning. This is our experience.

Yours, truly,

BURK BROTHERS,

NEPAUL MILLS,
THE STEAD & MILLER CO.,
Philadelphia, March 9, 1914.

Hon. J. HAMPTON MOORE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. MOORE: Replying to your letter of March 7, relative to the number of workers employed in the manufacturing upholstery trade in Philadelphia, would say that all the mills are running slack, and not more than two-thirds of the regular number are employed in any mill at the present time.

We are beginning to feel foreign competition.

A great many of the large department stores, who have never sent their buyers to Europe for upholstery goods, already are either abroad or planning to go.

It looks to us as though we are up against a very hard proposition, as it is not possible for us to compete in prices.

We are working 55 hours a week, but with only about two-thirds of our regular force, and have very few goods on order, and it seems to be impossible to get orders.

Yours, very truly,

THE STEAD & MILLER CO.,

THE GLOVERS REVIEW,
Gloversville, N. Y., April 1, 1914.

Hon. J. HAMPTON MOORE,
Member of Congress, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: As one of the Members of Congress who, I observe, is endeavoring to obtain and give to that body honest information as to the results attained under the six months operation of the new tariff law, I feel that the situation in the leather dress-glove industry in this district should be given to you.

The rates of duty of the old law were on men's leather dress gloves, for various styles, $4, $4.40, or $4.80 per dozen pairs. In the present law these rates are $2.50 and $2.75 per dozen pairs for like gloves. On women's gloves, not over 14 inches in length, the rates of the old law were from $2.50 to $3.80 per dozen pairs for various styles. In the present law these rates are $2 and $2.25 per dozen pairs.

I have made a careful canvass of the situation in this district—Fulton County, N. Y.—where approximately 95 per cent of the leather dress gloves produced in this country have been made, and find these conditions to exist:

Advance orders for fall deliveries, placed thus far in 1914, are about 50 per cent below the same period of 1913 and of other normal years; that there have also been many cancellations and revisions of orders placed early in the season, indicating the effect of foreign competition.

Factory operation here is way below normal. There are, I am convinced, from a personal investigation, between four and five hundred cutters and sewers in this district that have no employment, and that much of the employed force is on half and two-thirds time.

The result of my investigation herein given is sustained by the subjoined news item quoted from the Leader-Republican of March 24, 1914, a daily newspaper published in Gloversville, N. Y.:

"HEAVIEST DEMAND FOR CHARITY IN MANY YEARS—SHAFFER SWAMPED BY APPLICATIONS FOR JOBS AND PHYSICIANS.

"Commissioner of Charities M. L. Shaffer is a much-troubled official of late, owing to heavy demands upon him by the needy of the city. In the past week he has been besieged with requests for work, and also for medical assistance, until he knows hardly which way to turn. The heavy demands upon the official seem to indicate there are many idle and ill in this city. * * *

"Commissioner Shaffer stated to-day that the poor of the city are coming to him in great numbers, and more calls are registered this year than for several years past. Work seems to be scarce and he is unable to supply all who have sought with labor. The number of ill on his hands is also very large, and the city physicians have a number of cases in charge."

Under the rates of the old law the foreign producers of leather dress gloves had about 80 per cent of our market in women's gloves and 20 per cent of men's.

So with a good part of the handicap removed by the much lower rates of the present law, it is obvious that the American glove manufacturer must continue to lose the business to the lower-wage countries of Austria, Italy, Germany, France, and England.

Yours, very truly,

JAMES WARBASSE,
Editor and Publisher the Glovers Review.

SLACKNESS SERIOUSLY AFFECTING LABOR IN THE IRON AND STEEL INDUSTRY AND MACHINERY TRADES.

Mr. Chairman, here are a lot of letters from firms engaged in the steel and iron trade, doing less business, running short hours, laying off men. The iron and steel business is usually regarded as an indicator of general prosperity or depression. There was no special trouble with it last year except the effects of persistent investigation, but this year it is different. The low tariff is in operation, and the results speak for themselves:

WORTH BROS. CO.,
Coatesville, Pa., March 10, 1914.

J. HAMPTON MOORE, M. C.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Your favor of the 7th received, and in reply would say that, as compared with March 1 last year, the number of men on our pay rolls is from 25 to 33⅓ per cent less, and the men that have been retained are averaging not more than 50 per cent time, while during the first two months of last year we were running full, with a complete complement of men, and had been operating at 100 per cent capacity during the greater part of 1912.

Orders commenced to decline in volume and tonnage shortly after the 4th of March last year, and by early summer we found the volume of business very much curtailed, and this gradually diminished during the remaining six or seven months of 1913. This year is starting in with still lower prices and with no increase in the volume, and every new piece of business that comes into the market seems to be accompanied with hesitation, which frequently results in actual orders being deferred indefinitely.

Regretting that actual conditions will not allow us to give you a more optimistic report, I am,

Very truly, yours, W. P. WORTH.

MILLER LOCK CO.,
Philadelphia, March 12, 1914.

Hon. J. HAMPTON MOORE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. MOORE: Replying to your esteemed request of the 9th instant, would advise that orders being entered are about 66 per cent of the normal condition, and our working force is accordingly reduced, either in number of employees or working hours, to meet this condition; this comparison is by actual figures with the same months one year ago. Just at the present time there are few, if any, goods being imported in our line, as it takes quite some time to change the channel of trade. Also, the foreign factories who will compete in this industry must prepare their types of goods so as to be as near those produced in the American market as possible; this all takes time. Unless the new tariff law is repealed we expect that the low-priced goods made in Germany, which are impossible for us to compete with here owing to their extremely low wages, will be an important factor in this market.

About February 3 there was considerable excitement in the Connecticut Democratic newspapers—largely copied throughout the United States—over the statement that the Eagle Lock Co., of Terryville, Conn., was running 13 hours a day. This report was incorrect. If you will communicate with Mr. R. J. Plumb, their president, at Terryville, Conn., he no doubt will give you the facts.

Our general superintendent, Mr. A. C. Jackson, spent sometime last summer in the hardware manufacturing district of Germany, and would be more than pleased to give you data obtained as to comparisons of wages between Germany and here, as well as some other facts which he obtained while on the tour made last summer by the American Society of Mechanical Engineers.

Very truly, yours, EDWARD S. JACKSON.

THE J. G. BRILL CO.,
Philadelphia, Pa., March 9, 1914.

Hon. J. HAMPTON MOORE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We have yours of March 7, in connection with number of men employed at this time as compared with normal conditions. Beg to advise that we have somewhat less than the normal number of men working for this time of year, and can best sum it up by saying that we are operating about 70 per cent of our normal capacity. Would state that we have not felt any direct effect of the new tariff laws, but are of the opinion that they indirectly affect the condition of our business at this time.

Yours, very truly, J. W. RAWLE,
Assistant General Manager.

The J. G. Brill Co. are extensive car builders. Some of our Democratic friends would say they should not be affected by the tariff. I submit the company's own version of the situation.

BEMENT-MILES WORKS, OF THE NILES-BEMENT-POND CO.,
Philadelphia, Pa., March 9, 1914.

Hon. J. HAMPTON MOORE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Replying to your letter of the 7th instant, relative to the number of people employed at our plant, have to advise that when operating at full capacity 800 to 850 men are engaged, working 60 hours a week.

At the present time we have 276 employees working 40 hours per week.

Yours, very truly,
BEMENT-MILES WORKS, OF THE NILES-BEMENT-POND CO.
W. J. HAGMAN, General Manager.

The Bement-Miles Works are old-established and widely-known machinists.

THE ADAMS & WESTLAKE CO.,
Philadelphia, March 9, 1914.

Hon. J. HAMPTON MOORE,
Representative Third District, Pennsylvania,
House of Representatives, United States,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We beg to acknowledge receipt of your favor of the 7th instant, in which you desire to know whether we are now employing the same number of people in our industry that is usual at this time of the year, and whether they are working full time.

We very greatly regret that we are compelled to state that we are now employing a force more than 25 per cent less than the normal at this time, and are working that force but five days per week, with the unpleasant prospect before us of the possibility of being compelled later on to still further reduce our force and working time.

We do not understand that you desire us to enter into the many reasons producing the condition above mentioned; but we will say briefly that the most important factors affecting our individual business are the new tariff law and the uncertainty as to whether the Interstate Commerce Commission will grant to the eastern railroads the advance in freight asked for.

Yours, very truly,

THE ADAMS & WESTLAKE CO.,
E. L. LANGWORTHY,
Eastern Manager.

The Adams & Westlake Co. are manufacturers of railway supplies, supposedly not affected by the tariff; but depression under the tariff seems to involve a general depression, just as prosperity under a tariff makes for general prosperity.

JUSTUS H. SCHWACKE,
Philadelphia, Pa., March 13, 1914.

Hon. J. HAMPTON MOORE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I duly received yours of 7th instant, and deferred reply until I could consult a gentleman here who I thought might have dependable information which I could compare with some inquiry that I made a little over a month ago among the metal industries here in only the northeast section of the city, but in his reply, which is now before me, he seems to have considered all the unemployed, so that the contemplated comparison is not possible.

His estimate is from 75,000 to 100,000, including those affected by seasonable occupations. He does say, however, that the Pencoyd Iron Works and the Midvale Steel Co. some weeks ago were down to 60 per cent.

The special inquiry which I made of 22 separate concerns elicited the following:

A. About 10 per cent less than normal (but they are making a certain line of machinery which is affected by the new fashions for women's dress goods, so that their condition is not typical).
B. No reduction.
C. Reduced about 30 per cent.
D. No reduction (except in one department), due to contracts taken before the tariff agitation and not yet worked out.
E. No reduction. Are bringing out a new line of machinery not affected by tariff conditions.
F. Running only about 60 per cent capacity.
G. Running only about 80 per cent capacity.
H. Running only about 50 per cent capacity.
I. Hours reduced, 50 per cent; number of men reduced, 50 per cent. Consequently working only 25 per cent of capacity.
J. Running about 30 per cent of capacity.
K. Running about 75 per cent of capacity.
L. Running about 50 per cent of capacity.
M. Running about 80 per cent of capacity.
N. No change, but working principally on stock.
O. Have reduced hours 10 per cent and men 10 per cent.
P. Conditions normal.
Q. Have reduced force about 10 per cent.
R. About normal.
S. Force reduced one-half.
T. Force reduced one-third; working principally on stock.
U. Force slightly increased over this time last year.

The above does not include some of the biggest works in town, as, for instance, the Baldwin Locomotive Works, which is reported to be running less than one-half force.

Our own condition is about two-thirds of capacity, but working largely on stock in order to keep our organization together, but with very little demand.

I take every opportunity to inquire of visitors and others through our traveling salesmen as to the general conditions existing in the metal trades, and the reports are in accord as to largely reduced forces and prospects very discouraging.

Yours, very truly,

J. H. SCHWACKE.

Mr. Schwacke knows the machinery business from beginning to end. His summary of conditions prevailing in large industrial plants is one of the most interesting of the group.

A TREMENDOUS SLUMP IN LOCOMOTIVE BUILDING.

THE BALDWIN LOCOMOTIVE WORKS,
Philadelphia, March 11, 1914.

Hon. J. HAMPTON MOORE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. MOORE: Replying to your favor of the 10th instant, there has been no essential change of conditions with us since our last communications. Our pay roll for the week ending March 7 includes 8,433 men, working an average of 50 hours.

Very truly, yours, ALBA B. JOHNSON, President.

The Baldwin Locomotive Works—Mr. Chairman, I have alluded to that institution before. At the beginning of the year 1913 they had over 19,300 men in their employ—fine, sturdy, American mechanics, every one of them earning his bread and putting away a little of his savings in the savings bank. He is using that up now. At the close of 1913 that fine force of 19,300 men had dwindled down to 10,464. Here is a letter from the president of the company, written at my request, dated March 11, 1914, showing that the force had been still further reduced, until on March 7 there were only 8,433 remaining, less than half the usual complement. Put those reductions along with the figures of the Bement-Miles Works and strike an average and you will soon find, Mr. Chairman, that there is good reason for those who believe that lower tariffs will help labor to preach optimism and to preach it hard.

HARDSHIP AND NONEMPLOYMENT VIE WITH SPORTY GOODS.

Mr. ANSBERRY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. MOORE. I regret I can not yield now. I have not the time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. MOORE. I do not intend now to dwell upon the misery of those who have had to endure the rigors of the winter without employment. They have been numerous, and no great city has failed to realize their presence. I shall not even read some appeals from charitable organizations which I have laid aside for this occasion. They tell of the want of those who were without work in the mills; let that suffice. But briefly and in conclusion, I commend to your attention the advertising pages of the great newspapers. Read them, if you will, and see the secret of our popular optimism. The foreign goods are coming in. Look at the great broadsides telling of the fine new styles that the foreigners are setting for us. Read of the hats from London and the dress goods from Paris; of the chinaware from Belgium and the woolens from England. Read of the fine new clothes for the sporty young man and the dress goods for the ladies as they come from the fashion plates of Paris and London.

SEE THE CARGOES COMING IN.

Witness the ships with cargoes of foreign commodities, the products of the cheaper labor of foreign countries; aye, perhaps the product of that convict labor that you attempted to exclude the other day; the product of that child labor which you upon the other side of the House welcomed from abroad when you passed your convict-labor bill; the product of that labor which works more than eight hours a day in the foreign countries, which you refused to reject when you had the opportunity to do it. See how it comes in cargo lots, free of duty, or at lower duties than ever before. Read how we get them; imported garments, silks, and satins made by the labor of Europe and laid down on the counter at the American price. How can they come in ever-increasing quantities without increasing the number of American workmen who must tread the streets and the by-ways looking for work? The problem that confronts us now is the problem of employment. We can not forever buy from the foreigner and maintain our industries at an honest wage in the United States. Cheap goods make cheap men. We do not want either here.

THE PEOPLE WILL WANT TO KNOW.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have brought testimony as to existing conditions in the industrial world from those who make up the pay rolls. It is evident from what they say that the wage account in this country has fallen off since the passage of the Underwood tariff law. I shall not take up your time to read even the headlines of a hundred newspaper articles which I have before me indicating the needs of the people who have been thrown out of work. If you find any satisfaction in taking the work away from American mills and giving it to foreigners, that may be your reward, but it does not comport with what the American protectionist believes to be the true interest of labor. The Democratic Party put this new law upon the statute books despite Republican protest. It has displaced labor and produced great uncertainty in business. You told us it would lift "a burden from the backs of the American people" and reduce the cost of living. It has done neither. When you come to explain it to the American people, as you will have to do in the approaching campaign, I predict you will find it the most difficult task your party has undertaken. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

ADDENDA.

(Submitted by Mr. MOORE under leave to extend his remarks.)

[Editorial from the Philadelphia Inquirer.]

SIX MONTHS OF THE UNDERWOOD TARIFF.

Six months of the Underwood tariff law have more than justified every prediction made by protectionists. President Wilson's idea that it would be a good plan to put the "wits of the American manufacturer against the world" is shown to be a failure. In the last six months the Nation has lost $25,000,000 in customs revenue. It is believed that the losses will be heavier in the ensuing six months, since the woolen schedule has been in operation only three months, so that the experts of the Treasury were pretty nearly correct in their figures.

In the six months we have lost in exports and have gained in imports. We have imported $54,000,000 less of raw materials, or materials for further manufacture, than in the corresponding five months of the previous year. In the same period our exports of manufactured or partly manufactured articles fell off by $33,000,000—a net loss to this country of $87,000,000 in our manufacturing trade. This net loss falls upon workers in American mills and factories. Our "wits" have not met those abroad for the simple reason that our men will not work for such wages as are paid abroad. The showing for the month of March is the worst of all, and there is no prospect of a change for the better.

The Government is $30,000,000 behind in its balance sheet for the fiscal year to date. Appropriations are on a higher scale than ever, while the prosperity of the country is being assailed on every side. That conditions are no worse is due to the fact that our manufacturers have been doing their best to meet conditions. They have seen their profits cut down or vanish, but they have kept on because they did not want to see their organization broken up. Many thousands of employees have been discharged. This city has more idle men than at any time in a generation.

It was as plain as anything could be six months ago that such would be the results, but the academic legislators at Washington believed that by law they could make three and three make seven.

[Editorial from the Public Ledger, Philadelphia.]

DEMOCRATS FILLING THE FOREIGNER'S PURSE.

The effect of Democratic bedevilment of business is reflected more clearly in the customhouse returns than anywhere else. They show that there has been a falling off of $40,000,000 in dutiable imports during the first four months of the new tariff law, in comparison with the corresponding period a year ago. This decline is at the rate of $120,000,000 a year, in spite of the fact that the duties have been reduced.

The reason for this astounding slump in foreign purchasing is found in the demoralization of business. The home producer has not benefited by the sale of his own products to take the place of those usually bought abroad, because people have not been buying goods. They are waiting to see what else Congress will do; and revenue-producing business is falling off at the annual rate of $112,000,000 net.

The increase of free imports by $12,000,000 is due to the preference that the Democrats have shown for the foreign producer over the American farmer, cattle raiser, and manufacturer, a preference that Abraham Lincoln never could countenance. He did not pretend to be a tariff expert, and did not have much use for theories of any kind, but he was gifted with enough plain horse sense to understand what going abroad for goods meant. His Gettysburg speech is a classic, but he did not compress in it so much as he did when he said:

"I do not know much about the tariff, but I know this much, when we buy manufactured goods abroad we get the goods and the foreigner gets the money. When we buy manufactured goods at home we get both the goods and the money."

Protection is epitomized in these words, in which there is no suggestion of a competitive tariff, or of free trade, or of a tariff for revenue. The Republican Party has been striving to carry out the admirable policy of developing the industries of the country so that it might produce the goods and get the money for them in Lincoln's way.

But the Democrats, with their latest inept muddling with matters with which their inexperience disqualifies them to deal, have succeeded in benefiting the foreigner by the free entry of $12,000,000 worth of goods in the first four months of their law in excess of the amount entered under the old law. And what are these goods? A considerable amount of them is wool of various grades—wool that can be produced in Ohio and Pennsylvania and Colorado and a number of other States. More than $4,700,000 worth of clothing wool was admitted free in December and January, against only a little more than $2,000,000 in the same period under the Payne-Aldrich law; and $9,404,000 worth of clothing, carpet, and combing wool came in during these first two months of the free-wool clause, an amount greater by $2,400,000 than the amount imported in the last five months of the Payne tariff.

But neither clothing nor carpets are any cheaper than they used to be, and the carpet makers and the tailors do not promise to reduce prices after the new wools have been woven into fabrics. The sole benefit of the reduction will be felt by the woolgrowers of Uruguay and of Australia and of Argentina and other wool-producing countries. The Australian importations, for example, jumped from $37,000 in October and November to $1,100,000 in December and January; and Uruguay, which sent almost none here before December 1, sold to the United States more than $300,000 worth in the first two months of free wool. The Democrats are legislating for South America and the islands of the sea, while the woolgrowers of their own country may go hang for all they care. The wool States do not go Democratic and deserve no consideration.

They care no more for the manufacturers of wool than for the sheep raisers, for they lowered the duties on woolen dress goods, and in January $1,217,000 worth of them were brought in at the lower rate, or about a third as much in one month as had come in during the whole previous fiscal year. And the women have to pay just as much for a dress made of these goods as they did before the tariff was reduced. It is the foreigner who gets the benefit and the domestic producer who has to suffer from foreign competition.

The Democrats planned to give the foreigner American money for his goods, instead of buying American goods from American producers and keeping both goods and money at home, in Lincoln's way. The only reason they have not succeeded better in carrying out this foolish plan lies in the general state of uncertainty that their whole legislative program has produced.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed the following resolutions (S. Res. 325):

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of the Hon. WILLIAM RICHARDSON, late a Representative from the State of Alabama.

Resolved, That a committee of six Senators be appointed by the Presiding Officer, to join the committee appointed on the part of the House of Representatives, to attend the funeral of the deceased Representative.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the Senate do now take a recess until to-morrow (Thursday) at 11.50 a. m.

In compliance with the foregoing, the Presiding Officer appointed as said committee Mr. BANKHEAD, Mr. THORNTON, Mr. ROBINSON, Mr. GRONNA, Mr. POINDEXTER, and Mr. CRAWFORD.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BOWDLE].

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Will the gentleman from Iowa consume some of his time now?

Mr. BOWDLE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I have a matter of enormous interest to all archæologists and to some archaic statesmen which I desire to bring to the attention of the House. It is brief.

There is nothing new under the sun. Alfred Russel Wallace, the distinguished scientist, has shown enough to make us believe that from the question of the minimum wage to the abolishing of the red-light district in Washington, there is nothing new, and that all civilizations have had to meet pretty much the same questions. In this toll question there is nothing new. In a recently excavated cellar at Karnak the archæologists have discovered a tablet which tells the following story, very liberally translated:

"In the days of Seti there arose a mighty controversy which shook all Egypt.

"It appears that in a prior reign a certain Egyptian had been granted the royal favor of exclusively carrying in vehicles all goods on the roads between Karnak and Memphis, which were not ass laden. A company was organized around this franchise, known as the Karnak-Memphis Transfer Co., and its vehicles quickly drove all asses off the roads.

"In later years Seti built another road, much shorter and better, and which promptly became immensely popular for all the caravans between Assyria and Babylonia on the east and Abyssinia on the west.

"The cost of this new road was about 400,000,000 shekels, and was paid out of the royal treasury; but the purpose was, and it was so declared, that this cost was to be defrayed finally by tolls levied on the vehicles, caravans, and asses of all nations using the road. To this declaration the nations joyfully assented, for, be it known, the road was of enormous interest to them.

"But at about the time the road was to be dedicated, the transfer company solemnly declared that its exclusive franchise would be impaired by charging it tolls. It claimed that requiring it to pay tolls along with foreigners when Egypt had built the entire road was to surrender Egyptian sovereignty—was, in fact, truckling to Babylonia; that there could have been no motive in building the road if its franchise and business were to be taxed; it charged finally that the term "all nations" could not have included Egypt, which built the road.

"All this produced a high degree of botheration to Pharaoh, for the people, who, before the road was built, regarded the company as a trust, now showed a profound tendency to regard it as a benevolent organization. The air rang with 'bad faith,' 'unconstitutional,' 'treason,' 'truckling to Assyria,' and the whole nation divided itself into 'tollites' and 'antitollites.'

"So Pharaoh, in profound distress, proposed a change in the law by exempting the company from tolls. But at this the nations protested, for said they, 'If our tolls are to be based on cost, then it is obviously to our advantage to have as many pay as possible.' And so the battle raged.

"At this crisis a Hebrew from Goshen appeared at the palace and addressed the King on this wise:

"'O King, live forever. Why art thou bothered over this simple question? Dost thou not know that this company hath charged thy subjects all the traffic would bear? Dost thou not know that it is already a monopoly in restraint of trade under the antitrust act of the Shepherd Kings? Dost thou not know that it hath waxed fat and arrogant and hath driven all asses off the road from Memphis to Karnac? Dost thou not know that its exclusive franchise of carrying all the freight is immensely valuable? And dost thou not think that it is arrogant and impious for it, with one exclusive franchise, to ask for another, and to throw thy kingdom into turmoil to get it?'

"At this the tablet says the King replied:

"'Isaac, my son, I perceive that thou art the goods, and that I, even I, am an illustrious chump. Bring hither the directors of that company that they may be slain before me, and that their houses be made a dunghill, and, as for their franchise, granted by my foolish father, let it be instantly abolished.'

"But Isaac replied:

"'O King, live forever; but be not hasty in this thing. Justice requireth not this decree. Hast thou not heard, even from thy father, that every man—and Kings sometimes—worketh for his own interests? Why rage and marvel that men are selfish? Marvel, rather, that any be unselfish.'

"'Isaac, my son,' continues the tablet, 'thou art wise in thy generation; but these men have conspired against the royal treasury, for my sweaty subjects have built this road and have dug the shekels from the Nile's soil to pay for it. If, then, these men be not knaves, they be lunatics or fools. Let them all be taken at once to the royal bughouse that this pest be not propogated and that my subjects be no longer deceived.'"

And it was so, even in the days of Seti, 3,500 years ago. Verily, there is nothing new under the sun. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Will the gentleman from Iowa consume some of his time now?

Mr. GOOD. I yield 45 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS].

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, a few weeks ago the Secretary of State, Mr. Bryan, issued a signed statement entitled "Our policy toward Latin America." In the course of the statement he used the following language:

He [referring to President Wilson] is not concerned as to the personnel of the Government; all he desires is that the people shall have such offices as they desire.

Mr. Bryan in this enunciation was apparently referring to the Latin American Republics; but, if we substitute the word "Democrats" for the word "people" in this sentence, we have an accurate summing up of Mr. Bryan's point of view relative to our Diplomatic Service. The record of Mr. Bryan in the portfolio of State during the past year has conclusively established that he is not concerned as to the personnel of the Diplomatic Service; all he desires is that the Democrats shall have such offices as they desire.

It is my purpose to develop as briefly as may be the precise changes in our Diplomatic Service which the year just past has witnessed. I shall deal more especially with the diplomatic situation in Latin America, because in that quarter of the earth's surface lies our commercial future, and because, too, owing to the present interpretation of the Monroe doctrine, we are forced to scan with peculiar closeness the attitude which the Republics to the south of us assume toward this country. The United States to-day is not receiving anything like its fair share of the trade of Latin America. In a speech delivered some three months ago I dealt at considerable length with this aspect of our problem. Suffice it to say here that the latest figures available show that the United States was responsible for but 22.9 per cent of the total imports of Latin America; if Mexico and Cuba be omitted—which countries, from geographical and historical reasons, have always had close trade relations with the United States—the figure of 22.9 per cent is reduced to 16 per cent. The United States is responsible for but 11 per cent of the imports of Brazil, but 12 per cent of the imports of Chile, and but 14 per cent of the imports of Argentina. Clearly, if the United States is to receive its rightful share of the commerce of these great and very rapidly growing sister Republics of the American Hemisphere, it is incumbent upon her to be diligent in promoting close and cordial relations with each and every one of these Republics, whether large or small. One way, and certainly an important way, is to raise the Diplomatic Service with these countries to the highest possible plane of efficiency. The possibilities for good resultant upon the sending of a skillful, experienced, tactful, and capable minister or ambassador to any one of these countries can scarcely be overemphasized.

In the Roosevelt and Taft administrations a sincere attempt was made to place our Diplomatic Service upon a merit basis. Some traces of the old spoils system were discernible, especially in the higher appointments, but the lower diplomatic grades became more and more the rewards of efficient service during those 12 years. The country looked forward confidently to a continuance of this policy under the stalwart leadership of President Wilson. As he said himself:

My warm advocacy and support both of the principle and of the bona fide practice of civil-service reform is known to the whole country, and there is no danger that the spoils system will creep in with my approval or connivance.

Having in mind the tremendous importance of the Latin-American situation, from whatever point of view examined, and having in mind, too, the straightforward policy of the President upon the merit system, thus ably declared, I have been interested, after a full year of President Wilson's term, to examine with the greatest possible care the nature of the appointments to the Diplomatic Service which are the fruit of the present régime. I confess that I have been somewhat handicapped in learning in detail the careers of the new diplomats to Latin America, because of the fact that almost all are entirely unknown to the publishers of that most useful handbook, Who's Who in America. That excellent manual, as is well known, does not err on the side of exclusiveness. Its preface tells us that 27,000 names are listed therein. Yet of the 15 new appointments to legations in Latin America but 4 are known even by name to the editor. For further information as to one of these—a most unkind cut—we are referred to an earlier edition in the series, as if the gentleman in question, though actually living, were legally dead. Two of the others are listed, because 15 years ago they were Members of Congress. The fourth is listed as a retired clergyman, but also, fortunately for his chances of diplomatic preferment, as a "Progressive Democrat." The other 11 of the 15 are unknown even to such fame as inclusion in Who's Who holds out to the ambitious. For much of the information concerning their careers which I have been able to compile I am indebted to the various numbers of the Pan American Union Bulletin. The editor of this publication, as fast as Latin-American appointments are confirmed by the Senate, writes to the appointee for authentic information as to his life, character, and achievements. Such information as appears is therefore largely autobiographic, and wherever I have quoted it below it may be accepted as at least representing the opinion of the subject of the sketch.

I do not need to point out that a vast amount of criticism has been directed against the administration in connection with its diplomatic appointments. For example, Dr. Charles W. Eliot, president of the National Civil Service Reform League, is reported to have said at the annual convention of that body last December:

Of the 22 ministers displaced, 13 had had several years' experience in Diplomatic Service, while none of the new appointees had had any experience. Several of the appointments of obscure men to diplomatic posts have seemed to the public to be made in payment of political debts.

It is very easy to make a general arraignment of a principle or a policy, but it is much more convincing to assemble the actual facts bearing upon a given proposition so that the reader may judge for himself what general conclusions shall be drawn. I therefore incorporate in my remarks at this point a brief sketch of the men who have been serving this country in the Latin-American diplomatic posts and of those who, since the advent of President Wilson, have taken their places.

BOLIVIA.

O'Rear, John D. (appointed). Born in Mexico, Mo., in 1870, and has lived there ever since. His diplomatic qualifications, if any, arise from the name of the town in which he has resided; certainly he has had no discoverable experience. The Pan American Union Bulletin, speaking presumably autobiographically, says:

He also served on the Democratic State committee. He brings to his new post the energy and enthusiasm of youth, combined with the prudence and forethought of a trained lawyer.

If the gentleman himself is to be believed, what more can the country ask?

Knowles, Horace G. (displaced). Was born in 1863; is a graduate of Delaware College, and a lawyer. He entered the Consular Service in 1889, and since that time has been minister to Roumania and Servia, diplomatic agent to Bulgaria, minister to Nicaragua, minister and consul general to Santo Domingo, and minister to Bolivia. He has thus been engaged in various branches of the foreign service for 25 years.

COLOMBIA.

Thomson, Thaddeus A. (appointed). Mr. Thomson was born in Texas in 1853, and has always lived there; his present home is Austin, Tex. He is a planter, ranch owner, and locator of public lands. No diplomatic qualifications have been detected other than a presumable acquaintance with those kings of Democratic patronage and first citizens of Austin, Col. E. M. House and Postmaster General Burleson. The trustworthy Pan American Union Bulletin informs us that—though a prominent factor in State and National politics, he has never held any official position prior to his appointment to this very important diplomatic post.

Du Bois, James T. (displaced). Mr. Du Bois was born in 1851 and is a graduate of Cornell and of Columbian University Law School. He was appointed commercial agent at Aix la Chapelle in 1877 and consul in 1880. Since then he has been consul at Callao and Leipzig, consul general at St. Gall, law clerk in the Department of State, consul general at Singapore, and minister to Colombia. His foreign service thus covers a period of 37 years.

COSTA RICA.

Hale, Edward J. (appointed). Born in North Carolina in 1839 and has lived there ever since. Newspaper editor.

Einstein, Lewis (displaced). Born 1877. Holds two degrees from Columbia. Appointed secretary in the Diplomatic Service in 1903 at Paris; then successively secretary at London, at the Moroccan conference, at Constantinople, and at Peking. In 1911 promoted to be minister at Costa Rica.

CUBA.

Gonzales, William E. (appointed). Born in Charleston, S. C., in 1866 and has lived there ever since. Editor. The Pan American Union Bulletin tells us that his father was concerned in the first filibustering expedition from the United States to Cuba in 1850, and goes on to say that—his ancestry and training * * * will give him the advantage of a sympathetic understanding of the nature of the Cuban people.

The report of the treasurer of the Democratic national committee, Mr. Rolla Wells, chronicles—page 8—that Gonzales Bros., Columbia, S. C., contributed $500 to the "true cause" in the national campaign of 1912. Perchance here is another qualification beyond those alluded to in the Pan American Union Bulletin.

Beaupre, A. M. (displaced). Mr. Beaupre was born in Illinois and was appointed after an examination secretary of the legation and consul general at Guatemala in 1897; successively chargé d'affaires, secretary of the legation, and consul general at Bogota, minister to Colombia, minister to Argentina, minister to the Netherlands and Luxemburg, and minister to Cuba; a record of 16 years in the foreign service of the United States.

DOMINICAN REPUBLIC.

Sullivan, James M. (appointed). Born in 1873, now a criminal lawyer in New York City. Col. Harvey tells us that he achieved eminence by defending "Bald Jack" Rose in the notorious Becker trial, and that his cousin is a contractor interested in railway concessions in San Domingo. He is also known to fame as an indefatigable organizer of Democratic clubs in the campaign of 1912.

Russell, W. W. (displaced). Mr. Russell was born in Washington, D. C., in 1859. He is a graduate of the United States Naval Academy, and has been civil engineer and surveyor in South America, Mexico, and the United States. He was appointed secretary of the legation at Caracas in 1895. He was successively secretary and chargé d'affaires at Panama, minister to Colombia, minister to Venezuela, commissioner to Ecuador, and minister and consul general to the Dominican Republic.

ECUADOR.

Hartman, Charles S. (appointed). Mr. Hartman is a lawyer of Bozeman, Mont. He was a Member of Congress from 1893 to 1899. I have taken occasion to examine the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to learn of his activities while in Washington. His principal endeavors seem to have been in the advocacy of the cause of the free coinage of silver. On February 7, 1896, for example, he made a ringing speech in favor of free silver in the course of which he referred to the fact that the condition of Mexico, a silver-using country, is so much better than that of the United States under a gold standard that he felt that dignified silence on the part of the gold men would be beneficial. Doubtless the accuracy of his information about Mexico and of his prophetic vision caused him to be selected as minister to a neighboring Republic in the troubled year of grace 1913. Those who are interested in studying more in detail Mr. Hartman's free-silver views will find other speeches on the same subject reported in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for August 24, 1893; March 1, 1894; February 6, 1895; and January 27, 1898. Whatever his shortcomings, diplomatic or otherwise, he seems to have been a consistent performer on this subject at least.

Schuyler, Montgomery, jr. (displaced). Born in Connecticut in 1877. Holds two degrees from Columbia University. University scholar in Indo-Iranian languages; university fellow. Appointed second secretary at St. Petersburg in 1902. Successively secretary and consul general at Bangkok; secretary and consul general to Roumania and Servia; secretary at St. Petersburg, Tokyo, and Mexico; and minister to Ecuador.

Speaking of this particular substitution, the New York Times, on July 20, 1913, said editorially:

No further evidence is needed of the intention of the State Department, under Secretary Bryan, to disregard the merit system altogether in diplomatic appointments and to undo the good work already done toward the formation of an efficient service than the displacement of Mr. Montgomery Schuyler, jr., by Mr. Charles S. Hartman, of Bozeman, Mont., a politician long out of office and a statesman of the true Bryan following. Mr. Schuyler, a young man of good education and uncommon ability, took to the diplomatic career under the inducements offered to such men in the three administrations preceding President Wilson's. He is not a politician but he has served the State Department efficiently and with considerable distinction in many positions. * * * He has proved his fitness in these positions, and is of the type most needed in our Diplomatic Service.

Mr. Hartman, on the other hand, has done the State no service which is on the records since his retirement from the House of Representatives, of which he was a somewhat inconspicuous Member from 1893 to 1899. Mr. Hartman was not then a Democrat, whatever he may be now, and beyond the introduction of a bill for the free coinage of silver and a few private pension bills, he did nothing much in Congress. If Mr. Hartman possesses any special fitness to serve his country as minister to Ecuador he has acquired it lately while practicing law in Bozeman. It is natural that Mr. Bryan, however, should retain a kindly feeling for the few survivors of the old guard of "free silver."

Mr. Schuyler's appointment to Quito is not six months old; it was not a political appointment, but a promotion for merit after many years of good service. He has not had time to get settled in his new office when he is swept aside, without consideration, to make way for a worn-out political henchman of the former advocate of 16 to 1.

GUATEMALA.

Leavell, William H. (appointed). Was born in South Carolina in 1850 and has been a clergyman since 1870. For one of his parishes he was fortunate to be settled in the good city of Austin, Tex., the home, as has been previously pointed out, of Messrs. House and Burleson. Who can say what fruitful consequence to the Republic of Guatemala resulted from the pastorate? An expectant world is informed in the Pan American Union Bulletin that—his attainments attracted wide interest as well as many calls for lectures and discussions.

Although there is no specific mention of the Chautauqua circuit, the bond of union with the Secretary of State is really too obvious for comment. The important, though perhaps not uncommon, distinction had been accorded him at the time the Bulletin went to press of being received by the President of Guatemala. The press of the capital city of Guatemala is said to be "loud in its praises of the new minister." The secret of his success, however, is revealed by an interview which he gave as he was about to take ship for his new post. He said:

I expect to find diplomacy easy. I have never been a diplomat officially, but I have been a minister 40 years.

Hitt, R. S. R. (displaced). Mr. Hitt was born in 1876, and is a graduate of Yale and of Harvard Law School. He was appointed to a secretaryship at Paris in 1901. He served successively as secretary at Berlin, at Rome, and again at Berlin, and as minister to Panama, Venezuela, and Guatemala.

HAITI.

Smith, Madison R. (appointed). Mr. Smith was born in Missouri in 1850, and has been a lawyer, newspaper editor, and Member of the Sixtieth Congress.

Furniss, Henry W. (displaced). Mr. Furniss was born in 1868, and holds four university degrees. In 1898 he was appointed, after examination, consul at Bahia, and in 1905 minister to Haiti.

HONDURAS.

Ewing, John (appointed). Mr. Ewing was born in Alabama in 1857, and has lived in Missouri and Louisiana. He has been a collection teller, deputy collector of customs, customs broker, land agent, road overseer, lawyer, and newspaper man—a veritable jack-of-all-trades. His various pursuits had been so lucrative that he was able to contribute $500 to the Democratic national campaign of 1912. (See p. 7 of Mr. Wells's report.) The following facts are culled from the Pan American Union Bulletin:

When quite a young man he hung out his shingle and soon had clients of his own—he has become greatly appreciated by the public. Having lived in the South all his life and having been brought into business and social contact with the peoples of Central America through direct steamship connections, the new minister will not be a stranger to life and environments with which he will be surrounded. His friends predict for him a most successful and useful career.

The President is indeed fortunate to happen upon a man who has had direct steamship connections with the Republic to which he is assigned. Incidentally, his brother, Robert Ewing, is Democratic national committeeman from Louisiana and the political boss of that Sate. A mere coincidence, doubtless.

White, Charles D. (displaced). Mr. White was born in Ithaca in 1868, and is a graduate of Princeton and of two German universities. He was appointed secretary at Buenos Aires in 1904. He then served successively as secretary to the Netherlands and Luxemburg, Christiania, Habana, and to the arbitration tribunal at The Hague. He was appointed minister to Honduras in 1911.

Of this substitution Mr. Edward G. Lowry, Washington correspondent of the New York Evening Post, writing in Collier's of February 7 last, says:

One of the ministers Mr. Bryan found in office and who is now out of the service was C. D. White, who was minister to Honduras. He came up through the secretarial grades by promotion. Mr. White was graduated from Princeton in 1891, and one of the persons who was in a degree sponsor for him and for his character and attainments when he made application for a place in the Diplomatic Service was Woodrow Wilson, then president of Princeton. Mr. Bryan knew of this letter of President Wilson's when Mr. White was retired from the service and another man appointed minister to Honduras. With regard to this previous indorsement Mr. Bryan took the view that the President's action at that time was not to be taken as implying that as President of the United States Mr. Wilson would keep Mr. White in office or, in effect, guarantee him permanent or continued tenure of office as a minister or in any grade of the Diplomatic Service above that of secretary of legation. At any rate, Mr. Bryan appointed another man more to his liking without alleging any incapacity or delinquency on the part of Mr. White.

NICARAGUA.

Jefferson, Benjamin L. (appointed). Mr. Jefferson was born in Georgia in 1871, and has been a physician at Steamboat Springs, Colo. He was a Bryan elector in 1908. The principal knowledge of his recent career is gained from the Pan American Union Bulletin, which states that—

At the time of his appointment he was serving his State as registrar of the State board of land commissioners, in which office he is said to have shown great executive ability.

Weitzel, George T. (displaced). Mr. Weitzel was born in 1873; is a graduate of Harvard College and Harvard Law School and a veteran of the Spanish War. In 1907 he was appointed, after examination, secretary to Nicaragua and Costa Rica. He then served successively as secretary at Panama, diplomatic adviser to Admiral Kimball, secretary at Mexico, on service in the Division of Latin-American Affairs in the Department of State, again (this time on special duty) at Mexico, Assistant Chief of the Division of Latin-American Affairs, and minister to Nicaragua.

PANAMA.

Price, William Jennings (appointed). Mr. Price was born in Kentucky in 1873, and has practiced law there in more recent years. The invaluable Pan American Union Bulletin tells us that "in 1906 he became a leading candidate for Congress," and further, of even greater importance, that he is "of courtly and dignified demeanor." As Mr. O'Rear had the name of his native town of Mexico to give the needed diplomatic touch; as Mr. Ewing had direct steamship connections with foreign lands; as Mr. Jefferson hails from the town of Steamboat Springs, which smacks of foreign travel, so the propriety of Mr. Price's diplomatic selection is greatly enhanced by the name William Jennings. Diplomatically, at least, Mr. Price can never ask again "What's in a name?"

Dodge, H. P. (displaced). Mr. Dodge was born in Boston in 1870, and is a graduate of Harvard College and Harvard Law School. In 1899 he was appointed third secretary at Berlin. He served successively as second secretary and secretary at Berlin, secretary at Tokyo, minister to Honduras and Salvador, minister to Morocco, Chief of the Division of Latin-American Affairs in the Department of State, and minister to Panama.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield for an interruption?

Mr. ROGERS. I shall be glad to hear from the gentleman.

Mr. FESS. I notice that in every case, so far as I can remember up to this point, the man displaced had had preparation in the way of university graduation or study.

Mr. ROGERS. I think that statement is absolutely correct.

Mr. FESS. And I have heard nothing about any political connection. I want also to ask you if you have any evidence that partisan politics played any part in the selection of the men who were displaced?

Mr. ROGERS. I shall attempt to summarize that aspect of the case a little later.

Mr. FESS. I think there is a very striking antithesis, and I wondered whether the gentleman had referred to that.

PARAGUAY.

Mr. ROGERS. Mooney, D. F. (appointed).—Mr. Mooney was born in Ohio in 1865, and is a lawyer. We are told in the Pan American Union Bulletin that—

In 1908 Mr. Mooney was honored with election to the State Senate of Ohio, and served therein for a full term of two years.

Beyond his senate service history does not enlighten us.

Grevstad, N. A. (displaced). Mr. Grevstad was born in 1851 in Norway, and prior to his appointment in 1911 as minister to Paraguay and Nicaragua had been a newspaper man. It will be noticed that he is the first man in the entire list of retired ministers up to this point who has not worked his way either from the rank of consul or of secretary to that of minister.

PERU.

McMillin, Benton (appointed). Mr. McMillin was born in 1845 in Kentucky and has resided most of his life in Tennessee. He served 20 years in Congress. He has been governor of his State. The Pan American Union Bulletin tells us that his appointment is "a compliment to Peru." In his leisure moments Mr. McMillin is an insurance agent, and is known to fame as the "War Horse of the Democracy of Tennessee."

Howard, Henry C. (displaced). Was born in Kentucky in 1860 and holds two degrees from Columbia University. When appointed minister to Peru in 1911 was a county judge in Kentucky.

URUGUAY.

De Saulles, John L. (appointed). Mr. De Saulles, according to the Washington Post of March 12, has at least four claims to the appointment as minister to Uruguay: First, he is an old-time Yale football captain; second, he married the daughter of one of the richest men in Chile; third, he is well known in South America as a duelist; fourth, he was a valiant organizer of Democratic clubs of college men in the 1912 campaign.

Mr. De Saulles, when interviewed, used the following diplomatic language:

I am in hearty sympathy with President Wilson's policy as to the South American Republics, which, as I understand it, is to establish a common understanding with them all.

(Uruguay has just been given a legation separate from that of Paraguay. Mr. Grevstad, above referred to, formerly acted as minister to both countries.)

VENEZUELA.

McGoodwin, Preston (appointed). Mr. McGoodwin was born in Kentucky in 1880, but has lived most of his life in Oklahoma. In the vivid and inspired words of the Pan American Union Bulletin—

Journalism is the route by which he traversed to the high position. As managing editor of the Oklahoman he rendered conspicuous services for several years prior to his selection. As a writer his work is forceful and progressive.

Northcott, Elliott (displaced). Mr. Northcott is a West Virginian, born in 1869. He was appointed minister to Colombia in 1909, and thereafter served as minister to Nicaragua and to Venezuela.

This completes the recital of the history of the United States diplomatic appointments to Latin America in the year just past. I have tried to make the story absolutely fair to both sides and as full as the demands of reasonable brevity would allow. It may be well at this point to stop and attempt to summarize what has been set forth in detail.

Of the 15 men who have been displaced as Latin-American ministers during the past year 11 had worked up by sheer merit from subordinate places, either as consul or as secretary, 3 of the 11 having originally entered the foreign service as the result of examination. The 4 others were appointed without such previous expereince, but 1 of the 4 was serving at his fifth diplomatic post when removed and another was serving at his third post. It is perhaps not a violent presumption to assume that these 2, in addition to the 11 merit men, were possessed of experience likely to make them more useful to their country than those who replaced them, not one of whom had had the slightest diplomatic experience.

The average age of the 14 new ministers, the date of whose birth I am able to ascertain, is 52; the average age of the men displaced, in spite of the fact that one had served 36 years, another 24, and a half dozen or more between 10 and 20 years, was 47. Evidently no argument can be based upon the fact that the new men were so much younger and more vigorous than the old that the service was likely to be improved by the change. One of the new ministers is 75 years old, and four more are between 60 and 70.

The average number of posts occupied by the men removed was six; the average number of years of experience was 13.

Of the 14 men who replaced those already in office, 10 were born and bred in the South and appointed from some Southern State. One other, though appointed from the North, is of southern birth. But three are out and out northerners. Is there any reason to think that men from the South are per se more capable in the diplomatic world than northerners or than men who have given the best years of their lives to the study and practice of the diplomatic profession?

I wish that the limits of time would allow a similar detailed examination into the other diplomatic changes which have marked the first quarter of the Wilson administration. The United States sends out some 44 ambassadors and ministers to represent it in foreign capitals; but 7 of the men who represented it when President Wilson took the oath of office are still in the harness to-day, and no man can say that any one even of these 7 will be left a month hence.

Perhaps the grossest case in the old world of deliberate departure from the merit system is found in the removal of Mr. William W. Rockhill, who a year ago was our ambassador to Turkey. Mr. Rockhill was born in Philadelphia in 1854, and is a graduate of the military school at St. Cyr, France. He served three years as a lieutenant in the French Army in Algeria. In 1884 he was appointed second secretary of the legation at Peking, and in the 30 years' diplomatic service which he has seen since that time he has served the country in between 15 and 20 important diplomatic capacities. As the crown and culmination of his long and distinguished service he was appointed ambassador to Russia in 1909, and transferred, still as ambassador, to Turkey in 1911. He is displaced by Mr. Henry Morganthau, the millionaire real estate operator of New York. Mr. Rockhill is turned adrift to shift for himself. The explanation is not difficult to find; Mr. Morganthau was chairman of the Democratic national finance committee in the campaign of 1912, and he alone—to say nothing of large contributions by members of his family—contributed $10,000 to the funds.

A somewhat similar case is that of Mr. John B. Jackson, minister to Bulgaria, Roumania, and Servia. Mr. Jackson was born in 1862, and is a graduate of the United States Naval Academy, New York University, and Princeton. He was appointed second secretary of legation at Berlin in 1890, and had worked his way up to the rank of minister through a dozen intervening posts.

His successor is Mr. Charles J. Vopicka, of Chicago, who also was a liberal contributor to the Democratic fund of 1912, most of it, possibly with an eye to the future, being turned into the treasurer after the President was actually elected. A dispatch from London to the New York Sun, reprinted in the Washington Evening Star of March 20, is of some interest in this connection. It must be remembered that Mr. Vopicka is a Bohemian, having been born in Dolni Hbity:

QUEEN "CARMEN SYLVA" SAYS HE IS "CURIOUS"—AMERICAN MINISTER TO BALKAN STATES IS AMAZING THE NEAR EAST—MR. VOPICKA, A CHICAGO BREWER, OWES APPOINTMENT TO SENATOR J. HAMILTON LEWIS.

LONDON, March 20.

Information which has reached the London office of the Sun from responsible sources would seem to suggest that the Washington Government might be interested in the sayings and doing of Charles J. Vopicka, of Chicago, the American minister to the Balkan States.

Mr. Vopicka was sent to the Balkan States as the United States official representative handicapped not only by lack of previous diplomatic experience, but by a name which wouldn't guarantee him entrance to court circles in any of the States to which he is accredited. The Washington Government, it has been learned, was notified of this fact when Mr. Vopicka was suggested as successor to Minister Jackson. But what is a name of opprobium in the languages of the Near East is of sufficient dignity in English, it seems, to be not at all out of place with the prefixed title "minister."

OFFENSIVE SPEECH AT PRAGUE.

The instructions which Secretary of State Bryan sent to Mr. Vopicka to proceed direct to his post after he had delivered an offensive speech at Prague, Bohemia, apparently have had little or no effect, for the behavior of the minister since he has taken over his post has staggered the diplomatists of other nations, who are constantly wondering "what Vopicka is going to do next."

Mr. Vopicka, who owes his appointment to Senator J. HAM LEWIS, was a brewer, who was very popular with the Bohemians of Chicago. He attended a dinner at Prague, where he made a speech which showed no appreciation of his position as a minister of the American diplomatic service. He talked freely and candidly and made some criticisms of Emperor Francis Joseph of Austria. The speech was such an extraordinary one that the American consul general at Prague sent a cable dispatch to the American State Department calling attention to it and intimating that it was calculated to offend a friendly foreign power. The story goes that Secretary of State Bryan immediately wired Mr. Vopicka to proceed to his post without further delay.

VISITS KING IN $12 SHIRT.

At Bucharest, where Mr. Vopicka makes his headquarters, the stories of his doings are reported to have caused Queen Elizabeth ("Carmen Sylva") to remark to one of her intimates: "The American minister, I am told, is a very curious person."

At Sofia Mr. Vopicka drove up to the palace in a state carriage in all the formality with which the arrival of a new minister is accompanied. He said to an American acquaintance as he got out of the carriage, pointing to the soft shirt he wore: "That shirt cost me $12. I wore it when I saw King Charles and King Peter, and now I am wearing it to see Ferdinand."

Mr. Vopicka was then carrying his credentials wrapped up in a small silk American flag, in which he presented them to King Ferdinand.

The story of the rest of that audience is almost incredible, but the correspondent of the Sun is assured that Mr. Vopicka adopted a familiar confidential tone, saying in effect to King Ferdinand:

"I have met Kings Charley and Peter and understand that there has been some difficulty in the Balkan States. If there is any more trouble come to me. I think I will be able to arrange matters."

QUEEN "AWAITS" HIS PLEASURE.

Even less pleasant is the story that Queen Eleanora of Bulgaria, who is soon to pay a visit to the United States, having suggested that she would take Mr. Vopicka on a visit to the hospitals, in which she is very deeply interested, sent an equerry to ask the American minister to appoint a day on which he would accompany her. Mr. Vopicka replied that he was unable to name a day at the moment, but that he would telephone Queen Eleanora and let her know. The proposed visit was naturally canceled, as it is not customary for royalty to await the pleasure of even diplomatic representatives. The admiration of the Bulgarians for Mr. Vopicka was not heightened when they learned that he saw the new year in at a prominent beer hall in Sofia.

The discussions between Mr. Vopicka and his private secretary, Mr. Kendicks, over matters have become almost a matter of common gossip. An Englishman who told the story to the correspondent of the Sun had the misfortune to be called in as arbitrator between the two men.

In a recent manifesto to our foreign representatives Mr. Dooley has enjoined them, in the words of a once popular song, to "Always Leave them Laughing When You Say 'Good-by.'"

From this point of view, at least, Mr. Vopicka is evidently a pearl beyond price.

Mr. Leishman, who had served in various diplomatic posts for 16 years, working up from minister to ambassador, is displaced by Mr. James W. Gerard, of New York, who contributed $13,500 to the Wilson campaign committee, and who is referred to by the Outlook as "a popular member of Tammany Hall." Mr. Penfield, the new ambassador to Austria-Hungary, also contributed $10,000 to the Democratic campaign fund. Col. Harvey, after quoting President Wilson's announcement, shortly after his inauguration, that he would select for the Diplomatic Service "men without wealth, but possessing every other form of qualification," says, referring to this financial side of diplomacy:

With the single exception of Mr. Walter H. Page, who contributed only William Bayard Hale and $100 in cash, all of those appointed are men who, at one time or another, supplied pecuniary aid to his [President Wilson's] canvass.

I do not care to discuss the famous Pindell case, which is recent and notorious history. Of Mr. Pindell it can at least be said, as Malcolm said of Cawdor, "Nothing in his [diplomatic] life became him like the leaving it."

Nor do I care to criticize the still more recent speech before the chamber of commerce in London delivered by our ambassador to the Court of St. James, Mr. Page, in the course of which he said:

I will not say that we have constructed the Panama Canal for you, for I am speaking with great frankness and not with what is sometimes called diplomatic indirection, but I will say, most truly, that it adds greatly to the pleasure of building that great work that it is you who will most profit by it. I can say a similar thing about the recent lowering of our tariff. We did not lower it in order to please you; it was for purposes that we considered economically sound for ourselves. Nevertheless, it added to the pleasure of doing that to reflect that thereby we should receive more trade from you. His [President Wilson's as he delivered the Panama tolls message] was the voice of the people. Nevertheless, it adds to the pleasure of hearing that voice to know that it does please you. The Monroe doctrine, you know, meant only this, that the United States would prefer that no European Government should gain more land in the New World.

Perhaps the most charitable comment on this utterance to the English people is that which Speaker CLARK is reported to have made:

I can not comment on what was said late in the night after a banquet; it was walnuts and wine.

The London press and the foreign press generally realize as well as we the depths to which our Diplomatic Service has been allowed to sink. The London Daily Telegraph, for example, said on November 18 last:

With few exceptions, it is complained, other diplomatists owe their appointment as much to the fact that they assisted the Democratic Party in the last campaign as to anything else. Of the veterans of the service there remain only five. It is not even considered probable that all these will be permitted to serve through the present administration, so insistent is the demand for places by spoilsmen. Never before the Wilson administration, say the critics, has the progressive movement toward building up a real diplomatic service, in which politics should play a diminishing part, been so rudely checked.

President Eliot is reported in the New York Times of December 12 to have said:

Out of 11 ambassadors 8 have been replaced, and out of 35 ministers 22 have been replaced—

These replacements would be materially increased to-day—with the result that some men of long experience have been replaced by untrained men. Of the 22 ministers displaced, 13 had had several years' experience in diplomatic service, while none of the new appointees had had any experience.

Commenting on the above, the New York Times said the next day:

It is notorious that the higher appointments in the Diplomatic Service have largely been made from personal or political favoritism. Able and experienced men have been allowed to go and a number of men with no experience whatever have been appointed. It is said that the ambassador to the Court of St. James was the only one of the new appointees who could talk fluently the language of the capital to which he was accredited.

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes.

Mr. PLATT. Is it possible that the facts you have stated may have had something to do with the recent request to bolster up our foreign policy?

Mr. ROGERS. That may have been indirectly involved. I desire now to refer briefly to a few of the less known European appointments of the present administration.

As ambassador to Spain we find Mr. Joseph E. Willard, a millionaire hotel proprietor and real estate operator of Richmond, Va. He contributed $2,000 to the Wilson campaign of 1912. In comparing him with his predecessor, Col. Harvey, after commenting favorably upon the selection of Thomas Nelson Page as minister to Italy, says:

So much, unhappily, can not be said of his fellow Virginian, Mr. Willard, the new ambassador to Spain, whose sole qualification is his wealth and whose appointment can only be attributed to his generous donations to the cause. As the successor of Mr. Ide, former chief justice and Governor General to the Philippines, who is fully acquainted with the language and customs of Spain and a gentleman of modest fortune, Mr. Willard appears as a complete reversal of the President's aspiration.

Mr. MOORE. I have just come in. Do I understand the gentleman to say that some of these distinguished men who have been appointed ambassadors had contributed to the Democratic campaign fund?

Mr. ROGERS. I will refer the gentleman to details which I have given in the earlier part of my remarks. I certainly do mean to say just that.

Mr. MOORE. Is not that contrary to Democratic policy?

Mr. ROGERS. That is diametrically opposed to the announced Democratic policy, and contrary to the pronouncement of President Wilson a few days after he took office.

Mr. ANSBERRY. I should like to ask my friend if, in his opinion, the present representative of our Government at the Court of St. James, even though he contributed, as the gentleman says he did, has not simply followed the example of the gentleman who preceded him, who was there for no other reason, so it is said, than that he contributed liberally to the Republican campaign fund on all occasions?

Mr. ROGERS. As I said at the outset of my remarks, the Republican Party has not been wholly blameless, but we expected a great improvement at the hands of the Democratic Party. The Republican Party had made a splendid start in the right direction, but the Democratic Party took office with the distinct assurance that it would remedy any trace of the spoils evil that the Republican Party had left behind.

Mr. ANSBERRY. Does the gentleman expect us to do that in one year?

Mr. COOPER. Never.

Mr. ROGERS. See the horrors you have wrought in the Diplomatic Service in one short year.

Like Mr. Walter Hines Page, who, since his Panama-tolls speech above referred to, seems to be enormously popular in England, Mr. Willard is apparently on the best of terms with the King of Spain, at least. I quote from a dispatch which appears in the Washington Post under date of March 16:

Alphonso seized an occasion when he was talking to Ambassador Willard recently to ask whether he, like most Americans, had ever served in the Army or Navy. Mr. Willard replied that he had only been in a militia regiment, whereupon the King asked: "Then why don't you wear a uniform when you come to court? I should delight to see an American militia uniform there." So Col. Willard, who has never made use of his military title, will appear at the next court in the full regimentals of a Virginia militiaman, though this will be a breach of court sartorial precedent, for it is not a diplomatic uniform.

Perhaps Mr. Willard had in mind the experience of his diplomatic colleague upon the Iberian Peninsula. In the words of Col. Harvey:

Col. Thomas H. Birch is well known in New Jersey as a gallant and spirited staff officer, who could hardly have failed to absorb a modicum of wisdom while serving as personal aide to the predecessor of Gov. Fielder. Although the propriety of making his first official appearance in the uniform of a New Jersey colonel may be questioned by cavilers, the fact that Mr. Birch began somewhat extensive preparations for his diplomatic labors by ordering a quantity of embossed stationery under the misapprehension that the legation at Lisbon is an embassy need not be regarded as prejudicial.

Other experienced officers who have been removed after long and distinguished service are Charles H. Graves, once a colonel in the Civil War and in the Regular Army, who had served acceptably nine years as minister to Sweden and Norway, and Peter A. Jay, who had entered the Diplomatic Service as secretary in 1902 and had worked up through six intermediate positions to be agent and consul general at Cairo.

Some of the diplomatic appointments to European capitals are, as we all know, excellent; but on examination it will be found that these are mostly to places where they will "show" the most, and hence where the credit of the administration would be more compromised by notable inferiority. As I have tried to show, wherever posts to be filled were less conspicuous the appointments have apparently been dictated wholly by a desire on the part of some one to repay past political favors. It is often said that President Wilson took unto himself the European appointments and turned over Latin America, body and soul, to the Secretary of State. It may be doubted whether any such bargain were actually made, although, with the exception of a couple of appointments attributable to Col. House and the Postmaster General, most of the new diplomats seem to have a distinctly Bryanesque flavor; but, as I have attempted to show, the appointments to several of the European capitals by no means square with the advanced professions of the President of the United States.

It may be said by some defenders of the administration that much of what I have collated here is, while undoubtedly true, not of a sort to enable us to judge accurately the kind of service which the new gentlemen will render; that, although they may have their peculiarities like the rest of us, they may also render admirable service to their country. Of course this is true. The fact that a man is an eccentric or a buffoon does not exclude the possibility of efficiency. But it is also clearly true that there is an almost unrebuttable presumption that men who have risen in the service as the result of years of toil will be on the average vastly more useful in the delicate missions which they are constantly called upon to perform than those who have grown old without a scintilla of training or experience in their new duties.

Mr. ANSBERRY. Just one more question.

Mr. ROGERS. I can not yield further. There is another important aspect of the case.

Foreign countries—all of them—regard their diplomatic service seriously, if we, or some of us, do not. Many of our neighbors—especially, perhaps, in Latin America—are fond of ceremony and lay great store by the strict etiquette and usages of the diplomatic world. It does not make our new representatives any less worthy or estimable gentlemen if they do not know how to save themselves from being ridiculous, but it does undeniably weaken their position in the sphere which they are called upon to fill.

The newspapers have from time to time referred to various cases of this description in addition to those which I have already mentioned. I have no knowledge of the accuracy of these incidents other than the reputability of the newspapers in which they are printed and the fact that although I have kept somewhat close watch I have seen none of them denied. I shall not mention the names of the ministers involved, because, after all, my indictment is not of any of these gentlemen, but of the system which makes their diplomatic existence possible.

One new minister purchased a pony of his predecessor, giving him his personal check therefor; the check came back from the bank a few days later stamped on the back "No funds." In another case the President of a Latin-American Republic was asked what he thought of our new minister. "The same as you do," was his more or less diplomatic response.

Mr. ANSBERRY. Is the gentleman going——

Mr. COOPER. Regular order!

Mr. ROGERS. I can not yield. I have not the time.

[From the New York Tribune, December 26.]

So bad has the situation become in one Latin-American country that the State Department actually had to send a special agent to the capital of that nation to give the new American minister a course in the rudiments of diplomatic procedure and even in the routine matters having to do with carrying on business with the State Department.

[From the Outlook, March 7, 1914.]

One at least of the new ministers to Latin America is known to have come to Washington in quest of a "job" in the customs service. He was made minister to a small Republic. He protested, saying that he had no qualification for diplomacy and knew nothing of the work of a legation. This was of no avail; he was compelled to accept. A job was a job. It was a $10,000 job. What more did he want? Of one appointee in the field of our delicate relations with the other Americas it is said that "since the day of his arrival at his post he has hardly known a sober moment; his vice and vulgarity have caused consternation there." And this report is confirmed from other independent sources. This man has succeeded a service minister of irreproachable record, public and private. * * * The new appointments to Latin America are in general such as to bring a blush of shame to the cheek of every high-minded American.

[From the New York Sun, September 21.]

It is known in Washington that when one South American Government was sounded on the acceptability of one of Mr. Bryan's selections, of whom naturally no one connected with it had ever heard, it cabled a reply asking that the actual minister be retained, the actual minister having "served up" to his rank through three administrations.

[From the New York Sun, December 21.]

The records of the displaced officers are mostly to be found in so accessible a manual as Who's Who in America, which has been searched by inquirers, mostly in vain, for the life story of their successors. We happen to know that application to the publishers of that excellent publication for such information about the latent diplomatic geniuses whom Mr. Bryan has discovered have resulted in comparative failure. One such application resulted in the discovery of a new envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary who gave has address as the "American consulate" of the capital to which he has newly been accredited, he clearly being unaware that in the bright lexicon of the diplomacy which has been thrust upon him there was such a word as "legation."

The same Sun article just referred to points out that the situation which we have been describing is by no means confined to our foreign posts. The Department of State in Washington is equally a prey to the spoilsmen.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. ROGERS. I can not yield. My time is almost gone.

It is to be remembered that the present administration has made as clean a sweep of all competent diplomatic officers within the department as without it. There are only two men in the department who know how to draw up a diplomatic dispatch in the form current and accepted in the international usage of the world. Those are Mr. Moore and Mr. Adee. The Secretary has made a clean sweep of everybody within his reach, whether in the department or on foreign service, who had any special or general diplomatic capacity. Nobody is left in the department who is not protected by the civil-service rules.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes more to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized for 10 minutes more.

Mr. ROGERS. Since the above was written Mr. John Bassett Moore, one of the two competent men mentioned, has resigned his post in despair. In the words of a newspaper which has been extremely friendly to the administration:

Well, the pilot has been put overboard and good old Admiral Piffle treads the bridge alone. John Bassett Moore, for a year or so the real brains of the State Department, has retired and goes back to what must be a more agreeable job at Columbia. In his term of service as counsellor of the State Department he has earned the thanks of a Nation of people, who will view his departure with regret and the future with misgiving. The wonder is that Prof. Moore was content to hold on so long, with the exasperation necessarily incident to serving under a man with the predilections—and the mentality—of Mr. Bryan. Prof. Moore served well, however. He stuck to the ship while Mr. Bryan went lecturing around the country on his vaudeville circuit. He knew something of navigation and employed that knowledge to the advantage of the Ship of State when the chief officer very obviously knew nothing. We fear that Mr. Wilson will miss this very useful man more than he may know. Whether Mr. Bryan will have the wit to miss him is more doubtful. But that the country as a whole will regret his departure goes without saying, and for the moment one may be justified in wondering what the department will do without at least one man of broad experience and intelligence of international scope.

The Washington correspondent of the New York Times says that the most potent cause of Mr. Moore's dissatisfaction "was the displacement of experienced officers in the State Department to make way for persons of no experience in diplomatic affairs," and the Tribune refers to his despair at the "incompetent horde of retainers now infesting foreign capitals."

If an article in the Washington Post, of March 10, is to be believed, Mr. Adee, the sole survivor, after 30 years of service will resign on June 1, dissatisfied with the conditions which have been allowed to grow up within his ken.

So far as I can learn the secretaryships and the consuls have, in general, been left undisturbed. It is a matter of merest conjecture, however, just how soon the onslaught upon these branches of the service will begin. Indeed, perhaps it may be said to have already begun. Frank W. Mahin, a university and law-school graduate, once a regent of Iowa State University, was appointed, after examination, to the Consular Service in 1897; he had worked up to be consul at Amsterdam, to which post he was appointed in 1910. I quote from the Boston Record, of March 2:

A very interesting story of the discipline of a former United States consul has recently been brought to light in Washington. It seems that the gentleman in question, Frank W. Mahin, recently United States consul at Amsterdam, was found guilty by Secretary Bryan of having given his charwoman $2 a week when the regular price for such service is 50 cents. Of course, this encouraged the poor woman to extravagance and created discontent among the laboring classes, and, quite naturally, many persons objected. Mr. Bryan was not slow to act. He removed Mr. Mahin. That was many weeks ago. Recently it seems that Mr. Mahin was able to clear himself of the charge. Whether he revoked the $1.50 per week from the woman is not known with certainty. Like a true man, Secretary Bryan publicly exonerated him from the charge, but his place had gone in the meantime. The present incumbent of the consulate at Amsterdam is a good Democrat, and Mr. Mahin has been a staunch Republican, but, of course, these facts have nothing to do with the case.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ROGERS. I can not yield; my time is too short.

In conclusion, I desire to quote a few more editorial comments, mostly from newspapers which have been, in the main, extremely approving of President Wilson and of almost every aspect of his administration. The New York Journal of Commerce, under date of November 17, says:

The Secretary of State writes in a most edifying strain about the obligation to cultivate closer relations with the Latin-American Republics and facilitate an intellectual exchange between our people and theirs, and sends to Nicaragua a doctor turned politician; to Honduras, a jack of all trades and casual incumbent of petty political offices; to Guatemala, a reverend gentleman whose sole title to distinction seems to be his Bryanism; to Ecuador, an ex-Congressman who left the Republican party to become a silver Democrat; to Colombia, a Texas ranch owner; and to the Dominican Republic, an obscure criminal lawyer. If any one of these gentlemen knows the Spanish language, it is a mere accident in determining his claim to the appointment; the diplomatic experience of one and all of them is nil, and their capacity to represent the country abroad in any diplomatic position whatever more than questionable. And yet we expect the Latin Americans to respect and esteem us when we send them an assortment of political hacks to do work which other countries reserve for trained diplomats and cultivated gentlemen.

Speaking of the same group, the New York Sun said, under date of December 21:

They will remain so long as they are suffered to remain, at worst scandals, at best jokes; jokes to the officials with whom they have to deal, jokes to their diplomatic colleagues, contributing to the gaiety of other nations and to the shame and disgrace of their own. It is this miserable state of things that Mr. Bryan has what can only be called the impudence of pretending that the motive to it has been a desire to improve the Diplomatic Service. A more brazenly and shamelessly false pretense was never made.

Col. Harvey, writing in the February North American of the Latin-American appointments, says:

Twelve trained and capable representatives, several of whom entered the service under competitive examination and all of whom had long since forsaken partisanship, are superseded by mere party hacks whose ages clearly disqualify them for continuance in office for sufficient time to equip themselves for proper performance of their duties. A clearer case of partisan political debauchery can not be imagined.

This from the "discoverer" of President Wilson!

The New York Sun, on September 21, said of the diplomatic appointments:

As to their special or even general fitness for the places they are to occupy, it is absurd to conceive that Mr. Bryan ever troubled himself with that consideration. If he had, he would have begun by questioning himself as to his own fitness for the Secretaryship of State, and the result of a candid inquiry on that score would have been a vacancy in the office within 24 hours.

The New York Times, in a similar strain, says, December 16:

In only three of the cases have the appointees been men whose station and activity would justify the expectation that they would bring special qualifications to their work. In most instances the presumption that they would not do so is warranted.

I have quoted very freely throughout my remarks from newspaper articles of the past six months and from editorial reference to these news items. It will be observed, as I have before pointed out, that in almost every instance the newspaper cited is regarded as a Democratic organ or sympathizer, and in most departments of governmental activity has been a warm admirer of the administration. How much more damning is their indictment then when they, with every inclination to approve, make these bitter denunciations of the diplomatic changes. Many criticisms of the administration are necessarily matters of opinion on which equally conscientious and well-informed men may differ. Here, on the other hand, is a state of affairs based on definite, specific facts and information with regard to which there can not be the slightest opportunity for difference of opinion. Every fair-minded, reasonable man, whatever his party, must think the same way here. That eminent Democrat, Col. Harvey, refers to the Diplomatic Service—

Whose reformation upon a higher plane, initiated by Secretary Hay and scrupulously safeguarded by Secretary Root and Secretary Knox, with the full approval of Presidents McKinley, Roosevelt, and Taft, reflects the highest credit upon the Republican Party.

And the Outlook for March 7, after adversely criticizing the twenty-odd new appointments to Latin America, "for the reason that with those countries, with which we need to be in increasingly good relations, the men who have been occupying ministerial posts and who have earned those posts by promotion have now been replaced by men of no experience," says:

The political sweep would indicate some abandonment of the policy begun by John Hay. Convinced that our foreign relations were of too much moment to be the plaything of spoilsmen, Mr. Hay established a system of examinations for entrance to the Diplomatic Service. Some of the very men whose places have now been filled by new appointees began their careers in diplomacy, as is shown above, by examination, and reached the higher grades only through the system of promotion, also inaugurated by Mr. Hay. Since his day the retention of such men has been fostered by Secretaries Root and Knox, and has now come to be accepted as the principle governing our service, no matter who may be President in the White House.

Any onslaught on such reforms would be a most objectionable feature in any new administration. Exactly this is true of Mr. Bryan's record. The principle actuating the three Secretaries who preceded him was that politics should play a diminishing part in the service. The contrary has been true of him, for he has put out experienced men at home and abroad to make room for his appointees.

I do not pretend that the record of the Republican Party in this respect is unimpeachable, but no man who has taken the trouble to inform himself in the least degree can fail to be convinced that at least it had in the last decade made a long and noteworthy stride toward the establishment of the Diplomatic Service upon a merit basis. And now in less than a year all this has been thrown away; at best it will take many years to repair the damage. The handicap in the past to getting the best men for our Diplomatic Service had been its lack of permanency. This handicap was being rapidly overcome.

The Democratic Party, recognizing this condition when it cost it nothing, said in its 1912 platform:

Merit and ability should be the standard of appointment and promotion rather than service rendered to a political party.

We have already observed the ringing words of President Wilson to much the same effect. What an opening had he, a former officer of the National Civil Service Reform League and always an avowed leader of the merit system, to get away from such traces of the spoils system as the Republican Party had not already eliminated from the Diplomatic Service. There was his golden opportunity, to recognize the service of the men who had reached a high position by promotion after years of continuous and efficient service. We should not have been satisfied, in view of his professions, if he had merely continued without improvement a most commendable policy of the Republican Party in its recent years. We felt confident that a man of his record could be absolutely depended upon to root out the last hint of Jacksonism, in the Diplomatic Service at least. But to how low a degree has the service been brought within the short space of a year. What hope of the future is held out to the secretaries now in the service to continue with the confidence that merit will mean promotion? What appeal is there to the right men to embark upon this career as their life work? The Secretary of State does not "favor or look with sympathy upon the idea of building up a trained and permanent diplomatic force with a permanent tenure of office such as obtains in the Army and Navy and the Federal judiciary." Indeed, he is quoted as having said that he regards the chance of displacement as "one of the current risks of the business of being a minister." There is summed up in a dozen words the present diplomatic policy of a great Nation. Is it the right policy? Is it a policy which in these days, when skill and specialization are demanded as never before, is likely to raise the United States to that position among its fellow nations which we, as patriotic Americans, demand that it shall occupy? [Applause on the Republican side.] I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back five minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PAGE].

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, it is not my purpose to discuss things political in the brief space of time that I have asked the chairman to yield to me at this time, but, having listened with a good deal of interest to the gentleman that preceded me [Mr. ROGERS], it is no wonder to me or any other Democrat that the members of the party that has been in control of the Government for 16 years and has so manipulated the pretended civil-service laws that we have as to fill every branch of the Government with partisan Republicans should now think it a crime that any of these men should lose their places at the public trough. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

I am not, I am free to say, an ardent admirer of the civil service, and never have been; but as administered by the party that has been in power for these last years in our country, I do not hesitate to say that it is a howling farce. But it is my purpose to discuss for a little while not the particular items contained in the appropriation bill that is now before the House, but appropriations in general.

In the first place, I want to say—because, perhaps, some gentlemen do not know—that I am not a member of the subcommittee that framed this bill. I think there are few men in the House who do not have service upon the committees that frame appropriation bills who have any adequate idea of the amount of painstaking labor that is bestowed by gentlemen upon whom this responsibility is placed in the making of these bills as they are reported to the House. Days and nights of laborious effort are put forth on the part of the membership of these committees in an effort to report bills that are in line with the promises of a party to which they belong, the party that is responsible to the country, having gone to the country on a promise to cut off these appropriations that are not warranted in the public service and in confining the amounts to what is necessary to be appropriated for the efficient and effective service of the Government.

These Members of the House who do this onerous labor deserve not only the consideration of the membership of the House, but they deserve the consideration of the country. But the responsibility, after all, for the appropriations that are made of the public money is a divided one, and the responsibility finally comes to that party that is in power in the country for the appropriation of the public money. I have no disposition to try to place upon the minority side of the Chamber the slightest responsibility for any appropriation that is enacted into law by the Sixty-third Congress. I believe that full responsibility rests with the majority side of the House and the majority of the other legislative body.

Responsibility for appropriations from a party standpoint rests with the executive department that submits to Congress the items for the expenses of the Government for the fiscal year for which we are appropriating. I want to say that in my observation, it matters not which political party is in power, the administrative branch of the Government, because of circumstances that surround it, because of the environment and human nature that pervades all men, that they being the people who are to expend the money that we appropriate, are inclined to ask for more than is essential for the economical administration of governmental affairs. In proof of this statement, if you will take the Book of Estimates that is submitted to the Congress and the appropriation bills as they are reported out of the committee, and the bills that finally pass and are written into the law, you will find without exception, not only during this Congress but during the preceding Congress and all former Congresses, the estimates of the expenses of the Government submitted by the executive departments have been in excess of the amount either recommended by the committees or enacted into law by the Congress.

The Government has gotten along fairly well with the amounts appropriated. Therefore the conclusion is inevitable that the executive branch very often asks for more money than is necessary for the proper conduct of the Government. Their reasoning seems to be, "while we are asking we will ask a plenty."

The next responsibility in the matter of appropriations of course rests with the committees who frame the appropriation bills, and I have already spoken of the labor that is involved on the part of the members of these committees in making up these bills. I believe I can say, certainly so far as my own personal observation goes, that the gentlemen composing the appropriating committees of the present Congress are really striving and trying to hold the appropriations of the Government within reasonable amounts. Certainly we as a party and as individual Democrats are committed to economy and an economical administration of governmental affairs. We have written it large in platforms and proclaimed it upon a thousand stumps. Few things contributed more to the turning out of power the Republican Party than their recklessness of expenditure, their willingness to continually increase taxes in order that the Treasury would be equal to the ever-increasing demands made upon it by the making of greater and not infrequently indefensible appropriations.

Last of all, the responsibility of course rests with the Congress itself; and while I am not disposed to read a lecture to the absent membership of the House, the responsibility rests upon each member of the majority, in his individual capacity, to respect the pledge of his party, and, where committees have made reductions, stand behind them.

There has never been an appropriation bill, so far as my observation goes, reported to this Congress or to any former Congress since I have had the honor to be a Member of it, that was not increased over the amount that was recommended by the committee reporting it by the membership of the House upon the floor in the passage of the bill. In other words, the tendency always has been to increase and never to reduce, and this accounts in large measure for the fact that every bill enacted into law by the Congress is in a larger amount than the amount recommended by the committees who, item by item, studied the detail of the appropriations making up the aggregate of the bill. We have recently seen some of the influences that are seen in every Congress, the influences that bring about this condition of things. I do not hesitate to say that there are certain organizations in this country that are strong enough and powerful enough, because of their political influence or of their supposed political influence to write into appropriation bills in their passage through the House of Representatives and through the Senate amounts that are not estimated for by the executive departments, for which there is no warrant of law. That has been recently done in this present Congress, and because of the political influences that surround gentlemen they feel impelled to appropriate the tax money of the people in an amount not warranted by any evidence given to the Congress beyond the amount that is necessary for the proper and economical administration of the particular function of government for which it is appropriated.

The attitude of the country as a whole toward the expenditure of public money is just the same attitude as the membership of this House, because human nature in the aggregate is, after all, the aggregate human nature of the individual.

If an appropriation is going into a given congressional district or into a given section of the country, not only the Representatives of that section or of that district upon the floor of this House stand for that appropriation, whether it is reasonable or not, but it is only the truth to say that the people where this money is to be expended stand for the same thing, regardless of whether or not it is in the proper amount. This attitude of mind is largely because of the method by which taxes are raised. An indirect method of taxation takes away from the people that feeling of direct contribution and makes them careless and indifferent as to the expenditure of their own tax money. The people have not yet realized that they pay the freight. Let us hope that some recent legislation—the corporation tax and the income tax—will bring at least a small part of the population to a realization of the fact that they are contributors to the expense of the maintenance of the National Government. The only hope, in my judgment, of ever reducing in amount the money that is expended for the conduct of the affairs of the Government lies in this direction, and unless we get away further and further from the system of indirect taxation and come to a system of direct taxation the expense of the conduct of the Government, in spite of the promises we have made to the people, will be such that we will never see the day when we will spend less than a billion dollars each year. I am one of those who believe that this amount is far and away more than is necessary for the proper conduct of every department of the affairs of the Government.

I have very little doubt but that a statement made by a former Republican leader of the Senate was a little strongly put when he said that the affairs of Government might be as efficiently and effectively conducted as they are at the present time on $300,000,000 less a year. I do not know whether that can be measured up to or not, but I have had within the last few years an intimate enough association with this matter of the appropriation of public money to convince me that the affairs of the Government might be conducted for a very much less sum of money than we are expending under the present system.

Some time ago we had a good deal of agitation about the election or the formation of a budget committee. There is no question in my mind but that the present system of appropriations is loose—not at two ends, but at half a dozen ends—and that there ought to be some check placed on the matter of appropriations and even upon the committees that are appropriating the public funds. But we may have all of the budget committees we please for the parceling out to the various appropriating committees of the money, and they may be as effective as is possible, and yet so long as the power is left to the majority of the American Congress to vote away the people's money a budget committee can not control the expenditure of the public money, because that committee would have to control the majority of both branches of the Congress before it could reduce or keep within certain bounds the expenditures.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Certainly.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Does not the gentleman think that a budget committee would be, however, a valuable addition?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I am free to say to the gentleman that I have not reached a definite conclusion. I do not know just how much might be effected by the creation of a budget committee the functions of which are merely to place a limitation upon the appropriating committees as to the amount they could expend, but I will say this, because I do not want to be misunderstood: This part of the legislative branch of the Government has and can have no control over another branch. The gentleman knows, as I know, that every appropriation bill that goes from this branch to the other branch is increased, never diminished.

We may place all the limitations we please upon it which are proper in this House and live up to it, and yet we have no power in the last analysis to keep them from writing more into the bills than the budget committee has apportioned to the committees of the House.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That is very true; of course, the only effect it could have in that respect would be the moral effect.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. If the gentleman will allow, I have never seen an instance in which any moral influence affected some legislative bodies when it comes to appropriating money. Every time some gentleman wants an appropriation for a specific object or a special purpose, knowing that the limit has been reached so far as the revenues of the country are concerned in the expenditures already authorized or already in contemplation, if it happens to be that he wants to increase the amount of pensions paid to the old soldiers, and I do not hesitate to say, with all due credit to the patriotism of those who defended the country, that the largest element entering into these appropriations is political, "Why," they say, "yes; this is a large amount of money, to be sure, and we can ill afford to take it out of the Treasury, but build a battleship less and we will have enough money to do this." Some other gentleman wants to improve a harbor or to dig out a river where no commerce will ever float, and he says, "Pay less pensions to the old soldiers and we will have enough money for the digging out of harbors and the canalization of rivers to make the commerce of this country what it should be," and so it goes on through the whole list.

Mr. BARTLETT. And the alternative is either to reduce the number of battleships or pay less pensions to soldiers.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Of course. Gentlemen who have charge of the naval bill come upon the floor of the House, and every 12 months during the 11 years I have had the honor to serve in this body they have endeavored to show us we were upon the very brink of war and appealed to the patriotism of the country in order that we may grant the demands in favor of this branch of the Government. There is no defense, in my judgment, for the amount of money appropriated for the naval establishment to-day, and it is indefensible from any standpoint; there is but one reason for these continued appropriations, in my judgment, and that is the Armor-plate Trust. [Applause.] We hear the same thing when it comes to appropriating in connection with the Army.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I say to the gentleman that the same reasons given in other countries and this as reasons why they have been able to keep up their big sums appropriated for armament are also carried on by the men who are engaged in the manufacture of armor plate and armament?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Certainly; they are the beneficiaries of the appropriation, and, of course, it is very evident here and everywhere.

Mr. BARTLETT. As evidence of it we have the scandals in Germany and Japan on this subject.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Of course. I have come to the place where individually I have lost hope of seeing the appropriations for the conduct of the Government reduced. If it is not one thing, then it is another. We had come within sight of a reduction of the public expenditures with the completion of the Panama Canal. We hope to open that great waterway to the world within a very short time, and appropriations for it are already diminishing and will be less in the bill we report at this session of Congress than they have been possibly since we have had that great undertaking in hand, but as we saw in sight the hope for a saving of the Public Treasury there, we are confronted with a proposition, already enacted into law, to build a railroad, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] expressed it, from a glacier to an iceberg in frozen Alaska, and there spend $40,000,000 of the people's money. So I have lost hope that there is any possibility of ever reducing the amount that is to be expended by the American Congress.

If it does not go for one thing it will go for another, and the task, my colleagues, that is your task and mine, and the one that the people are going to hold us responsible for, is in the future not so much the aggregate amount of these appropriations, because they, like myself, have lost hope of reducing them, but they are going to tenaciously hold us to account for the details of those expenditures. If we expend money for a proper thing, well and good, but they are not going to countenance a continuance of the expenditure for those things that they, the people, do not want and do not believe are necessary.

In conclusion, because I realize that I am consuming very much more time than I intended to consume, I wish to say there is just one item proposed in the pending bill about which I desire to speak a word, realizing as I do that when the bill comes before the House in the Committee of the Whole under the five-minute rule and this item is reached almost every gentleman in the House will want to take a turn at it, and I may not then have the opportunity. I refer to the proposition that has been reported in this bill touching the mileage of the Members of Congress. During my service in this body, I think with the exception of the first Congress, the Fifty-eighth, I have made an effort, either in the committee or upon the floor of the House in the Committee of the Whole, to reduce the present mileage paid to Members of Congress.

On this, as on some other propositions that I have advocated dear to Members' hearts, I have gone down each time to defeat. At this time, while I shall support the proposition that is submitted in the bill for the paying of the actual expenses to and from the sessions of Congress of a Member and the immediate and dependent members of his family, I am free to say that I do not think it is the best proposition that could be adopted, for the reason that has been stated by several gentlemen who interrupted the chairman of the subcommittee in his presentation of the bill this morning. My objection to that is that it brings about a review on the part of somebody of the statements that would be made by each Member of Congress, and it will likely bring about some embarrassments and a great number of inequalities. My friend from Ohio may come to the Capital in the drawing-room of a Pullman car, while I may come from about an equal distance in an ordinary berth, and very often I have to take the upper one, and there would be criticism as to his expense upon the same mileage, as being greater than mine; or, if the proposition was reversed, of mine being greater than his. And I think that is one criticism of this proposition that is submitted here, with one other, for which I do not believe there is any justification, and I have stated it repeatedly in the discussion of this matter at former times, of the Government paying the expenses of my wife or my children from our home to the National Capital. [Applause.]

I do not think it is any more the business of the Government to pay the railroad fare of my wife and children than it is to pay their board bill or to pay anything else in connection with their expenses. The Government gives to each Member of Congress a salary which, if he is extremely economical, he can manage to squeeze through on, and any Member who comes to the Congress of the United States for the money there is in it has no business in the Congress.

Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I do.

Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin. Do you not think the allowance of mileage for a Member's wife will tend to encourage matrimony among the Members of this House?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. No. I do not think they need any encouragement. There is not an unmarried Member of it but that would embark upon that enterprise if he had a proper opportunity, mileage or no mileage.

But, as I have said, I shall support this measure, because it is a vast improvement over the present law. I tell you, my colleagues of the House of Representatives, say what you please about this being a part of the compensation of Members, you will never convince the people of the country that it is anything but a little piece of petty graft that you are standing for, and the House of Representatives and each individual in it ought to rise above the selfishness that impels him to want a few dollars to come in this way and remove from the body as a whole the criticism that is aimed at it by the public on matters of this kind. I was going to say if this proposition is voted down I shall offer an amendment paying the Member of Congress 5 cents a mile each way to and from a session of Congress, and that is, in my individual judgment, what the amount should be. That will meet every expenditure that he has to make in coming to and going from Washington.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. For a question.

Mr. FESS. Why not make it the actual mileage that we pay in the States when we travel from place to place? Why put it at 5 cents a mile?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Simply because you want it to be a definite amount. There is no fixed charge. You pay so much a mile for your railroad fare, but your Pullman fare makes a difference. I would like to pay the expense of traveling to and from the Capital, that and no more. And, as I said, should this proposition fail, I shall offer that amendment to the bill. And I hope that something will be done at this time to remove, as I said a while ago, that criticism of the Congress as a whole, as well as to individual Members, because we are going on at this late day, accepting—paying to ourselves 20 cents a mile for travel—an amount that was fixed 50 years ago under conditions absolutely different from those which prevail to-day.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, in the opening of the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ANSBERRY] he called attention to two diplomatic representatives of this country who had been accused of doing dishonorable things, and, when pressed for the names of those persons, the gentleman from North Carolina refused to yield. It leaves the situation, I think, in a very bad way. In all fairness to the gentleman from Ohio and in all fairness to that great body of honest diplomatic representatives of the United States, I think the two men referred to ought to be named, in order that those who are not guilty will not be stamped with this ignominy.

Mr. ANSBERRY. Mr. Chariman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. ANSBERRY. I will state to the gentleman this: I repeatedly sought to interrupt the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS] to ask him the selfsame question that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] has asked of me, or that he has intimated he would ask me—that is, to name the two gentlemen to whom he referred—and the gentleman from Massachusetts received encouragement from the very gentleman who now asks me that question not to yield, so that I could answer the question; and now my friend complains that no name was mentioned in connection with the things I said. I want to ask the gentleman from Iowa, in all fairness——

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I did not yield to the gentleman for a speech. I yielded to him to give the names of the two persons he says have violated the laws of this country.

Mr. ANSBERRY. Does not the gentleman know the names of the two persons referred to?

Mr. GOOD. No.

Mr. ANSBERRY. Then you have read them in the newspapers?

Mr. GOOD. No.

Mr. ANSBERRY. If the gentleman is anxious to get this into the RECORD, I will tell the gentleman plainly I am not going to mention the names, because as to the first one I do not recollect his name, and——

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I did not yield for a speech.

Mr. ANSBERRY. The gentleman wants to know my position on this matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. GOOD. The gentleman can get time from the other side if he wishes to speak.

Mr. ANSBERRY. But the gentleman from Iowa asked me a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio must understand that the gentleman from Iowa has the floor, and need not yield to him unless he wishes. That is his privilege.

Mr. ANSBERRY. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ANSBERRY. The gentleman impugned my motives in making a statement here on the floor a few moments ago, and called upon me to answer; and when I rose here for the purpose of answering it, the gentleman refused to yield to me the time in which to answer.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, a point of order. That is not a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. ANSBERRY. We will see about that. The gentleman, then, says he will not yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not making a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Ohio understands the rules sufficiently to know that when a gentleman has the floor he has the right to refuse to yield as he may desire.

Mr. ANSBERRY. The gentleman does not understand the situation. He did yield the floor for the purpose of allowing me to answer, and then he stopped me in the middle of my statement after he had yielded to me.

The CHAIRMAN. From his observation of the rules of the House and from their interpretation by other Chairmen of the Committee of the Whole, the present occupant of the chair thinks the gentleman who has the floor has the right to yield for the purpose of answering a question, and he has the right at any time to stop the answer, as he pleases.

Mr. ANSBERRY. That is a species of sharp practice that ought not to be permitted under any rule.

The CHAIRMAN. There is no case of sharp practice to be passed on by the Chair.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is entirely mistaken. My sole motive in asking the question of the gentleman from Ohio—to name the two persons—was to remove from that body of men who have been doing honest and good work in our Diplomatic Service the charge that the gentleman places upon them.

Mr. ANSBERRY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. I will not yield now.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa declines to yield.

Mr. GOOD. It was not to place the gentleman, whom I admire, in any bad light. I did feel that the gentleman was placed in a bad light when the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PAGE] refused to yield when the question was asked him. If I should make the charge on the floor of this House that a Representative was dishonest, I would not leave that charge standing as a general indictment against the whole House.

Mr. ANSBERRY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. No; I can not yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. GOOD. But if a question was asked me to name the person who was dishonest and a criminal, I would name him, and not leave the charge in the air.

Mr. ANSBERRY. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, a man can not be taken off the floor on a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] has the floor, and he has repeatedly refused to yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ANSBERRY]. The Chair hopes the committee will be in order.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I have not raised this question for the purpose of stirring up any bad blood. I raised it in order, first, that the gentleman might not rest under the charge that he would make a general indictment against this class of men without naming the person who brought in gasoline for friends in violation of the law or who was sued for a gambling debt while he was a diplomatic representative. The gentleman can see that by leaving that charge unexplained, without naming the persons, it leaves the charge resting upon every man who has served in that capacity. I do not know—and I will say to the gentleman from Ohio that I have asked a number of men on this side of the House about it—and I have been unable to ascertain the name of either of those gentlemen. They have never heard the names. I do think that the gentleman ought to name the men, and I yield to him for the purpose of naming the men, but for no other purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GOOD. For the purpose, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. ANSBERRY. I want an opportunity, Mr. Chairman, of answering the gentleman and the statement he made with reference to me before I will answer any question which the gentleman propounds.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield to the gentleman from Ohio for that purpose?

Mr. GOOD. The gentleman from Ohio has not the floor?

The CHAIRMAN. No; the gentleman from Ohio has not the floor.

Mr. GOOD. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ANSBERRY] for the purpose of naming the two men that he referred to a while ago, and for no other purpose.

Mr. ANSBERRY. Mr. Chairman, I refuse to accept the time of the gentleman, and with it a string which only permits me to say what he desires me to say, in the face of the fact that on this floor, in violation of the rules, as I understand them, he made a statement with reference to me that was absolutely lacking in fact.

Mr. LAFFERTY. The regular order!

Mr. GOOD. Oh, I think the gentleman——

Mr. ANSBERRY. In making that statement I do not intend to impugn the gentleman's honesty.

Mr. MOORE. Will the gentleman from Iowa yield?

Mr. GOOD. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MOORE. Is it not true that the gentleman from Ohio, in asking his question of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS], stated that he had read in the newspapers about these two ambassadors?

Mr. ANSBERRY. Why, certainly.

Mr. MOORE. And is it not true that apparently the gentleman from Ohio did not feel that he was in a position to name them?

Mr. GOOD. I do not know what the gentleman's feelings are in that respect.

Mr. MOORE. Was it not the impression of the gentleman from Iowa that the purpose of the gentleman from Ohio was to put the responsibility of the answer to his question upon the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS], and that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ANSBERRY] desired to evade responsibility for that statement?

Mr. GOOD. I do not know what was in his mind. I can only answer the gentleman by saying that the charge was made, and I felt——

Mr. ANSBERRY. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. When I have finished my statement. I felt that in fairness to the diplomatic representatives of the United States the names of the persons who had violated the law ought to be placed in the RECORD.

Mr. MOORE. In view of the fact that the gentleman from Ohio evidently was following a newspaper report only, and had no knowledge of his own upon which to go, and desired to place the responsibility upon the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS] of making criminal charges against two of our ambassadors, would it not be just as well to let the gentleman from Ohio get out of it the best way he can?

Mr. GOOD. I have no objection. The gentleman may expunge it from the RECORD if he desires, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. ANSBERRY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield the floor.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER].

Mr. ANSBERRY. Will the gentleman let me have five minutes?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I have promised to yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. ANSBERRY. By that time what I want to say will be cold.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. ANSBERRY. Make it 10 minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ANSBERRY] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. ANSBERRY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD], who stated that he had such a high regard for the gentleman from Ohio, was so obviously fair in his reference that while he called attention to the things that I said I had read in newspapers with reference to Republican members of the Diplomatic Corps, and he wanted me to name them, everyone present recalled that he stood up here and interrupted the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS], and doubtless he was going to ask him to name the Democrats to whom he referred as being guilty of dishonorable practices. Did he? Of course he did not. That only illustrates how fair he wanted to be.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman——

Mr. ANSBERRY. I decline to yield. You have charge of the time on the other side. I have only a few moments. That shows the gentleman's fairness. He is not fair, despite the fact that he approaches us with fair words. I will say that the gentleman who was alleged to have been sued for $75,000 to which I referred was the ambassador to the court of Berlin, a man by the name of Leishman. Did the gentleman ever hear of that transaction by that gentleman?

Mr. GOOD. I have heard his name——

Mr. ANSBERRY. That is the man who was sued.

Mr. GOOD. Are you addressing the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. ANSBERRY. I am addressing the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GOOD. I have heard of Mr. Leishmann, but I never heard——

Mr. ANSBERRY. I refuse to yield further to the gentleman. You can speak in your own time. Now, mind you, I do not know that this newspaper story was true. I read it, not in one paper at one time, but many times in many papers; and doubtless men in this Chamber, on both sides of it, read the same thing. It is only fair to this man, whom I did not intend to name, and whom I have named only because of the question asked by the gentleman from Iowa and the statement made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE]—it is only fair to him to say that I noticed the other day in the paper that he had paid the judgment of $75,000 for the debt contracted, it is said by the newspapers, in a stock-gambling transaction. Now, as to the unfortunate young man with reference to whom I made the other statement, I do not know whether the statement is true. I hope that it is not, just as I hope that the statement with reference to the ambassador to Germany, Mr. Leishmann, is not true. It was printed in the newspapers, as this other story was. I do not remember the name of the gentleman connected with the other transaction to which I referred, but I understand he was in the Diplomatic Service for many years, so that I think we can fairly assume that long service in the diplomatic corps does not render any man, no matter the political party to which he gives allegiance, immune to the ordinary temptations of ordinary men. And now I will ask my friend from Iowa if he will not, in fairness, ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS] to disclose the names of the unfortunate Democratic diplomats, one of whom committed the heinous offense of paying for a pony with a check which was returned dishonored and the other of whom he said was in a continuous state of intoxication?

As I said before, I have given the gentleman all the information I have. It is up to the gentleman's friend and colleague, whom he protected when I asked him the selfsame question that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WOOD] asked me.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN].

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, the President in one of his messages to Congress has recommended the enactment of additional antitrust legislation. Among other things, the President recommended the creation of a Federal trade commission, to have certain jurisdiction over industrial corporations. The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and the Committee on the Judiciary have had extensive hearings on pending bills covering the entire subject of antitrust legislation. I have been greatly interested in this subject. I am an ardent advocate of the proposition to create a Federal trade commission. I believe that such a commission, with adequate power and jurisdiction, is absolutely necessary to protect the people from the large industrial concerns, possessing more or less monopolistic power. The Republican and Progressive Parties, by platform declarations, and the Democratic Party by the message of the President, are committed to the proposition to create a Federal trade commission. The controversy in this legislation will be over the power to be given to such commission. In the bill which I introduced in this House more than two years ago—to create a national commission with jurisdiction over large industrial corporations engaged in interstate commerce—the first of the kind ever introduced in this House—gives the commission extensive power, sufficient, I think, to enable it to control not only the practices but, if necessary, the prices which our large corporations charge for their products. In a short time we will no doubt be discussing the question as to what power we should give the proposed Federal trade commission. What the various States have done along this line may be helpful to the National Government.

Oklahoma has a corporation commission which, I believe, has more extensive power than any like commission in any other State in the Union. The commission was created by our constitution and given in that instrument comprehensive power over all transportation, communication, and public utility corporations. The power of the commission was largely extended by an act of our legislature, as follows:

Sections 8220 and 8235, Revised Laws of Oklahoma, Annotated, 1910, provide:

"SEC. 8220. Every act, agreement, contract, or combination in the form of trust, or otherwise, or conspiracy in restraint of trade or commerce within this State which is against public policy is hereby declared to be illegal."

"SEC. 8235. Whenever any business, by reason of its nature, extent, or the existence of a virtual monopoly therein, is such that the public must use the same, or its services, or the consideration by it given or taken or offered, or the commodities bought or sold therein are offered or taken by purchase or sale in such manner as to make it of public consequence, or to affect the community at large as to supply, demand, or price, or rate thereof; or said business is conducted in violation of the first section of this article, said business is a public business and subject to be controlled by the State, by the corporation commission, or by any action in any district court of the State, as to all of its practices, prices, rates, and charges. And it is hereby declared to be the duty of any person, firm, or corporation engaged in any public business to render its services and offer its commodities, or either, upon reasonable terms, without discrimination, and adequately to the needs of the public, considering the facilities of said business."

Under this statute our State corporation commission has heard and acted upon a number of cases. I believe this statutory provision is a wise one, and I think should be carefully studied in connection with out antitrust legislation. In connection therewith I believe the decisions rendered by our corporation commission would also be of value, and I ask leave to print as part of my remarks a statement covering some of the important decisions under the Oklahoma statute rendered by the Oklahoma Corporation Commission and furnished me by Hon. George A. Henshaw, a member of the Corporation Commission of Oklahoma. The synopsis of such decisions furnished by Commissioner Henshaw is as follows:

CORPORATION COMMISSION OF OKLAHOMA,
Oklahoma City, November 28, 1913.

Proposed Order No. 123. Order No. 769. In re proposed Order No. 123, investigation relative price of crude and refined petroleum. Cause No. 1719.

Appearances: E. C. Patton, for the commission; Dillard & Blake, attorneys for the Texas Co.; Burwell, Crockett & Johnson, attorneys for the Waters-Pierce Oil Co.; Parker & Simons, attorneys for the Enid Independent Oil Co.

FINDINGS OF FACT, OPINION, AND ORDER.

By the commission: The commission issued proposed Order No. 123 after many complaints had been filed, claiming that the stronger companies were trying to drive the weaker companies out of the State. During this hearing special complaints were made at the town of Enid, and special investigation was made at that place during the month of August.

It was claimed at this hearing by some of the complainants, who were engaged in the distribution of oil, that the price had formerly been made on the suggestion of the Waters-Pierce Oil Co. Our constitution provides that a commodity can not be sold in one part of the State of Oklahoma cheaper than in another part, plus additional freight rate, if any. At the time of the investigation at Enid special or secret prices had been made by some of the companies, and gasoline was being sold in some instances at approximately the cost thereof to the distributor. The evidence showed that the distributors who bought their supply from the manufacturers in Oklahoma paid slightly more than 11 cents per gallon for gasoline and 4 cents for kerosene.

It is claimed there is a loss in evaporation and waste of gasoline of about 2 cents per gallon; that it costs from 1 to 1½ cents to distribute the same. Hence the actual cost of gasoline on this basis would be approximately 15 cents per gallon.

At the time of the hearing gasoline was being sold to the retail merchant at from 15 to 19 cents per gallon and in some instances as low as 14 cents per gallon. Since the hearing the oil distributors at Enid were notified to raise the price of gasoline to 19 cents per gallon and kerosene to 9 cents per gallon. This order was made by the refineries, without any increase in the price of crude oil or increase in the price by the refineries to their distributing agents.

The loss by evaporation and waste in kerosene will not exceed one-fourth cent per gallon. Hence, the total cost to the distributor of kerosene would not exceed 6 cents per gallon, including the freight.

While this investigation has not been concluded in detail, the evidence was closed so far as the special conditions at Enid were concerned. However, at the close of that hearing all parties were notified they could introduce additional evidence at Oklahoma City. No request has been made of the commission to introduce any evidence, as shown by the record. Counsel for the Waters-Pierce Co. suggested to one member of the commission that they wanted to refute some testimony in reference to that company fixing the price of oil at Enid. However, nothing has been offered up to date.

In view of the fact that the prices have been arbitrarily raised pending this hearing beyond the maximum amount which was charged at the time of the hearing, the commission will fix the prices for the sale of kerosene and gasoline at Enid.

The Attorney General has filed a complaint with the commission involving substantially the same matter, which has been set for hearing at the December term, and the prices herein made are subject to revision during that hearing, and are only intended as a temporary or emergency order until the commission can arrive at its conclusions after the hearing that is to be conducted upon behalf of the people by the Attorney General. The Government is also making an investigation of the relative value of crude oil in Oklahoma. Copy of that report will be filed with the commission as soon as completed.

The contract between the refineries and some of the distributing agents at Enid provides that in case the price of crude oil advances the price of refined oil should advance one-twentieth of that amount.

It is the conclusion of the commission that gasoline should be sold at Enid in quantities of 5 gallons or more at a price not less than 16½ cents nor more than 17½ cents per gallon, and that kerosene should be sold at a price not less than 7½ cents nor more than 8 cents per gallon, and that these prices should prevail at all points in Garfield, Kingfisher, Blaine, Major, Alfalfa, Woods, Woodward, Ellis, Dewey, and Grant Counties, plus any additional cost in freight rates to the different points.

It is therefore ordered that pending the investigation of the complaint filed by the attorney general and the general investigation herein, all parties engaged in the distribution of kerosene and gasoline in Garfield, Kingfisher, Blaine, Major, Alfalfa, Woods, Woodward, Ellis, Dewey, and Grant Counties shall charge therefor in quantities of 5 gallons or more for gasoline not less than 16½ cents per gallon nor more than 17½ cents per gallon, and for kerosene not less than 7½ cents nor more than 8 cents per gallon: Provided, That lower grades of gasoline and kerosene than the standard may be sold at a different price: Provided, That the grade and price be first submitted to and approved by the commission: Provided further, That where parties have heretofore made contracts to furnish gasoline or kerosene at a certain price for a given time these contracts may be carried out if submitted to and approved by the commission, and the commission will approve any reasonable, valid contract that may differ from the prices herein set forth.

Should this order in any way work any hardship on any of the distributors of kerosene and gasoline, or any of the consumers thereof, pending the time for which it is issued, the commission will hear an application to modify or adjust the order to meet all necessary and reasonable conditions when at the same time the public may not be injured.

This order shall take effect on and after the 15th day of December, 1913.

CORPORATION COMMISSION,
A. P. WATSON,
GEO. A. HENSHAW,
Commissioners.

Attest:

J. H. HYDE, Secretary.

Sections 8220 and 8235, Revised Laws of Oklahoma Annotated, 1910, provide:

SEC. 8220. Every act, agreement, contract, or combination in the form of trust, or otherwise, or conspiracy in restraint of trade or commerce within this State, which is against public policy, is hereby declared to be illegal.

SEC. 8235. Whenever any business, by reason of its nature, extent, or the existence of a virtual monopoly therein, is such that the public must use the same, or its services, or the consideration by it given or taken or offered, or the commodities bought or sold therein are offered or taken by purchase or sale in such manner as to make it of public consequence or to affect the community at large as to supply, demand, or price or rate thereof, or said business is conducted in violation of the first section of this article, said business is a public business, and subject to be controlled by the State, by the corporation commission, or by any action in any district court of the State, as to all of its practices, prices, rates, and charges; and it is hereby declared to be the duty of any person, firm, or corporation engaged in any public business to render its services and offer its commodities, or either, upon reasonable terms without discrimination, and adequately, to the needs of the public, considering the facilities of said business.

Reference to opinions and orders of the corporation commission under the antitrust act of Oklahoma pertaining to the following classes of business:

1. Ice manufacturers and distributors.
2. Cotton gins.
3. Cotton compressors.
4. Oil, kerosene and gasoline.
5. Newspapers.
6. Retail lumber yards.
7. Mill products.
8. Combination laundries.
9. Bus and transfer companies.

Reference will be made under each subject in the order above named, and all of the orders made under this act by the commission have been complied with and appear to have the effect of satisfying all parties interested.

1. ICE MANUFACTURERS AND DISTRIBUTORS.

Order No. 210, Corporation Commission's Second and Third Annual Reports, 1909–10, page 353, directs that the Tishomingo Ice & Cold Storage Co. shall deliver ice to all persons in the town of Tishomingo, and scales shall be carried on each wagon and ice weighed to consumers when requested.

Order No. 227, same report, page 358, fixes the price at which the Ada Ice & Fuel Co. shall sell ice to the different classes of consumers in the town of Ada.

Order No. 233, same report, page 354, directs the Mangum Ice & Cold Storage Co. to deliver ice to all parties within the corporate limits of the city of Mangum and fixes the prices to be charged consumers.

Order No. 255, same report, page 361, directs Nathan Sass to weigh ice to consumers in the town of Marietta when requested.

Order No. 256, same report, page 390, directs D. B. Hull to weigh and deliver ice to consumers when requested.

Order No. 330, same report, page 403, directs the Geary Light & Ice Co. to keep its manufacturing plant clean and sanitary, and to adopt sufficient measures to protect ice in process of manufacture against contamination, and to manufacture pure and wholesome ice which is sold to the public.

Order No. 451, Corporation Commission's Fourth Annual Report, 1911, page 419, imposes a fine of $100 on the Pauls Valley Ice Co. for violation of order No. 256, refusing to deliver ice as directed in said order.

Order No. 504, same report, page 496, directs the Tishomingo Ice & Cold Storage Co. to deliver ice to consumers and fixes the price thereof.

Order No. 505, Corporation Commission's Fifth Annual Report, volume 1, 1912, page 498, directs all ice manufacturers in Oklahoma City to not deliver ice to any person for delivery to consumers in Oklahoma City unless such person shall have a permit from the corporation commission to deliver ice within the city; permits to be issued by the commission to all who may apply, and shall authorize the recipient thereof to deliver ice to consumers in Oklahoma City until they short weight the consumers. When any person delivering ice in Oklahoma City who willfully fails or refuses to give the approximate correct weight of ice purchased, the permit shall be canceled and the offending party shall not be allowed to deliver ice in Oklahoma City thereafter.

NOTE.—The above order has been obeyed, and there has been no complaint in Oklahoma City among consumers as to amount of ice purchased. The cause of the above order was an understanding or combination between employees engaged in distributing ice to sell 300 pounds for the price of 400 pounds and only account to the ice manufacturer for 300 pounds. It was estimated by the ice manufacturers that the people of Oklahoma City were being defrauded of at least $200 a day by this process.

Order No. 708, not published. Complaint against the New State Brewing Association, asking that the company be required to sell ice to ice distributors for the purpose of reselling to the consumer in Oklahoma City. The case was dismissed, the commission holding: "The manufacturer of a commodity has a right to select its agents of distribution and its system and means of distributing the commodity to the public in any manner it may adopt so that the public is not injured thereby. This means that a commodity which the public must use should be placed on sale where it may be purchased without any great inconvenience to the consumer."

2. COTTON GINS.

Order No. 447, Fourth Annual Report Corporation Commission, 1911, page 413. Complaint alleged that a certain cotton buyer was paying more for cotton ginned by his gin than if the cotton were ginned by other gins. The commission held that there being several cotton buyers in the town without any understanding or combination of prices, a virtual monopoly did not exist and the commission had no jurisdiction. The case was dismissed.

Order No. 530, Fifth Annual Report Corporation Commission, page 538, directs the defendant, the Harris-Irby Cotton Co., to gin custom cotton and fixes the price for ginning.

NOTE.—There was one cotton gin located at the town of Geary, which was isolated by several miles from any other gin. The owner of this gin was buying cotton in the seed. The merchants were also buying cotton. The gin man refused to gin cotton for anyone except himself. That is, before their cotton could be ginned they must sell it to this one buyer. The commission held that before a person who had dedicated private property to a public use could withdraw the same he must give a reasonable notice in advance of such action. If not, thrashing-machine owners, in the middle of a thrashing season, could refuse to thrash wheat for farmers and force them to sell the wheat in the field at such price as the machine owners may see fit to make.

3. COTTON COMPRESSES.

Order No. 559, Fourth Annual Report of Corporation Commission, page 606. Complaint asks that the Clinton Ice and Commerce Co. be required to operate its compress at Clinton, Okla. The case was dismissed and afterwards reinstated and an order made requiring the compress to operate during the season 1913–14.

Order No. 642, not published, prescribes the regulations for weighing cotton at compresses. Cotton is sold on the basis of compress weights. During damp weather the weigher at the compress docks the cotton a certain number of pounds per bale which, in his judgment, will amount to the moisture absorbed. This discretion on the part of the weigher is often abused, and it was alleged that favorite cotton buyers were sometimes given a great advantage. The commission held that where cotton was docked for dampness or other causes the actual weights, together with the amount each bale was docked, should be submitted to both parties in interest, and the cotton should be reweighed at the request of either party.

This order has been complied with and has given satisfaction to all parties concerned. Both the buyers and the compresses would now object to its repeal, notwithstanding it was resisted at the time it was issued.

4. OIL COMPANIES.

Order No. 601, Fifth Annual Report Corporation Commission, 1912, volume 1, page 690, directs the Waters-Pierce Oil Co., the Texas Co., and the Oklahoma Oil Co. to sell kerosene in quantities of 1 barrel or more at the same price.

NOTE.—This order was the result of oil companies selling oil stoves to the farmers in those localities where there was no timber or other fuel and agreed that oil should be furnished them in barrel lots at jobber's prices. After stoves were installed the local dealers objected to this arrangement. Complaint was filed and the above order resulted, which is being strictly obeyed.

Order No. 728, not published, directs that the Texas Co. and Waters-Pierce Oil Co. shall sell gasoline in the town of Idabel, Okla., for the same price it sells in other sections of the country plus any additional transportation charge and distributing expense.

Order No. 769, not published, temporary order fixing jobbers' price of kerosene and gasoline in the northwest part of the State of Oklahoma. This order was set aside pending final disposition of the case.

5. NEWSPAPERS.

Order No. 704, not published. This was an opinion based upon a complaint and agreed statement of facts filed by the Mellon Co., a large retail dry goods house, against the Daily Oklahoman, alleging that the Daily Oklahoman had a virtual monopoly on all morning advertising in Oklahoma City, and asked that this newspaper be required to advertise for the Mellon Co. at the same rate as it did for other similar concerns. The Oklahoman had refused to accept advertising from the Mellon Co. because of a controversy over other business transactions. The commission found that it was the duty of the Oklahoman to advertise for the Mellon Co., but made no order. The Daily Oklahoman followed the findings of the commission and complied with the suggestions made therein. All parties are now satisfied.

6. RETAIL LUMBER YARDS.

Order No. 589, Fifth Annual Report Corporation Commission, volume 1, page 656, directs the local lumber yards at Cherokee to sell lumber to all parties without discrimination in price for the same quality and quantity.

NOTE.—This complaint was filed by an independent lumber yard, claiming that other lumber yards were selling lumber at or below cost, for the purpose of destroying competition.

7. MILL PRODUCTS.

Order No. 710, not published. Complaint was filed asking that the Cordell Gin & Milling Co. be required to sell its products to certain retail merchants. Complaint was dismissed, the commission holding that it has no jurisdiction in the regulation of a private business which deals with the public unless a virtual monopoly is shown. All laws regulating mills have been in the interest of the ultimate consumer and not the middleman or the distributor of the product. The manufacturer of a commodity has a right to select its agents of distribution and its system and means of distributing the commodity to the public in the manner it may adopt if the public is not injured thereby.

8. COMBINATION LAUNDRIES.

Order No. 685, not published, directs five laundries in Oklahoma City, who are organized under the name of the Oklahoma Operating Co., to not increase their prices over those which were charged before the combination took place without first applying to the commission and securing permission, after making proper showing that the prices should be advanced.

(NOTE.—Five laundries in Oklahoma City combined under the name of the Oklahoma Operating Co. and issued a schedule of prices increasing the price of laundering in the city. This order prevented any increase in price, but the commission has no jurisdiction to dissolve combinations. That is for the courts. The orders of the commission go to controlling their prices and practices after the combination is made. The order in this case has been complied with to the letter, and the people do not complain of the combination, but all are apparently satisfied.)

9. BUS AND TRANSFER COMPANIES.

Order No. 758, not published, directs the Mahoney Bus, Baggage, Carriage & Taxicab Co. to transfer all baggage under similar conditions for the same prices, and it can not refuse to deliver any baggage when tendered.

(NOTE.—This complaint grew out of a controversy between the baggage company and a traveling salesman, wherein the baggage company refused to transfer the baggage of the salesman at any price because of some personal difference. The order is being complied with.)

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. LAFFERTY].

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Chairman, I am unalterably opposed to the provision in this bill cutting down the allowance now made to each Senator and Representative for traveling expenses. No better example of the complete surrender of the legislative branch of the Government to the Executive could be found than is embodied in this bill.

The President is allowed a salary of $75,000 a year. In addition he is allowed $25,000 for household expenses, making $100,000. But that is not all. By law he is allowed an additional $25,000 for traveling expenses.

Now, we did not get our mileage for the last session of Congress. It has been said that a bill would be brought in to pay our mileage for the second session of this Congress except for the fact that President Wilson, in his desire to serve the people, would veto the bill to pay us our mileage.

I wonder if President Wilson would veto a bill appropriating his $25,000 for his mileage? I say he would not. Now, he gets even more than the $125,000 I enumerated, because he gets $73,440 a year clerk hire for the Executive Office, making a total of nearly $200,000. There is no suggestion from the Democratic appropriation committee of cutting down any of these items, but instead they increase these items.

A Senator or Representative draws a salary of $7,500 only. True, he is allowed $1,500 a year for a clerk, but it takes more than that to pay his clerical help. So that while a Senator or a Representative draws $7,500 net, and pays his own living expenses, the President draws $75,000 net, is allowed $25,000 additional for living expenses, and is allowed another $25,000 a year for traveling expenses.

Now it is proposed to cut down the allowances of the Senators and Representatives, as regards traveling expenses, to the actual cost of a ticket to and from Washington once each year, including members of his immediate family. This will require the Senator or Congressman to pay out of his salary all his other traveling expenses. Besides, he will have to pay out of his salary for his living expenses, printing, and extra clerical help.

No Senator or Member of Congress can live and pay all his expenses out of this salary of $7,500 without the most rigid economy. The thoughtless will answer at once, "Let him resign; plenty of others are willing to take his place." As for myself, I am perfectly willing to quit Congress any time. And I am perfectly willing to stay in Congress and fight for the rights of the common people of this country so long as they desire my services. But if the common people are wise, they will see to it that Congressmen and Senators are paid sufficient remuneration so that they will not be forced to look elsewhere than to the people themselves for their support or expenses. [Applause.]

The special interests of this country would like to see the salaries and allowances of Senators and Representatives so low that no one except a grafter or a rich man could afford to serve in either branch of Congress. Some highbrows do not think now that any man has any business running for Congress unless he has sufficient fortune to make a splurge in Washington society without the aid of his salary. A Congress made up of that kind of men would certainly suit the plutocrats exactly. [Applause.]

When the salaries of Senators and Representatives are raised to $10,000 a year, then I will favor cutting out mileage, but not before. Their salaries should be $10,000 a year, and I would vote for a bill to fix that amount to-day, if I had the opportunity.

At $10,000 a year the 532 Senators and Congressmen would draw pay annually amounting to $5,320,000. That would cost each citizen only 5½ cents per year.

Give me a Congress completely divorced from all special interests, and drawing salaries sufficient to live on and defend their positions without any outside financial help, and I will reduce the cost of living to the people of America more than 5½ cents per head each year for the next 30 years.

While the people would only contribute 5½ cents each to raise the $5,320,000 necessary to pay each Senator and Representative a salary of $10,000 a year, let us consider what they contribute annually to some of the special-privilege corporations depending upon Congress to stand pat.

The gross receipts of the railroads annually are $3,050,000,000, or $30.50 per head of our population. By passing a law providing that no railroad company should be allowed to fix rates upon any basis other than a reasonable profit upon its actual physical value, and providing legislation for the immediate carrying of this act into effect, Congress would save the American people at least $10 per head per year. Yet salaries of Senators and Representatives at $10,000 a year would only cost the people 5½ cents per year.

The gross receipts of the express companies amount to $1.68 per head of our population. Were we to at once extend the parcel post so as to supersede the express companies, we would save the people at least 50 cents per head per year.

The farmers pay interest each year amounting to $500,000,000, which is added to the cost of the necessaries of life. Were we to pass a genuine rural-credit bill providing for the loan of Treasury notes to the farmers at 2 per cent interest per annum on gilt-edged first mortgages, we would save the consumers of the United States at least $2 per head per annum, which now goes into the pockets of the money power and is unearned.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oregon has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I yield the gentleman 10 minutes more.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Some say that if we pass a law following the exact language of the Glass-Owen bill, providing for the loaning of Treasury notes to the farmers at 2 per cent interest, it would be socialism, populism, anarchy, and worse. I want some one to tell me what the Glass-Owen bill is except a law for printing Treasury notes, depositing them in the Treasury of the United States, and authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to loan those notes to the bankers of the United States at one-half of 1 per cent interest upon collateral security, not as good as a first-mortgage loan upon a farm in this country.

You can loan the money to the farmer at 2 per cent interest and with that 2 per cent you can borrow gold to maintain a gold reserve of 33⅓ per cent, and then loan these Treasury notes to the farmers at 2 per cent, which will pay a profit to the United States. [Applause.] Tell me that this Congress is not now and has not been for the past 50 years dominated by special interests and I will tell you that you do not know what you are talking about. [Laughter.]

I favor decent salaries for Senators and Representatives and then prohibiting them from taking outside fees. I have a bill to prohibit Senators and Representatives from taking outside pay, or if they do to file a statement of it with the Clerk of the House or the Secretary of the Senate annually under oath. Pass bills of that kind and you will indirectly save for the people of the United States annually by compelling honest legislation more than you will ever lose by paying $10,000 a year to Senators and Representatives for salaries. The people should make the Senators and Representatives independent, and then demand that they work solely for the people. [Applause.]

I shall now be glad to answer any questions that any gentleman may desire to ask.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman makes complaint, as I understand it, because Congress has not allowed mileage for the present session. I want to ask the gentleman if he really thinks the Treasury ought to be taxed to pay Members of Congress mileage for the present session, in view of the fact that the extra session ran into the present session and nobody went home unless he went home upon private business?

Mr. LAFFERTY. I will answer that in this way: Practically every Member of this House went home some time in the fall of 1913. I went home and my colleagues went home.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. If the gentleman went home, he went home at a time when Congress was in session.

Mr. LAFFERTY. It was in session, but it was not doing any business. It was only nominally in session.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. If he went home, he went home on private business or for his own personal pleasure or profit, possibly, but not upon public business.

Mr. LAFFERTY. I went home, Mr. Chairman, as I conceived it to be my duty to do. I went home to Portland, Oreg. I met business men upon the streets, and they asked me why I was not in Congress in Washington, as Congress was in session. I said to them that Congress was nominally in session only; that there were not over 65 Members in Washington; that the House was marking time while the Senate was considering the currency bill. And by going home I learned much that the people of the district desired. One of the important things that they were intensely interested in was the immediate passage of the currency bill, so as to relieve conditions. I wired both Oregon Senators of the sentiment, and am sure my going home, as it was my duty to do, resulted in much good. Besides, I wish to remind the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] that the minority leader [Mr. UNDERWOOD] advised all Members who desired so to do to go home, as there would be no business transacted in the House in November last. Therefore, and for the other reasons I have assigned, I say Members should not only have their usual mileage next December, for which we must appropriate in this bill, if at all, but we should also appropriate to pay the usual mileage for the present session, instead of cutting Members off without any mileage at all for this session, as is proposed. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I agreed to yield some time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, but he is not present.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentlemen who spoke for time are not here.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] 15 minutes.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with a good deal of interest to my distinguished friend from Pennsylvania Mr. J. HAMPTON MOORE. I wish he were here, because I am going to allude to some statements of his. I understand that the gentleman from Pennsylvania is raising a calamity howl for the purpose of pacificating some of his millionaire constituents, in order that he may have the proper literature to circulate during the next campaign.

I think that it is a proposition that can not be denied, that the countries having the highest protective tariff, everything else being equal, have increased in the cost of living the greatest in the last 12 years. Men of science, men of industry, and men of activity have gone into this subject for the purpose of revealing the various causes which have contributed to the high cost of living. I have a table before me which has been compiled by Mr. John D. C. Kershaw, Fellow of the Royal Statistical Society, London, and I desire to refer to that table and call the attention of my distinguished friend from Pennsylvania especially to it, because it is interesting. About an hour ago while on the floor I propounded to him this question, "Has not the cost of living in the last 12 years increased more in the United States than in any country in the world except one?" and he said, "No."

Now, I desire to call his attention to this distinguished writer's table of increases, which, if true, shows that my question is not without some merit, and I am surprised at the gentleman's answer.

The article to which I refer may be found on page 247 of the Scientific American of March 21, 1914. Great Britain has a lower tariff than any of the great civilized powers; yet, according to this author, her per cent of increase in the cost of food products during the last 12 years is the least. The table furnished by him is based on the cost of food products in 1900, which he estimates at 100 per cent, and then proceeds to show the increase and decrease since that time, including the year 1912. During these 12 years the cost on 23 of the chief articles of food in Great Britain increased only 15 per cent, reaching the high-water mark in 1912. During the first 7 years of this period the increase in cost reached 3 per cent only in 2 years—1903 and 1905. The price for the other 5 years was practically normal, but during the year 1912 the greatest increase was recorded. It rose from 9 to 15 per cent.

In France, on 24 of the chief articles of food, from 1900 to 1909, no increase was visible, but in 1911 the increase reached 17 per cent, but the increase dropped to 15 per cent in 1912. France has a higher tariff than Great Britain. In Germany, a very high protective tariff country, during these 12 years the cost of 13 of her chief articles of food increased 30 per cent, twice as much as Great Britain, nearly twice as much as France, reaching her high-water mark in 1912. Holland, on 23 chief articles of food, increased 23 per cent. Holland is a fairly well protected country in many instances. Italy, a fairly protective country, during that time increased 20 per cent on 13 of her chief articles of food. Norway increased 19 per cent on 13 articles of food. Russia, on 30 articles of food, increased 21 per cent. The United States increased 40 per cent on 15 articles of food in 39 of the principal cities in this country. Canada, a fairly high protective country, lying close to America, increased in those 12 years 51 per cent on 78 articles of food. Now, Canada buys largely from the United States, and she pays transportation cost from the United States on many articles of food, and to this is added the middlemen's profit. That is the reason, I assume, for her increase above that of the United States. Australia, on 41 articles of food in 6 of the capital cities, increased only 3 per cent for the first 11 years, but in 1912 the increase jumped from 3 per cent to 16 per cent. She has suffered as a whole the least of any of the countries cited. New Zealand, on 17 articles of food, increased 16 per cent. High prices find Canada leading the list—Canada, 151; United States, 140; Japan, 138; Austria, 135; Belgium, 132; Germany, 130; Holland, 123; Russia, 121; Italy, 120; Norway, 119; New Zealand, 116; Australia, 116; France, 115; and Great Britain, 115.

Mr. Chairman, these figures and the gentleman from Pennsylvania do not agree. But I suggest to him that it would improve his remarks if he will revise them so that they will conform to valuable statistics compiled on this subject by disinterested and unprejudiced men, such as the author of the table from which I have taken my data. It is quite evident from the figures and data which I have submitted that the greatest increase in the cost of living prevails in the countries with the highest protective tariff and that the countries with the lowest tariff have suffered least. Can anyone explain what is the cause of the enormous increase in America without including our high protective tariff as one of the main causes? If so, I will be glad to yield to him. There may be other causes, but the tariff doubtless is among the chief reasons. Mr. Chairman, the distinguished and ingenious gentleman from Pennsylvania has undertaken to show that there is a great number of unemployed in this country, stagnation in business, and that the world is going to ruin. Now, his statement reminds me of a story I once heard, which runs something like this: A couple of young people were married, and in the course of time a baby was born at their house, and they were very much delighted over it. Finally they concluded to weigh the baby to see how large it was, but they had no scales, and their hopes were blasted. Finally an ice wagon happened to come along, and some one suggested that they weigh the baby on the ice scales. They did so, and it weighed 40 pounds. [Laughter.] Now, that is the way with the gentleman's story about the great calamity that is on in this country. I think he weighed his argument either on the ice man's scales or on the butcher's scales. [Laughter.] Mr. Chairman, there is one thing that is certainly an index to business conditions. The number of new buildings under construction or to be constructed in a city is the best barometer by which to register its thrift and prosperity. I am going to read an article from the Manufacturers' News of March 12, 1914, and this refers to new buildings in Chicago which are now building or to be built during the year 1914, and here is what that article says:

PROMISING OUTLOOK FOR 1914—BUILDINGS AGGREGATING $15,000,000 BEING STARTED IN CHICAGO.

The general impression among contractors and others that the year 1914 would witness a falling off in building construction in Chicago is not being borne out by the facts as shown by statistics and other figures gathered from a general survey of the situation. Apartment buildings and smaller operations are in abundance, and the opening of the spring season will witness active building operations in all parts of the city. Buildings aggregating in value the sum of nearly $15,000,000 are now being started, some few of them being delayed until May 1. Among them are the—

	Approximate cost.
Conway Addition	$2,500,000
Lumbermen's Exchange Building	1,500,000
Stevens's Addition	1,500,000
Crane Co. Building	1,500,000
Building, Wabash & Wash	1,500,000
Kaiserhoff Hotel	1,500,000
Morrison Hotel	1,000,000
University of Chicago	500,000

In addition to these is the large plant for the county at Oak Forest. Advance reports also indicate a large number of warehouses being built this year, it being estimated that plans are already made and bids being asked for on work aggregating a sum equal to $2,000,000. With approximately a $20,000,000 start to begin the building season of 1914 there is little doubt but that Chicago will reach her usual $100,000,000 mark and that there will be plenty of work for all mechanics in the building line.

Now, what is true of Chicago——

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOWLER. In a moment. I have no doubt but what the prosperity in Chicago is shared in the gentleman's home city of Philadelphia, and what is true in Philadelphia and Chicago is also true throughout the land in all of the great prosperous cities of the country.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOWLER. I was going to yield to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. SELDOMRIDGE], and then I will be glad to yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. While the gentleman is speaking of conditions that are prevailing in Chicago, I would like to call his attention to two items of news which I hold in my hand, connected with the dry-goods trade in Chicago, as given by Marshall Field & Co. and John V. Farwell Co., in which the statement is made that the woolen business in Chicago during the past week, ending March 30, was 40 per cent higher than last year. If the gentleman wants these clippings, I will give them to him to incorporate in his remarks.

Mr. FOWLER. I will gladly do so.

Marshall Field & Co.: "Trade in dry goods is now feeling the result of the late Easter. As compared with the same week a year ago, orders have been heavier, more buyers visited the market, and collections are better. Immediate business is receiving the greater part of the attention of both wholesalers and retailers. Sales records indicate that merchants are at present getting a large percentage of their business in such lines as wash dress goods, novelties in wool dress goods, silks, ribbons, and laces. Future price levels on merchandise in which wool is used are indicated by the present firm tendency of the raw wool market."

John V. Farwell Co., Chicago: "Wholesale dry goods and general merchandise business is actively responding to the arrival of spring. More merchants visited this market during the week than in the corresponding week of last year, making a noticeable gain for the month. This past week wool dress goods business has run over 40 per cent ahead of the same week last year. The only explanation for this unprecedented demand seems to be that the present style of garments calling for panniers, tunics, overdrapes, and flounces requires about twice the amount of material, and present styles are easy for home dressmakers to handle, as they eliminate precision demanded by tailor-made styles."

Now, I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. MURDOCK. As the gentleman knows, I am not a member of the party to which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] belongs, and I hold no brief from him. But as the gentleman was quoting as to conditions in Chicago, I will say that I saw to-day a rather astounding statement in a paper published in the home city of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, to the effect that the Pennsylvania Railroad had canceled 118 trains. Now, is it not possible that there are some bad times in Pennsylvania that are not experienced in Chicago? It seems to me that this article would indicate it. I hold the paper in my hand which carries that news. That is a rather serious curtailment of traffic by one system.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, if I get time I will refer to the increased amount of the refrigerator-car business. It is said that we are compelled to build more refrigerator cars this year. That is the conclusion of the Manufacturers' News, a corporation weekly periodical published in Chicago, from which I have been reading.

But now, for fear that some one may say that I am unfair and I am not borne out in my remarks because I single out a single city, I will read another article from the Manufacturers' News of February 19, 1914, which is as follows:

BUILDING ACTIVE.

Building construction is extremely active throughout the entire country, according to official reports to Construction News. During the month just closed permits were taken out in 84 of the principal cities for the construction of 13,701 buildings, aggregating in cost $52,950,876, against 13,753 permits, involving a total cost of $46,679,310, for the corresponding month a year ago, a decrease of 52 buildings and a gain of $6,371,566, or 14 per cent.

Here are 84 of the principal cities of the country engaged in the construction of 13,701 new buildings at a cost of $52,950,876 in one month, which is an increase of 14 per cent over what was done in these same cities for the corresponding month of 1913. Is this a calamity, or does it indicate prosperity? Let the gentleman from Pennsylvania answer. If this is not enough to change his mind, I call his attention to another line of business, which is an index to business prosperity, and that is the demand for more refrigerator cars. I read now from the Manufacturers' News of February 26, 1914, which is as follows:

According to Chicago railroad managers, fully 50,000 refrigerator cars will be built next year by private car lines and railroads on account of the private car line hearing here. The country has 100,000 refrigerator cars and needs 300,000 such cars.

According to this clipping the country is short in this line of cars 100,000. It may need some of them for cold storage of calamity howlers. I find another article in the same periodical of March 19, 1914, dealing with surplus cars which may be of some interest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania in his investigation to determine the correct state of the Union in business affairs. It is headed, "Freight traffic good," and then proceeds as follows:

A decrease of 43,145 cars in the number of idle freight cars on the railroads of the United States and Canada during the last two weeks of February, according to the regular fortnightly bulletin of the American Railway Association as of date March 1, 1914. Reports from the railroads show that the net surplus of freight cars on that date was 153,907, compared with 197,052 on February 14.

A reduction of 43,145 idle cars in two weeks of the severest winter weather of the year. At this rate of reduction it will not be long until there will be a big demand for the building of a large supply of new freight cars.

Mr. Chairman, I now desire to call the attention of my friend from Pennsylvania to another line of business prosperity which he seems not to know, yet every other Member except my colleague [Mr. MANN] is well acquainted with it, but for their benefit I will insert a clipping from the Manufacturers' News of March 19, 1914, dealing with steel products:

Orders for rolled steel products booked by the United States Steel Corporation subsidiaries in February were approximately at the rate of 48,000 tons per day, against 40,700 tons per day in January and 41,000 tons per day in February last year.

An increase of more than 17 per cent over the corresponding month of 1913. The steel and iron business abounds in the gentleman's own State, and yet he is trying to destroy their business by calamity "dope." Here is another article for his illumination, taken from the same periodical of the same date, dealing with the Bethlehem Steel Corporation, which crowds prosperity into the gentleman's State:

BETHLEHEM STEEL EARNINGS.

Although Charles M. Schwab, chairman of the Bethlehem Steel Corporation, recently deplored the reduction of the tariff on steel, earnings of his company last year were the greatest in history, showing an increase of $3,638,894, or 70 per cent, compared with 1912.

Net profits were equal to 7 per cent on the preferred stock and 27.44 per cent on the common stock, compared with 7 per cent on the preferred stock and 6.86 per cent on the common in 1912. Unfilled orders at the end of 1913 totaled 24,865,560 tons, compared with 29,282,182 at the end of 1912.

Mr. Chairman, I read another article from the Manufacturers' News, showing prosperity in another line of business in the gentleman's own State:

FEBRUARY 19, 1913.

Officials of the Kauffmann Department Stores (Inc.), of Pittsburgh, a $10,000,000 concern, operating one of the largest department stores in the United States, have announced that they will in the future share their profits with their employees. In addition to sharing the profits with the 4,500 employees, the company will distribute among them $1,000,000 in stock of the corporation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. FOWLER. Five minutes more, I think, is all that I will want.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Then I will yield five minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. FOWLER. Now, Mr. Chairman, the distinguished gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] called my attention to an article that he had just read in a Philadelphia newspaper, and if I can put my hand on an article in the Manufacturers' News, I will put it in the RECORD. But I desire to call attention further to what is said about the increase of business.

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from California?

Mr. FOWLER. I will be glad to yield.

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. Just in connection with the article read by my colleague from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK], would the gentleman from Illinois connect the action of the Pennsylvania Railroad with the campaign that is now being carried on for increase in railroad rates rather than to anything else?

Mr. FOWLER. Well, I do not know just exactly the motive of these railroads in their campaign for an increase of freight rates, but I do know one concrete example which, in my mind, gives the best reason extant for it, and that is the conduct of the Morgan people in unloading the Cincinnati, Hamilton & Dayton Railroad, a worthless piece of property from a standpoint of income, on the Baltimore & Ohio; and the latter is one of the loudest in its clamor for an increase of freight rates. I wish I had time to go into the particulars of this concrete example. The Cincinnati, Hamilton & Dayton was first unloaded by Morgan on the Erie people at an enormous price while Harriman was sojourning abroad. When Harriman came back it is reported that he said to the distinguished financier, now dead, that if he did not take back that worthless stock and relieve him of its burden he would prosecute him in two courts, one to recover the amount paid for the stock and the other to punish him for violating a penal statute of the United States, and he took it back.

Then, after the panic of 1907, having in some way secured an advantage over Harriman, he unloaded it on the Baltimore & Ohio. It was a worthless piece of property that the Baltimore & Ohio will have to pay for in 1916, according to the contract, and that is one of the reasons, I suppose, why the Baltimore & Ohio is howling for an increase in freight rates. I apprehend that what is true with the Baltimore & Ohio is true also to a greater or less extent with other railroads. I would not be surprised if it should turn out that the Pennsylvania has equally as groundless reasons for urging this increase in freight rates as the Baltimore & Ohio.

Mr. KINDEL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Colorado?

Mr. FOWLER. Yes; I yield to the distinguished gentleman.

Mr. KINDEL. I want to inform you that I have just come from the hearing of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and Mr. Rea's cross-examination proved that the Pennsylvania Railroad made, last year, 9½ per cent net, notwithstanding it had put in $108,000,000 of betterments, and in spite of that they ask for a 5 per cent increase in their rates.

Mr. FOWLER. I thank the gentleman.

Now, the group of railroads known as the "eastern group," 49 in number, according to their own statement, made $181,000,000 more last year than they did in the year 1912, and yet the alleged increased cost of operation and other fictitious claims and reasons are advanced for piling upon the people of the United States higher freight rates to increase the burdens of the masses. I wonder if the authority before whom this hearing is going on is going to yield the rights of the people of this country to these financiers who have wrecked roads, such as the New Haven and other roads in this country, by unfair means and allow the people of the country to bear the burdens? I trust not.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. FOWLER. Can the gentleman give me five minutes?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to inquire how long the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSON] intends to run to-night? We have been here for over five hours. I would like to know how soon the gentleman will move to rise.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I am anxious to have the committee rise as early as possible.

Mr. FOWLER. I can conclude in five minutes.

Mr. GOOD. I will yield to the gentleman five minutes if after that time the gentleman from South Carolina will move that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I think the cost of living has been increased largely by the middlemen, and I have a statement here which I think carries out the view I have taken. The following communication was addressed to the Kansas City Star, a paper leaning to the predatory interests, and it was declined for publication by the Star. Its author says that 15 years ago live hogs could be bought in Kansas City at 3 cents per pound, and that the consumer could buy the best bacon at 10 cents per pound, leaving 7 cents as the difference between the cost of the hog on foot and the best bacon. Now we pay, on an average, 7 or 8 cents for live hogs at Kansas City, but the best bacon sells at 35 cents per pound, making a difference between the cost of the hog on foot and the best bacon about 27 cents. Deduct the 7 cents which was the difference 15 years ago and we have 20 cents left. Query—who gets this 20 cents? When this question is properly answered we will learn much as to the cause of the high cost of living. There is one thing dead sure—the farmer does not get the 20 cents. The table from which I have been quoting is inserted for the benefit of those who may be interested in it.

Index numbers of the changes of level of food prices in the period 1900–1912.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman from South Carolina will move to rise now.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Does the gentleman from Iowa desire to yield any further time?

Mr. GOOD. No.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GARNER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 15279, the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I wish to make an inquiry. Has general debate been closed on this bill?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Yes; it has.

The SPEAKER. It has been closed.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. By order of the House this morning?

The SPEAKER. By order of the House.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. So that when the committee proceeds with the consideration of this bill it will be read for amendment?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. POWERS, indefinitely, on account of important business.

To Mr. LINDQUIST, indefinitely, on account of illness.

ENROLLED BILL PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. ASHBROOK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States for his approval the following bill:

H. R. 13612. An act making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1914 and for prior years, and for other purposes.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, April 3, 1914, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, reports on preliminary examination and survey of Columbia River, Wash., between Vancouver and the mouth of the Willamette, with a view to improvement in cooperation with the port of Vancouver (H. Doc. No. 879); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed, with illustration.

2. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, reports on examination and survey of Malden River, Mass., with a view to a modification of the project (H. Doc. No. 878); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed, with illustration.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. GREENE of Vermont, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 9042) to permit sales by supply departments of the Army to certain military schools and colleges, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 488), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. HOUSTON, from the Committee on the Territories, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 11740) to cure defects in and to validate chapters 52 and 54 of the acts of the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska, approved by the governor of the Territory of Alaska May 1, 1913, and for other purposes, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 489), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 12792) for the relief of Mrs. Thomas G. Prioleau and others, heirs at law of Thomas G. Prioleau, deceased, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 491), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. McCLELLAN, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 4405) for the relief of Frederick J. Ernst, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 492), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 5991) to authorize the payment of $2,000 to the widow of the late Tranquilino Luna, in full for his contest expenses in the contested-election case of Manzanares against Luna, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 493), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 4310) concerning certain moneys collected from Bernard Citroen as customs duties and declared by the United States Supreme Court to have been illegally exacted, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 494), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

ADVERSE REPORT.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. McCLELLAN, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 2035) for the relief of Barbara Edelbrock, reported the same adversely, accompanied by a report (No. 490), which said bill and report were laid on the table.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. AINEY: A bill (H. R. 15315) to revise and amend the laws relating to patents; to the Committee on Patents.

By Mr. POWERS: A bill (H. R. 15316) to provide for the erection of a public building at Williamsburg, in the State of Kentucky; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Also, a bill (H. R. 15317) to provide for the erection of a public building at Corbin, in the State of Kentucky; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. LEVER: A bill (H. R. 15318) to tax the privilege of dealing on exchanges, boards of trade, and similar places in contracts of sale of cotton for future delivery, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. PORTER: A bill (H. R. 15319) authorizing and directing the Managers of the Soldiers' Homes to designate and set aside one of the homes for the exclusive use of the widows of soldiers and sailors; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. UNDERHILL: A bill (H. R. 15320) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to disregard section 33 of the public buildings act of March 4, 1913, as to site at Owego, N. Y.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. WILLIS: A bill (H. R. 15321) to amend section 5 of an act entitled "An act to amend and consolidate the acts respecting copyrights," approved March 4, 1909, as amended by an act approved August 24, 1912; to the Committee on Patents.

By Mr. BOWDLE: Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 240) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to have cleaned the exterior of the Federal building at Cincinnati, Ohio, under contract let upon competitive bidding, and appropriating money therefor; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. EDWARDS: Resolution (H. Res. 455) requesting information to be furnished by the Committee on War Claims showing war claims favorably passed upon by the Court of Claims and not appropriated for; to the Committee on War Claims.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, April 3, 1914.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou Great Jehovah, King of kings and Lord of lords; so great, so wise, so strong, so pure, so noble, so generous, so kind, so faithful, so loving; impart unto us plenteously of these inestimable treasures, that the kingdom of heaven may be in us and make us alive to every best thing; that we may get nearer to Thee and to the heart of our brothers, that our service may be worthy of the approbation of Thy loving heart. In Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

EVENING SESSION ON THURSDAY NEXT.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House meet on the evening of Thursday, April 9, at 8 o'clock p. m., and remain in session until 11 o'clock p. m. for the purpose of considering bills from the Committee on Claims to which no objection is offered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that next Thursday night there be a session of the House, beginning at 8 o'clock and extending until 11, for the purpose of considering bills on the Private Calendar from the Committee on Claims which are not objected to. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, yesterday when I objected to the unanimous consent asked by the gentleman from North Carolina I recognized that a great number of bills had been reported by his committee, many of them bills that deserve consideration, and that the time is rather short for going over that extensive calendar. I have no objection whatsoever to meeting next Thursday night, with the limitation stated in the request of the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. GOOD. Reserving the right to object, I should like to ask the gentleman from North Carolina if he will not include in that request other bills on the calendar to which there is no objection? There are a number of minor bills——

Mr. POU. I will say to my friend that we had that matter up yesterday. There are more than enough bills from the Committee on Claims to occupy the whole evening. There are 81 bills from that committee now on the Private Calendar, and in one session we can not possibly dispose of them. I am doing this because I am forced to.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. POU. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. Under the unanimous consent that he asks, any objection to any single bill next Thursday night will prevent its consideration?

Mr. POU. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. So it is within the power of any man who is here to stop the consideration of any one of the bills?

Mr. POU. Yes. The purpose of the night session is to eliminate those bills to which there is no objection by any Member of the House.

Mr. STAFFORD. This is virtually a unanimous-consent calendar for private bills reported by the Committee on Claims.

The SPEAKER. That is exactly what it is. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, H. R. 15279.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 15279) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, and for other purposes, with Mr. GARNER in the chair.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Let the clerk read, Mr. Chairman.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

For actual traveling expenses incurred by Senators, including actual traveling expenses of immediate and dependent members of their families, incurred in going to and returning once from each session of Congress by the nearest route usually traveled, the same to be paid on certificates duly approved as in the manner heretofore prescribed for the payment of mileage, $25,500.

Mr. HAWLEY. I reserve a point of order on that paragraph, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to that paragraph.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. During the pendency of the reservation of a point of order can an amendment be presented for consideration?

Mr. GOOD. I withdraw the amendment until the point of order is disposed of.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I suggest to the gentleman that if he desires to make a point of order, let him do it.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the point of order?

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the paragraph on the ground that it is a change of existing law, and I think that point will not be disputed. If it is in order at all, it will be under the Holman rule, that it purports to make a reduction in the expenditures under this item.

The amount of the payment to be made under the item, as compared with the payment now made under existing law, is purely speculative. No one knows how much it will be, and it does not show on the face of the paragraph that the proposed change will make a reduction in the amount to be paid. It will depend upon the number of the members of the family of each Senator who will be entitled to payment under the provisions of the law, and the amount fixed in the paragraph does not determine the amount to be paid. It is purely a speculative proposition which has never been tried out, and makes a change of existing law without clearly setting forth a reduction in the expenditures, which makes it subject to the point of order.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I hardly think it is necessary to consume the time of the committee in arguing this point of order. I think this legislation is clearly in order under the Holman rule. The Chair will observe that the present appropriation for mileage of Senators is $51,000. This bill carries $25,500, it being believed by the committee after investigation that that sum will pay the mileage under the proposed law. Unquestionably it is a reduction of expenditures.

Mr. BUTLER. It may or may not be.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I do not care to say anything more on the point of order.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, if the Chair will indulge me, I do not believe that the paragraph under consideration is subject to the point of order, for the reason that it comes clearly within the purview of the second provision of the first paragraph of the Holman rule, which says that any legislation that reduces expenditures by the reduction of the compensation of any person paid out of the Treasury of the United States is in order.

From the inception of the Government this mileage has been regarded, and it has been so held by former incumbents of the chair as part of the compensation of Members of Congress. Yesterday during the desultory debate on the bill I took occasion to have the statutes examined which give the history of this legislation, and I found that in the very first session of the First Congress a provision was made allowing Members one day's salary for each 20 miles traveled.

This being clearly a reduction of the compensation of Members of Congress, I maintain that it comes within the purpose and letter of the Holman rule.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, the Chair would necessarily have to conclude from matters within the breast of the Chair, or of the court, so to speak, that an appropriation of $25,000 for mileage of Senators would not pay the mileage provided for by existing law; therefore, that it would necessarily be a reduction of expenditure. That precise question was up in the last session of Congress, when the Army appropriation bill was under consideration, and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] was in the chair. The bill reduced the number of Cavalry regiments from 15 to 10. The Chair will find it on page 366 of the manual. As I understand, the Committee on Military Affairs reported a reduction of the Cavalry regiments from 15 to 10. The point of order was made upon it that it did not reduce the amount carried in the bill, because the bill only carried the amount for 10 regiments; but the Chair decided that a reduction followed necessarily. So here the bill ordinarily carries 20 cents a mile for 96 Senators. Twenty-five thousand dollars is not an adequate sum for mileage under the existing law. Therefore the Chair can not escape the conclusion that there is a reduction of expenditure of public money as heretofore appropriated, and therefore this amendment is admissible under the Holman rule.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, the paragraphs in lines 5 and 6 provide for the traveling expenses of the immediate and dependent members of their family. There is nothing in the existing law that places these people on the pay roll. This provision is entirely outside of any authorization in the law. It puts a new body of people on the pay roll, which, outside of any other reason, renders the paragraph subject to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. If the Chair understands the meaning of the Holman rule, it is in effect that if an amendment or a provision in the bill shows on its face a reduction of expenditure, you can by that method repeal any section of the statute.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the Chair allow me to ask a question? How could the committee reach a conclusion as to what this would cost?

The CHAIRMAN. That is a matter that goes to the merits of the question. This provision does not on its face show a reduction, except in the amount carried. Now, when the provision of the bill that undertakes to change existing law does not on its face show a reduction, except in the amount carried, it must submit itself to the mind of the Chair as to whether or not the working under the law will make a reduction in expenditure. The knowledge of this Chair as to the working of this law convinces him that it is a reduction of expenditure, and therefore the provision is in order. The point of order is therefore overruled.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, lines 4 to 10, inclusive, strike out the paragraph and insert: "For mileage of Senators, $51,000."

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, the amendment I have offered would restore existing law, and if adopted I shall offer an amendment to strike out the paragraph at the bottom of the page, which proposes to change the existing law.

Mr. Chairman, if we are to make a change in the matter of mileage, I do not know but that the plan suggested is perhaps as good a plan as can be devised. It, like any plan that may be adopted by the House, will have its imperfections. But, Mr. Chairman, I make this motion principally because the law provides what the salary of a Member of Congress shall be. It states that the compensation of each Senator and Representative and Delegate in Congress shall be $7,500 per annum, and, in addition thereto, mileage at the rate of 20 cents a mile.

It has been held a number of times that the provision in regard to mileage is as much a part of the compensation of a Member as is the provision which specifies in dollars and cents what the compensation is.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. Would the gentleman from Iowa have any objection to dividing up his amendment so as to move to strike out the provision, and then, if that is agreed to, it will give us a chance to vote on the other part of the amendment. The motion of the gentleman is to strike out and insert. A motion to strike out and insert may not be divisible, and I do not think it is.

Mr. GOOD. I have no objection.

Mr. BARTLETT. Some of the Members may wish to vote for a different amendment than that which the gentleman proposes to insert.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to that plan. My only thought was to offer an amendment that would make an appropriation as the law now provides. Hence I made it in terms of the existing law.

Mr. BARTLETT. If the motion to strike out prevails, then an amendment can be offered to provide a substitute. If the gentleman will withdraw his motion to strike out and insert and let it stand simply to strike out, we can reach it.

Mr. GOOD. I will do that before I sit down, if it will be of any assistance to anyone, if there is no objection.

Mr. Chairman, if we are going to amend the law in regard to mileage, and in all fairness, it seems to me, we ought to amend it, we ought not to play petty politics in regard to our own salaries and leave the same question with regard to the large allowances for travel to officers in the Army, officers in the Navy, and judges of our Federal courts. I do not see the use of making attacks on our own practices, so far as it affects ourselves, without going clear down the line.

Mr. BUTLER. Is it not because we have to be elected and these other people do not? The fight always comes on the poor Member of Congress.

Mr. GOOD. The gentleman's question answers itself. If we are to change the law, and I can see an injustice in the present law, we ought to go all down the line.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that he may be permitted to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, there is an injustice in this, that the present law grants to the Member from the Pacific coast $1,200 or $1,400 a year more than to the Member who lives within a hundred miles of the city of Washington, but that injustice is written into the law itself that fixes the salary of Members, and the more I have considered the matter the more I have come to the conclusion that I would rather have the compensation that goes, say, to a Member from the city of Chicago, living within easy reach of the city of Washington, so that I might go back and forth at times and attend to business than to take the additional compensation that goes to a Member who lives on the Pacific coast, who can not go home while Congress is in session; but, Mr. Chairman, I do not care very much about this provision. I am afraid that this provision that we propose, if it is adopted, will within a few years be met with the same objection that gentlemen now urge against the existing law. I am afraid it will become more obnoxious than the provision of the present law. I do not believe that we ought to be compelled to file affidavits with regard to our salaries and allowances when we do not require that practice from other departments of the Government. It belittles the House of Representatives and the Congress of the United States to impose upon its membership things that we do not impose upon the judges of our courts, upon the Executive of the United States, or upon officers in the Army and Navy.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. Certainly.

Mr. MURDOCK. What mileage do we allow Federal judges now?

Mr. GOOD. I think we allow them a flat rate of $10 a day, and they are allowed to take their secretaries with them when they travel from one place to another where they hold court and the attendant expenses.

Mr. MURDOCK. What allowances do we give officers of the Army and the Navy?

Mr. MADDEN. Eight cents, I think.

Mr. GOOD. It has been suggested that we pay them 8 cents a mile.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Army officers are allowed 7 cents a mile and naval officers 8 cents a mile.

Mr. MURDOCK. What allowances do we make for witnesses in Federal courts?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Five cents a mile.

Mr. MADDEN. And then a per diem besides that.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman that officers in the Army and Navy, in addition to the allowance of 7 and 8 cents a mile, also have other allowances for travel—per diem allowance—and in many cases I understand it amounts to a considerable sum. As I said, I do not care very much about this provision. Better than belittle the membership of the Congress by dragging in this matter every year, I would prefer to repeal that part of the law which grants mileage. I do believe that we will maintain the dignity of the House and of its membership better by appropriating the amount that is now provided by law than by attempting to write in here a provision that applies only to the membership of Congress but does not apply to these other departments of the Government. If we are going to make a change at all in the law, it seems to me that we should make a change that would be applicable to every official of the Government who is allowed mileage and let it be uniform, so that we will receive no more than any officer of the Army or the Navy or any of the judges of the Federal courts.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. Certainly.

Mr. GORDON. Does the gentleman know of any other officers of the Government who get 20 cents a mile each way for traveling expenses?

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman that Members of Congress do not get 20 cents a mile each way for traveling expenses. The law provides that that is a part of their compensation, and traveling expenses is not mentioned in the law.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. Certainly.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Do not these officers in the Army and Navy receive mileage for the distances actually traveled every time they make a trip?

Mr. GOOD. They do.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. And is it not true that every working Member of this House and of the Senate oftentimes makes several trips between his district and Washington during his term of service instead of only coming to the session and returning once?

Mr. GOOD. That is true. Just one other observation, and that is this: The average allowance as compensation for mileage for Members of Congress is about $400. Each Member of Congress receives $1,500 a year for clerk hire, which is in excess of the statutory provision and against the law. He receives $125 a year for stationery. In all, the average allowance to Members of this House for clerk hire, mileage, and stationery is $2,025; but there is not a Member, not a working Member, of this House who does not pay more than $2,000 a year for his clerk hire, traveling expenses in attendance during the sessions of Congress, and stationery, and yet it is urged that we ought to pass this proposed provision because the present law means a petty graft. Mr. Chairman, I am willing to-day to vote to strike out the entire allowance for mileage if it is considered a graft in any respect. I consider it a part of the compensation of Members, and until a general law is enacted I feel we ought to appropriate as the law provides. Let us deal honorably with ourselves, and if mileage is wrong let us repeal that part of the law.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto close at 1 o'clock.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I think there ought not to be any such request as that made. I think we ought to have such debate upon this as the House feels disposed to have, even if it be an hour. At any rate, it ought not to be less than an hour.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I understand there are several amendments to be proposed to this paragraph, and there has been only one speaker upon it as yet.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I want the membership to have ample time to discuss the proposition, but I thought it best to endeavor to limit debate at this time.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman will not limit the debate, for the time being. There are a great many men who may want to say something and who may desire to offer amendments.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Very well; I withdraw the request.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa will not be adopted. Personally I favored a different proposition from that presented in this bill.

So far as I am concerned, I believe mileage ought to be limited to the actual expenses of the individual Member. I have never believed, Mr. Chairman, that mileage ought to be given to a Member for the purpose of bringing his family here. That, of course, is a duty that rests upon him personally. I believe the Member himself should bear the expense of bringing his family here to Washington to remain with him during the session. I introduced a bill and have had a bill pending here for several years limiting mileage to the actual expenses of the individual Member. That proposition has been proposed for three or four years past in every session when this bill was before Congress, and each time it has been voted down, and opposition has been made to it on the ground that it was an injustice to Members who live at a great distance from the city of Washington, particularly those who live in the far West. They have made the argument that Members who live in the far West and have large families are put to a great burden and expense in having to bring them here for so great a distance, and it was for that reason and as a compromise that the committee decided to bring in the proposition permitting mileage for a Member and the immediate dependent members of his family in order to equalize the matter so far as possible and meet the objections raised by those gentlemen from the West who have heretofore shown such strong opposition to any proposition looking to the cutting down of mileage, and hoping that it might have a better chance of passing if this contention was allowed, and thus reduce the mileage to at least one-half of what it is now.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BARTLETT. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MADDEN. Does not the gentleman think it would be more satisfactory if we had a flat rate of mileage fixed? Nobody knows what it will cost under this plan, and it seems to me whatever the figure is it ought to be a flat rate, so everybody will understand what it is.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I agree with the gentleman, Mr. Chairman, if a flat rate is fixed which amounts to no more than the actual mileage of the Member. I prefer to see an amendment adopted providing, as I have said, the actual expenses of the Member, or if that is not considered proper, then limit the fixed rate so as to pay the exact mileage of the individual Member, and not exceed that amount.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman agree that it is frequently necessary for Members of Congress to come to the Capital during a recess of Congress on official business, and would he believe that in cases of that sort they were entitled to their expenses while they were coming here?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No; I do not think so, Mr. Chairman, and, as a matter of fact, the mileage, as originally granted back in 1789, was not granted with any such idea or for any such purpose. Members are expected to come here at each session of Congress, and it is their duty to remain here while Congress is in session to look after the public business, and if they go back during the session, then, Mr. Chairman, it is up to the Member of Congress to pay the expenses of his trip back home, because in a majority of cases, I might say in all cases, it is for his own personal pleasure or his own personal profit and not on account of public business.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not think the gentleman understood my question at all; the gentleman did not answer it.

Mr. BARNHART. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I do.

Mr. BARNHART. I want to inquire of the gentleman from Tennessee if he would consider it proper, in conjunction with the amendment, that clerks and other employees of the House delegated to the service of Members of Congress should not also be provided with such mileage as Members of Congress are given?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No; I do not think we would be justified in making such an allowance, Mr. Chairman. As a matter of fact, so far as I am personally concerned, I would be willing to cut out the question of mileage altogether.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. COOPER. I remember that one day last fall, in October, I think, I spoke to the Democratic leader, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], at the corner of the Capitol, and asked whether any more business was to be done by the House prior to the regular session in December, and he replied, "No;" that "Members might as well go home." Soon thereafter on the floor of the House he made a similar statement, that no more business would be done by this body until the regular December session and that Members might as well go home. Now, many Members had been here for the better part of a year. Does the gentleman from Tennessee think that under such circumstances the traveling expenses of Members ought to be limited to the cost one way?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I do; undoubtedly.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not think the gentleman from Tennessee understood what I asked him. I asked the gentleman if he agreed that during the recess of Congress, when men were obliged to come here, as they frequently are, on official business, sometimes five or six times during the recess of Congress, does the gentleman think that under such circumstances Members of Congress ought not to be allowed the mileage?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I do not think, Mr. Chairman, that the people of this country should be put to the expense of paying mileage for a Member of Congress to come here either during the recess or to go home several times during a session of Congress——

Mr. MADDEN. I did not refer to that.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Now, the gentleman takes a different position from that taken by some gentlemen, for the gentleman from Iowa a minute ago, in support of his amendment to strike out this provision, took the position that this was a part of the salary of a Member of Congress and was not to be considered as mileage.

Mr. MADDEN. What does the gentleman from Tennessee think?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I am aware of the fact that it has been held to be a part of the salary of a Member of Congress, but I take the position that if Congress wants to increase the salary of Members it ought to be done in a direct manner, and that they ought not to be drawing mileage as a part of their salary.

Mr. MADDEN. Does this bill increase the salary?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. This bill does not, most assuredly.

Mr. MADDEN. Is there any proposition pending to increase the salary?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Absolutely none.

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee believe that the Members of Congress are not entitled to their mileage, and that there should not be some allowance made for their return home during the holidays when Congress adjourns at that time? They take a recess for the purpose of returning home during the holidays.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] has expired.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. Where both Houses adjourn by resolution over the holidays, and by consent permit the membership of both Houses to return home for Christmas and New Years, does not the gentleman think there should be some allowance in that respect?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Let me answer by asking the gentleman a question. When Congress took a recess for the holidays did the gentleman or any other Member of this House go home on public business, or did he go home for his own personal pleasure in order to spend the holidays with his friends at home?

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. I will say to the gentleman that inasmuch as there was no allowance made for extra mileage, I could not afford to go home.

Mr. BUTLER. Does this reform extend to any other part of this bill, may I ask my friend, or does it extend only to the mileage of Members of Congress? Is there any further attempt in the bill to reform the mileage paid to any public official except a Member of Congress?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Not in this bill, no; because this bill does not deal with mileage paid other officials.

Mr. BUTLER. Then let me ask my friend another question. He has the original act there, and I would like to know if the terms of the original act command or compel a Member of Congress to accept 20 cents a mile?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. By no means.

Mr. BUTLER. No. I have drawn a mileage of $68 for 18 years, and have spent more than $200 in traveling expenses each year to and from my home, and I have always felt that I might have paid back, if I felt so inclined, into the Treasury the difference between the actual expenses and the $68 which I drew.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I do not wish any Member of Congress to think that I for one moment criticize anyone who accepts mileage now allowed by statute. It is the law, and it is perfectly right and proper for a Member of Congress to draw it, but I am complaining of the statute itself. I think that until Members of Congress undertake to cut down their own mileage they are not in position to undertake, with good grace, to cut down the mileage of Army officers and Navy officers, to which the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] objects. I think we should begin that sort of a reform at home before we undertake to apply it to other officers of this Government.

Mr. GORDON. And do you not think that the very reason why this graft of these Army officers has been perpetuated as long as it has is for the simple reason that Members of Congress were not in position to attack it because of the mileage which they themselves were drawing?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I think that has had a great deal to do with it, I am frank to say.

Mr. BUTLER. Is not there some method by which we can tell with accuracy about the actual expenses which the Member of Congress may have to defray?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Undoubtedly.

Mr. BUTLER. And for himself and his family, coming and going?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. This bill undertakes to do that. As a matter of fact, it requires each Member of Congress to submit a statement showing the actual expenses which he has incurred in coming to Washington and returning home during each session.

Mr. BUTLER. I am in favor of an amendment of some kind that will actually fix the expenses, if we can ascertain them, of a Member of Congress, but I ask my friend further, Would it not be well to let those expenses apply to more than one trip made by a Member of Congress to the Capital and return? My experience has been that for public business I have to go home, and if the gentleman has public business in his district, as I have had, he will find it necessary to go home frequently.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. If that sort of provision were adopted, the gentleman would find that 20 cents or even a dollar a mile would hardly pay the mileage that would be necessary to be paid by the Government in some cases.

Mr. BUTLER. Not necessarily. It would have to be done arbitrarily. But I think a man ought to be paid his expenses to and from his home. Staying here as we did last year, he ought to be compensated if he has to return to his home on public business during the session.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I know of no better or more effective way by which we can ascertain the actual amount necessary for a Member to come to Washington and return than to provide that the Member, after he has paid his expenses, shall submit a statement to the proper official showing what expenses he has incurred. Certainly, if we were to attempt to do anything else it would be a mere matter of conjecture on the part of those having charge of this fund.

Mr. BARTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will.

Mr. BARTON. What line of reason do you pursue in order to come to the conclusion that the Government of the United States should bring a Member's family here at the expense of the Government?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I said at the outset that I was opposed to that idea. Personally I believe that the Government ought not to pay anything more than the actual expenses of the individual Member. But that proposition has been proposed time and again upon the floor of this House, and we have been met by the objection on the part of Members who live at a great distance from Washington that it was placing an inequality, or rather a burden, upon them that was not placed upon those Members who live nearer to the city of Washington. For that reason the committee proposed this proposition, hoping it would meet with approval and would pass the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] has expired.

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman, I have been very much interested in this debate and quite agree with the gentlemen who are speaking in favor of economy.

Now, as a very modest Member of this House I have sat here for about a year. Once I returned to my home on distinctly public business. Twice I returned there on my own affairs, and for a time during the holidays, and I find that I am entitled to $184 mileage. Now, perhaps that experience of mine would be about the average experience of other Members on this floor. I find that my actual expenses have been about $120, which would be about two-thirds of the allowance now made, of 20 cents a mile.

I do not agree with the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS], who says that he thinks it is the business of the Congressman to remain here during the entire session. I think it is a mighty good thing for a Congressman to go back during the session when matters are before the Congress and engaging its attention, to learn what the sentiment of his people is on these questions [applause], and to keep in touch with the people he represents.

For that reason I am opposed to the suggestion that the actual expenses of a Member and his immediate family for one trip should be paid. In that case I think I will be entitled to draw down for 20, for I think my immediate family is about 20. [Laughter.] The section is indefinite and impracticable. I would prefer to see an amendment passed that would limit the mileage to 12 cents a mile instead of 20 cents a mile. Perhaps 12 cents a mile would cover the average expenses of Congressmen in this matter of mileage. The people are willing and ready to pay reasonable expenses to cover any proper outlay a Member may make in attending to the public business. Frequently, when Congress is not in session, Members come to Washington to attend to public business, and considering the whole matter, 12 cents per mile would pay the actual expense of about four trips per session, which would approximately meet his outlay for traveling.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, one of the first acts passed by Congress at the organization of the Government in 1789 was the act fixing the salary of Members of Congress. This act fixed the salary of Members at $6 per day for each day in actual attendance upon Congress. If a Member was absent, except on account of sickness, he did not get his per diem. This act remained a law until 1816, when the per diem was increased to $8 per day. This remained a law until 1866 when the salary was increased to $5,000 per year. The act fixing the salary at $5,000 per year remained the law until 1907, when the salary was increased to $7,500 per year. The first act of Congress in 1789 also provided 20 cents per mile for each Member of Congress in coming to Washington City and returning to their homes at each session of Congress. It will be observed while the salary of the Members has increased from time to time the amount allowed as mileage has remained permanently and definitely fixed at the rate of 20 cents per mile. It was the intention of our fathers who fixed the mileage at the rate of 20 cents per mile to pay only the actual traveling expenses. That was at a time when we had no railroads in the country, when the mode of travel was afoot, on horseback, or in wagons, and when it took Members several days to make the trip to and from Washington, and it necessarily consumed the 20 cents per mile to defray their expenses while traveling. It is now conceded and admitted by all that we can travel from ocean to ocean and from the Lakes to the Gulf on 3 cents per mile or less, and it will be further admitted that 4 cents per mile, under present methods of travel, will pay each Member's expense, train fare, Pullman service, and meals upon the trains while traveling to Washington and return.

For six years I have led a fight to reduce this mileage; I believe I am right, and believe the country is with me. With few exceptions, I do not believe that the country would stand for this 20 cents per mile if they understood it in the various congressional districts of the Union. The pending amendment proposed by the Committee on Appropriations is not what I would like to see; but it is not a question of what I want, but it is a question of what can be secured, because in the last analysis all legislation of every kind must, of necessity, be a compromise.

Mr. DIES. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. COX. Yes.

Mr. DIES. I find in this bill numerous appropriations for street car tickets for the various departments. In view of the fact that the departments no longer come to Congressmen, but Congressmen have to go to the departments, does not my friend think these street car ticket appropriations ought to be paid to Congressmen rather than to the departments of the Government?

Mr. COX. No; I do not believe it.

Mr. BRYAN. Except in case of the President. He comes to us.

Mr. COX. The pending amendment proposes to allow Members of Congress their actual traveling expenses. So far the amendment is right and proper, but the part of the amendment I do not like is the part which permits a Member to pay the way of the dependent members of his family at public expense; but it is such a vast improvement over the old law that I give it my unqualified support and approval.

This proposed plan is met with the objection that it is not workable and not feasible. I believe it is. I have that confidence in the membership of the House and of the Senate that no Member of Congress would dare pad his mileage roll. Publicity and exposure by the press of the day would, in my judgment, require Members of Congress to live religiously up to the proposed amendment, even if anything was required to make them do so.

The mileage now allowed Members of Congress amounts, at each session, to $225,000. It is conceded that the proposed amendment would reduce the mileage now allowed Members of Congress one-half, or, in other words, would reduce the amount of this appropriation $112,500 at each session of Congress. In my judgment the old mileage law should be repealed outright and each Member should be required to pay his own traveling expenses and not tax the people of the country for it, but I recognize that this can not be accomplished, and if the proposed amendment does not carry then the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. PAGE], proposing a flat rate of 5 cents per mile, should be adopted. No Member of Congress, Delegate, or Resident Commissioner—I care not in what section of the country or our island possessions he may live—will contend that he can not pay his traveling expenses on 5 cents per mile and still have money left to aid him in paying the way of the members of his family.

It has been argued by the opponents of this measure time and again on the floor of the House that it is the duty of a Member to bring his family with him to Washington when Congress is in session, to which argument I readily agree, but is it right to tax the people of our respective districts to pay us to bring our families here?

If this question was thoroughly discussed and put up to the voters in each congressional district, in my judgment the people with few exceptions would overwhelmingly vote against the proposition of the people paying the traveling expenses of the members of our families. The allowance to ourselves of 20 cents per mile is absolutely indefensible from any viewpoint whatever, because it does not require this amount of money to pay our traveling expenses. While it is admitted by every Member of Congress that it does not require 20 cents per mile to pay his traveling expenses to Washington and return, yet some of these gentlemen undertake to justify it on the ground that it is their duty to return to their districts at times while Congress is in session, and for this reason they ought to have 20 cents per mile in order that their entire traveling expenses at each session of Congress while going back to their districts and returning more than one time should be allowed.

I undertake to say that nine-tenths of the Members of Congress who return to their districts while Congress is in session do not do it at all to look after public business, but do it to look after their own political fences and fortunes. Under the guise of going back to look after public business they seek to justify themselves in voting for 20 cents per mile; yet I believe a vast majority of the trips made home while Congress is in session are made solely and exclusively for the future benefit and welfare of the individual Member. The membership of the House is composed of 431 men; examine the roll calls; note the absentees. If the mileage was cut out or reduced to actual traveling expenses for one trip each session of Congress, there would be more Members answering the roll call and less absenteeism than we now have.

The mileage allowed the Senators under the old law is $51,000 at each session of Congress. The proposed amendment offered by the Committee on Appropriations reduces this mileage to $25,500. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] proposes to strike out this amendment and insert in lieu thereof the following: "For mileage of Senators, $51,000," thereby restoring the old rate of 20 cents per mile to Senators while coming to Washington and returning. On a dividing vote on this question the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa was carried by 83 ayes and 46 noes. On this question only 129 Members voted, 302 being absent. Where were these absentees and what were they doing when this vote was taken? Although each Member of the House knew, if they read the bill, and I presume they did, that the mileage proposition was one of the first items in the bill, on the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina, which proposed to reduce the mileage to 5 cents per mile, the vote, on a division, was 32 ayes and 63 noes, a little more than one-fifth of the total membership of the House voting on this important amendment. Where were the other 336 Members of the House, and why silent?

It is argued by some that this is a small item. Conceding this argument to be correct, is that any reason why we should continue this iniquitous allowance to ourselves? The sum total of all appropriations is made up by countless thousands of small items which, in the aggregate, make the total of all appropriations carried in the appropriation bills for the maintenance of the Government.

It has been asserted that the average mileage allowance to Members is approximately $400 to the Member. Whether this be true or not I do not know, but I assert if it is true that the average expense to each Member of Congress in coming to Washington and returning will not exceed $50 per Member. This allowance is unjustifiable and indefensible upon any ground, either of economy or good morals. There are two Resident Commissioners from the Philippine Islands, and I am not raising any question as to their rights in sitting here at all, but concede their right so to do under the law of our country, but we allow them a lump sum of $2,000 each session of Congress, when the sum total of their expenses traveling in first-class style, including meals on the boat and Pullman service in this country, can be paid with less than $400. Why grant this annuity each session of Congress at a cost to the taxpayers of $1,600?

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit a question, not in antagonism but for information?

Mr. CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield to the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. COX. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. What do your people say about paying the Governor of the Philippine Islands $20,000?

Mr. COX. I do not know. I have never taken it up with them, but I imagine they would not take to it very kindly; it is too much, by far too much, to pay the Governor of the Philippine Islands $20,000 per year; it is absurd, preposterous, and if the people understood it they would not approve of it, and I hope the time is not far distant when they will understand the Philippine Islands proposition and will obey the plain positive mandates of our Baltimore platform, in which we declared that we would give them freedom of government and withdraw from them entirely except to maintain a guardianship as it were over them, such as we maintain in Cuba to-day. The Philippine Islands are a source of many of our evils to-day, evils which will never be cured until we solve that much-vexed question in the far-distant territory of the East. The only Member of Congress, Delegate, or Resident Commissioner who is only allowed his actual traveling expenses is the poor little Commissioner from Porto Rico, who, for some reason or other unknown to me, is discriminated against and allowed only his actual expenses, and which amounts each session to the small and insignificant sum of $137. There is no employee connected with the Government, I care not what be his rank or station, who is allowed the enormous rate of 20 cents per mile traveling to Washington and return except Members of Congress. Oh, but it is argued that this is a small insignificant matter, so small that no attention should be paid to it. Any Member of the House, no matter how honest or sincere he be in making an honest attempt to reduce the mileage of not only Members of Congress but others in the Government service receiving an exorbitant amount of mileage, is looked upon with suspicion, is called a demagogue talking for home consumption, and no attention should be paid to him whatever.

I have heard Members assert on the floor of this House that this Government could be run on $300,000,000 per year less than it is now being run, and yet observe the same Members belittling any attempt to reduce this mileage, and voting every time they have a chance to vote to retain it. If the above statement be true, I know of no way to reduce the expenditures of the Government $300,000,000 per year except to reduce the appropriations. The mileage proposition, where Members of Congress, officers of the Army and Navy, and other employees of the Government receive more than actual traveling expenses, amounts to upward of $1,000,000,000 yer year; but we can not assail the evils of the other fellow until we clarify the atmosphere in this House by reducing our own mileage and putting it upon an actual expense basis. [Applause.]

Officers of the Army and Navy are allowed, while traveling under orders, 7 and 8 cents per mile. This amounts to $550,000 per year for the Army, and no man need say that it requires 7 cents per mile for even an Army officer to travel, who is supposed to travel in royal and regal style. Last summer, while returning from Indiana, after eating supper I went into the smoking compartment of the car. Presently an Army officer and a friend of his came in, and they quickly fell into a dispute as to which one would pay the bill for their supper. The friend of the Army officer insisted on paying it. I think the bill amounted to $3.25, including the drinks, as they expressed it. Finally the Army officer, with a wave of his hand, said, "Oh, ——, I am going to pay it myself; this trip nets me $115." His friend did not seem to understand how that could be possible, and the officer explained to him that he was traveling under orders—I think from San Francisco to Washington or to New York—and that he got 7 cents per mile while traveling, and after paying all of his expenses the trip netted him this amount of money.

This is true, and yet Members argue that the mileage proposition is a small item, too little and insignificant for any Member of the House to pay any attention to. The Navy officers are allowed 8 cents per mile while traveling under orders, and this amounts to upward of $550,000 per year, conceded and confessed again that it does not require 8 cents per mile to pay the expenses of a Navy officer traveling under orders. What he is able to save is a rake-off, a take-down, or you can call it what you please.

Mr. Chairman, it remained for a Republican Secretary of Commerce to bring about a reform in this mileage proposition. The last report made by Secretary Nagle recommended that all of his steamboat inspectors be put on the actual expense basis, although they were only getting 4 cents per mile, and he recommended it in the interest of economy that they be allowed only traveling expenses. This report was not acted upon until last October in the urgent deficiency bill, when these inspectors were put on the expense basis, which affected a saving of $15,000 per year. Now, when the Democratic Party is in complete control of this Government and every department thereof, I had hoped that a recommendation would come from the heads of the departments recommending that mileage be cut from under the feet of every officer or employee of the Government, putting them all upon the expense basis, but down to this hour no recommendation has come, no request has been made from Democratic Cabinet officers, or otherwise, demanding this much-needed reform; but we are not in a position to take hold of this proposition, cut the mileage out, and put officers on the actual expense basis until we reform ourselves by putting ourselves on the expense basis. We would be put in a peculiar attitude and situation to put the other fellow on the expense basis and still allow ourselves 20 cents per mile. Equity, justice, economy, platform pledges and promises, together with public opinion, with one accord demand that this mileage be wiped out and that ourselves and all others now drawing mileage be put on the actual expense basis.

A provision is found on page 68 of this bill which prohibits the legislature of the Territory of Hawaii from drawing their compensation of $200 or "any mileage for an extra session of the legislature," and so forth. I commend the wisdom of the committee in the adoption of this language, but from time immemorial Congress has allowed itself 20 cents per mile in coming to Washington and returning at each session of Congress, whether special or regular, as fixed by the Constitution of the United States. Can we afford to say to the little members of the Legislature of Hawaii, "You shall not have your mileage at a special session of the legislature," and at the same time allow ourselves 20 cents per mile. Is this justice? Is it equity? Is it Americanism? I submit these queries to an already over-taxed public.

The Legislature of Alaska only allows themselves 15 cents per mile where many of them have to travel 2,000 miles in sleds drawn by dogs or reindeer, skating over the ice, walking on foot, riding horseback, and where it is conceded that even this amount is not sufficient to pay their actual expenses. The same condition obtains in Alaska to-day that largely obtained in this country with our forefathers when they enacted the first statute on this subject, and yet we continue to vote ourselves 20 cents per mile when it is conceded and confessed that 4 cents per mile will cover all our traveling expenses of every conceivable kind.

We only allow our foreign ambassadors 6 cents a mile going from Washington to their respective courts and return. Are we of better material, better mold and build than are our foreign ambassadors? I think not.

The poor witness, served with process to attend a United States court, is allowed the meager sum of 5 cents per mile while traveling and a per diem of $2 per day, while we allow ourselves 20 cents per mile and nearly $24 per day for each working day in the year. Is this right? Is this justice? Is this giving all the people equal treatment under the law?

In the Sixty-second Congress the Democratic Party abolished a lot of useless jobs in the Capitol, saving to the country $180,000 each year. In addition to this our caucus declared that we would refuse to allow the employees around the Capitol an extra month's salary, which had been allowed under Republican rule for 16 years as their mileage to pay their traveling expenses in coming to Washington and returning, and this resolution we have lived up to religiously.

Last October the House gallantly rushed to the front when the proposition came before it to allow the poor policemen, with a salary of $1,087 per year, and the elevator men, with a salary of approximately $1,100 per year, messengers and doorkeepers with a like salary, and many other employees, and by a record vote of 148 to 51 defeated them from getting their month's salary, thereby saving to the country $142,000, which I commend; but when the question is presented squarely to us to even reduce our mileage from $225,000 each session to $112,500, on a division vote 83 members vote to restore the old mileage of 20 cents per mile, 46 vote against it, with an absenteeism of 302 Members.

It was argued by some that the salary of Members of Congress is not high enough, and that a reduction of the mileage as proposed by the amendment offered by the Committee on Appropriations would reduce the salary, and that for this reason the amendment should not carry. Mr. Chairman, in my judgment the salary of Members of Congress is high enough. The master minds of Daniel Webster, Henry Clay, James Monroe, James Madison, John C. Calhoun, Thomas H. Benton, and even the immortal Lincoln, served in this House at a salary of $8 per day while actually here. These men, more than any other men, shaped the course and destiny of our great Republic; they were content to serve their Nation on the meager salary of $8 per day. You could increase the salary of Members of Congress to $50,000 per year and you would not get any more patriotic, honorable, and upright men than you have to-day.

I am astonished at Members making an argument of this kind. For 16 years the Democratic Party denounced the Republican Party on the floor of the House, on the stump, in the press of the country, and in their platforms as being criminally extravagant in the use of the people's money. I believe we owe them an apology, and that we should publicly say to them that we did not mean what we said; that we were simply talking to get into power, and to turn the Republican Party out of power, because this Congress will go down into history as the most extravagant Congress that was ever held at Washington. Men have argued here that we had just as well be honest with ourselves, and I will add that we had just as well be honest with the people; they will hold us to an accounting on the question of economy. Go where you will, into any State, county, township, town, or city in this Union, and the burden of the people's song is taxation. Under it they are staggering to-day as never before. They are turning hither and thither to get relief from the tremendous burden imposed upon them in the way of appropriations, all of which must be raised by taxation on the people in some way, some how.

In the last Baltimore convention we said:

> We denounce the profligate waste of the money wrung from the people by oppressive taxation through the lavish appropriations of recent Republican Congresses, which have kept taxes high and reduced the purchasing power of the people's toil. We demand a return to that simplicity and economy which befits a democratic government and a reduction in the number of useless offices, the salaries of which drain the substance of the people.

Here is a denunciation of the Republican Party for its profligate waste of money wrung from the people by oppressive taxation. This platform was read by us in the last campaign from thousands upon thousands of stumps and was heralded broadcast. The people believed us, and so believing turned to us by the millions, thinking if we were put in power the burdens of taxation would be lessened. Now, when an attempt is made to save this Government not only $112,500 per year as mileage paid to ourselves, and when this is done we can immediately move forward and save it approximately a million more by putting Army and Navy officers on an actual expense basis, we are met with the humiliating statement that it is a small, insignificant thing, too trifling for any Member of Congress to pay any attention to and overwhelmingly defeated on the proposition, as the record vote in this case discloses. Right or wrong, I intend to pursue this fight with the hope that some day or other the conscience of the people will become aroused and they will demand that this wrong be righted and that we reduce our mileage to an actual expense account.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I am not in favor of this provision. I believe the amount now fixed by law for mileage is more than it should be, but I do not believe we ought to go from the system we now have to one which, in my judgment, is worse than the one we now have. I do not believe that any Member of this House ought to be put under the necessity of keeping an account and returning it to some disbursing officer of the House, and satisfying him that he is not endeavoring to swindle the Government when he presents an account of his traveling expenses from his home here and return. I believe we are belittling the office of Congressman by that sort of procedure much more than we are by taking the mileage which has been allowed us by law ever since the foundation of the Government and the meeting of the first Congress.

Mr. GORDON. Does the gentleman charge his clients with his traveling expenses when he goes on legal business for them?

Mr. BARTLETT. I used to, but I have no clients now. [Laughter.] But I know this, that when I went to court and had a contract with my client as to fees and expenses very often I had that agreement in the contract; and the contract of the Government with me is that when I become a Congressman I shall receive so much compensation here, and in addition to the salary an additional compensation of 20 cents a mile for the distance traveled by me in coming and going. That is the law, and that is the contract the Government makes with me.

Mr. GORDON. We are just discussing the contract now. We are going to make a law on the subject.

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes; it is proposed to change the contract, and I am willing to change it.

Mr. GORDON. Is there anything in charging up your traveling expenses as a lawyer which lowers your dignity as an attorney at law?

Mr. BARTLETT. Oh, no. That is a matter of private business. But to have a Member of Congress overseered, and under the surveillance of some man appointed by somebody whom he has elected as disbursing officer is, in my judgment, lowering the dignity of the office and something that ought not to be done. I am for a less amount of mileage than we now get. I intend to vote for 10 cents a mile instead of 20 cents a mile, but I do not believe this provision ought to be adopted.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Is it not necessary now, under the law, for a Member of Congress to make up a statement as to the number of miles he has traveled and file that with the Sergeant at Arms of this House?

Mr. BARTLETT. It certainly is.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I fail to see the distinction which the gentleman draws between that kind of a statement and the kind of statement required under this amendment, or that one is any less dignified than the other.

Mr. BARTLETT. I am not responsible for the gentleman not seeing.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. Does not the gentleman think that under this provision a Member of Congress would be obliged to make a sworn statement as to the financial condition of each member of his family?

Mr. BARTLETT. It says "dependent members of his family," and I suppose that means his children and those who live with him in his home and whom he supports. For a while we required the circuit judges, when they went outside of their circuits, to file accounts with the Department of Justice as to their expenses. We thought that ought not to continue. My recollection is that now the law simply provides $10 a day for the judge when he is absent from his circuit. We have not kept up the former practice. So far as I am concerned, I believe that at the time when the law was passed giving 20 cents a mile going and coming it was about sufficient to pay a Member's expenses in going and coming. That was in the days when we did not have railroads and the other conveniences of travel.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BARTLETT. I ask for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent for two minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BARTLETT. It was a part of the compensation. I have no doubt of that, and it is now a part of the compensation; but we now have easier means of travel to the capital and returning to our homes. The amount paid out for that purpose does not consume the mileage ordinarily. The 10 cents a mile that I am now willing to vote for, and intend to vote for, about meets the traveling expenses, as the 20 cents a mile did when it was established. It is fair to the Congressmen and fair and proper to our constituents. But I will not vote for a proposition that puts a Congressman to the necessity of filing with some subordinate official of this House an itemized statement, and then puts upon the Congressman the burden of satisfying that subordinate official that he has expended the money.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Under the provisions of the law as drafted by the committee, would it not be possible for a man to bring his second wife and his children and step children and all of his uncles and aunts and nieces and nephews and cousins, and everybody else that happens to live with him—to bring the whole community here as dependents?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. He would not come back to Congress very long if he did.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. I am in favor of striking out the whole provision, for mileage and everything, but I am not in favor of a subterfuge like this.

Mr. BARTLETT. Each gentleman would have to decide that for himself. If they were dependent members of his family, he could bring them, and if they were not he could not bring them; and the Congressman would have to decide that.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto close in 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent that debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 20 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, will not the gentleman make that 30 minutes? I should like to have 5 minutes myself.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I ask unanimous consent that debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto close in 30 minutes.

Mr. BRYAN. I reserve the right to object.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, the unanimous consent asked by the chairman of the committee would not only cut off debate on the pending amendment, but on any other amendment that might be offered to this paragraph.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Then I will ask that all debate on the pending amendment close in 30 minutes.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. The pending amendment is the one offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD]. If this is voted down, I desire to offer an amendment to strike out the provision.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. That is the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa to strike out the provision.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. That is the pending amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. If his amendment is voted down, there will be other amendments offered to perfect the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent that all debate on the pending amendment be closed in 30 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. POST. I object.

Mr. GOOD. Quite a number of Members on this side want an opportunity to speak on this amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. There will be other amendments offered.

Mr. GOOD. Yes; but this amendment will be practically decisive of the question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. POST] objects.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on the pending amendment close in 30 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina moves that all debate on the pending amendment close in 30 minutes.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, in view of the approaching primaries it is hard for even an experienced man to determine whether it is patriotism or cowardice that is now moving the House. [Laughter and applause.] The provision carried in this bill reduces the expenses for mileage of Members, and, of course, it is commendable on the ground of economy; but I would have more regard for this effort at economy if the distinguished committee would go further than they have gone. My notion about it is, to put it plainly—and I am in the habit of speaking plainly, being a blunt man—that this proposition would not stand a ghost of a chance of passage if we had been elected last month instead of having to be nominated in the near future. [Laughter and applause.] If there is any man here who thinks he is getting too much, he can take less. As far as I am concerned, I am not intimidated by the alarm that is felt for fear somebody is going to accuse us of graft. I do not believe the people of the United States are so niggardly as to care, within reason, what salaries or what mileage we get. I am not sure that I shall vote with the gentleman from Georgia. I am not sure but that I will vote to leave the law stand as it was when I was elected, and I will go back to my people with the full confidence in the result.

Now, if you gentlemen really favor economy, why do not you prove it in the bill you present us. Let me say in all candor, and I have a profound respect for the entire committee, from its distinguished chairman to all of the membership on both sides, why do not you practice what you preach? Every man here knows that a Member's secretary, for instance, does more work than the secretary of a Senator. You all know that. You can leave this Chamber now and go to the far end of this Capitol to see some Senator and you can not find a seat there, because all the seats are occupied by the secretaries of Senators.

Mr. Chairman, the most distinguishing thing about a Senator's secretary is that he is so puffed up with his own importance that it is sometimes very difficult to tell which is the secretary and which is the Senator. [Laughter and applause.] Why, it has got so that a Member feels honored when he goes over to the Senate Office Building and succeeds in getting an audience with the Senator's secretary. [Laughter.] And yet these gentlemen who tell us they are inspired with the laudable purpose of economy come here from year to year and recommend to us to give Senators' secretaries $2,000 and our secretaries only $1,500; that, too, when a Senator has not only his secretary but a clerk, a stenographer, a messenger, and a janitor, and the Lord knows what all. [Laughter.] You can hardly get into some of the rooms occupied by Senators because of the horde of employees, and we pay all this expense without protest; but when you come to deal with a Member of the House, his secretary is only allowed $1,500 a year. Do you think that is fair?

Now, I am in favor of economy, and I will gladly support the committee if it will propose to cut down the Senators' secretaries' salaries to the same level that we pay our own, or put ours up to where theirs are.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks that his time be extended five minutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, the time is limited. Will not the gentleman take two minutes?

Mr. RUCKER. Does the gentleman object?

Mr. STAFFORD. I have no objection to the gentleman's time being extended outside of the 30 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Do I understand, Mr. Chairman, that this is beyond the 30 minutes?

The CHAIRMAN. No; it is part of the 30 minutes.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended 5 minutes not to be taken out of the 30 minutes.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I will yield the floor.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Chairman, a majority of the Members of this House are poor men. A majority of the Members have a common history. They were ambitious sons of poor men. They received a fairly good education. They started out in life with only a few hundred dollars, if, indeed, they had that much. They stood well in their communities. They became district attorneys and district judges. They acquired a few thousand dollars and a family of children needing an education. About this time they were elected to Congress.

These men receive a salary of $7,500 a year. They have no other source of income. A few years ago, in convention days, that was enough. The Member then only had to make good to the leaders of his district. The leaders would do the rest. The leaders would secure the Member's renomination and raise the money to pay his campaign expenses. The leaders were articulated with the special interests. In those days, also, the Member and all his family traveled to and from Washington on railroad passes, if they would accept them. They all had complimentary telegraph and express franks, if they would accept them. Some of the Members in those days sent their household goods across the continent on their express franks.

But now times have changed, thank God. The people and not the leaders do the nominating. The Member must make good to the people and not to a few leaders. [Applause.] No special interest can put up money to help elect a Congressman without making a sworn account of it, and hence the money is not now so often put up.

Nowadays a Member must send official data to each sovereign voter of his district showing his course here. That involves immense printing bills and large clerical expense. The special interests control the majority of the large newspapers. Therefore when a Member serves the people he must be prepared to defend himself at his own expense. If the people expect him to do that, and they do, they should pay him a salary of at least $10,000 a year. This the people would gladly do, in my opinion, if the matter were submitted to them upon a referendum vote.

The people of this country are not penny-wise and pound-foolish. This Congress will fool nobody by taking paltry sums from the peoples' Representatives and rendering them helpless to defend themselves without outside financial help.

Let the people make their Senators and Representatives independent by giving them salaries sufficient to pay their own living expenses and campaign expenses, and Congress, being thus made independent of the special interests, will pass laws which will save the people annually a hundred times the amount the people will pay in salaries to all Senators and Representatives. [Applause.]

Many Congressmen now feel that they have no means of communicating with their constituents except through the newspapers, as the expense of sending literature to each voter, as I do, is too great for the man with a family to support. A Member left in this position is at the mercy of the special-privilege corporation controlling our great newspapers. Such Members must either knuckle down to these special interests or get no favorable publicity. It is in this way that Congress is now influenced and intimidated to-day, and the people know it. Therefore any attempt to render the peoples' Representatives even more dependent upon the special interests will meet with the disapproval of every voter in this country who knows the facts.

The special interests would like to see the Senate and the House filled with men of wealth. They figure that such men will serve the wealthy, and they are right nine times out of ten. But if they can not get men of wealth, they would like to have the poor and independent Member rendered helpless to assert his independence. In this latter wish they are now succeeding to a remarkable degree. If Members of this House do their duty by themselves and their constituents, they will vote to pay mileage now provided by law for each of the three sessions of the Sixty-third Congress. [Applause.]

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, this question has to be settled either upon the basis of its being mileage or upon the basis of its being part of the salary. If it is considered a part of the salary, then of course a lot of this argument is out of place. If it is considered upon the basis of mileage, then I think there ought to be a uniform rate of mileage not only for Congressmen but for Naval and Army officers unless a distinction be made upon the basis of water travel by boat on the ocean, for instance, and land travel by railroad. I think there ought to be a uniform rate of mileage if we are going to make it upon the basis of its being mileage. I heard a story of a gentleman who came here once from Missouri. He is quoted as having said that he was going to go back with $10,000 profit for the two years. He was not going to try to be reelected.

Mr. RUCKER. Did the gentleman sit on that side?

Mr. BRYAN. Oh, he was from Missouri and you would have to show me if he sat on this side.

Mr. RUCKER. He must have. No Democrat ever made that much money.

Mr. BRYAN. I got this on mighty good Missouri authority, and you have to show me to convince me that that authority was not reliable. He said he was going to save $10,000 during his two-year term, and he was getting only $5,000 a year as salary. He took his mileage and allowance for secretary, and he made his wife his secretary, and he actually lived on his mileage and the secretary's allowance in some little boarding house and really did go home with a little over $10,000.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRYAN. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. RUSSELL. That story is true. The gentleman referred to was my predecessor, from my district, and when he went home he was interviewed and said that he had saved $11,000. His wife never did go to Washington at all. She was his secretary; and he was a Republican, and he sat on that side.

Mr. BRYAN. I do not know whether he was a member of the Democratic or Republican Party. It makes no difference; they all look alike to me. But this provision that has been suggested here of a personal expense account, to be kept by each Member, is not going to work at all, according to my humble judgment. It will open up a line of accounting that will be very hard to comprehend, and will open up all kinds of irregularities. For instance, a man can come here, if he desires to, in a private car; and if he is like this gentleman who came from Missouri, and does not expect to be reelected, he could come across the continent in a private car, and that would be his actual expense incurred. This proposition would encourage extravagance. He could file that account, and every cent of it would have to be paid under this provision. Then, another question arises in the use of the words "dependent members of his family." Who are the dependent members of a man's family? For instance, we will say that he has a niece or a helpless relative whom he is supporting—somebody he is taking care of—who is not legally adopted as a member of his family. He can not leave that individual at home. Can he bring such a one here as a member of his family?

What does the word "dependent" mean, anyway? We do not in our country recognize that a wife is dependent on her husband. Wives are not so considered. A Member from the State of Washington could not bring his wife under that section of the law, certainly, because a wife is not a dependent of a husband out West. [Applause.] No man out there would dare tell 4,000,000 women voters that they are dependent on men. It would not work at all. It is not true. [Laughter.]

Mr. ALEXANDER. Then, if we agree to this proposition, we are going to raise an issue between ourselves and the suffragettes?

Mr. BRYAN. Well, I will say to the gentleman that to call a wife a dependent of the husband would not work. There is a woman candidate for Congress out in one of the districts, and she is likely to bring her husband with her. I do not know. [Laughter.] Will he be a dependent? [Laughter.] So I say this is so indefinite and so uncertain that I do not think we ought to adopt that kind of a provision. If it is to be on the basis of mileage, cut it down and give a lieutenant in the Army or the Navy just exactly the same mileage that you give a Congressman, and if it is not mileage and is to be considered as a part of the salary you will have to determine it on that basis. I do not believe in any unusual pay under the term of "mileage," and I am willing to stand for sensible revision. There are arguments on both sides of the matter, but when we come to change the law let us do it in a sane manner and not attempt to open up any such a Pandora's box of ridiculous possibilities as this. "All expenses" and "dependent relations" are mere legislative loopholes to promote extravagance and open the door to the worst form of favoritism. [Applause.]

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, because of the prevailing practice——

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RUCKER. Under the rule, can a Member speak more than once on a pending amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. I believe the rule to be that he can not.

Mr. RUCKER. Then I suggest to the gentleman from Wisconsin will it not save time to have just one speech from each Member?

Mr. STAFFORD. I think so.

Mr. RUCKER. The gentleman has already addressed the committee upon this amendment?

Mr. STAFFORD. I have not. If the gentleman wishes my five minutes, I would be only too glad to yield it to him.

Mr. RUCKER. I would not have the gentleman's five minutes, but I only wanted to enforce the rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not know whether the gentleman has already spoken on this question.

Mr. RUCKER. There has been only one question before the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can state whether he has addressed the committee on this particular amendment?

Mr. STAFFORD. I have not.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, because the existing practice works injustice or inequality in the pay to Members of Congress I am opposed to the retention of the existing mileage allowance. It can not be defended on the grounds that because Members live at a great distance from the seat of government they should receive a larger compensation. We might look at this proposition squarely in the face, and we know that the Representatives on the Pacific coast receive a thousand dollars or fifteen hundred dollars more salary than do the Members on the Atlantic coast, and that I receive a higher salary of $250 to $300 more than those living immediately adjacent to the city of Washington. The proposition submitted by the committee is a workable proposition. You may conjure up arguments against it and claim that because the Army and Navy officers happen to receive some mileage allowance that can not be justified, therefore we are warranted in the retention of an inequitable basis of mileage pay.

The question of mileage when it was first presented in the first Congress seems to have been paid to the Members, because at that time Members were paid for their actual attendance at the sessions of Congress, and the Congress then allowed them a mileage allowance based, apparently, from the time when they first left their homes of a day's salary for every 20 miles of distance that a Member of Congress traveled, and paying him the same salary or allowance that he was paid while in the service in Congress, namely, $6 or $7.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. That practice continued down to 1866, when it was changed to the present basis of 20 cents per mile going and coming. I am not surprised at those gentlemen from far-distant places trying to retain this perquisite, because it is nothing but a perquisite; but so far as other allowances are concerned, namely, stationery allowance, clerical allowance, they are fixed equally. If Members do not use those allowances, notwithstanding they are treated equally. Members living near by to Washington use a great deal more than the mileage allowance granted them, because they return to their homes more frequently, while those living at a distance do not so return to their homes. I recognize it will be absolutely impracticable and impossible to repeal this mileage allowance entirely, and I say to the Members who are living near by that it is not fair I should receive $250 or $300 more allowance than a gentleman living in Maryland or a gentleman living in Pennsylvania or a gentleman living in New York, nor is it fair that a gentleman on the Pacific coast should receive $1,000 more than those gentlemen living in the neighborhood adjacent to the Capital. Now I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman has made a study of this, and I want to ask him if under the language of this provision the pay will be for every session of Congress whether they are merged or not?

Mr. STAFFORD. For each session of Congress.

Mr. MURDOCK. So that the question of whether the mileage should be duplicated when two sessions merge would be done away with?

Mr. STAFFORD. That would rest on the construction of what is a session of Congress.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield for another question? Has the language "nearest route usually traveled" been carried in the bill from the beginning?

Mr. STAFFORD. It has.

Mr. MURDOCK. Why not the shortest route?

Mr. STAFFORD. This phraseology permits the Member a choice of routes, but limits him to the nearest route. For instance, the Baltimore & Ohio is the shortest route between Chicago and Washington, but I am privileged to travel on the Pennsylvania.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, it occurs to me that gentlemen have a strange construction of the ethics and of integrity. If I were to vote against this mileage allowance, I would not accept it. I believe that when an amount is allowed to me as part of my salary under the law I ought to vote for that amount, and I am going to accept that amount and no more. I have always told the people whom I represent that I would accept all my salary, but not one cent more. If I thought I was wrong, I would not vote for it, and I would not accept it after it carried. We might just as well stand right up, as the people can not be deceived that way. I have made a calculation that our mileage will cost my district $7, and I am satisfied the people will be satisfied with it. [Applause.] I am in favor of the law as it stands now. It costs Members now more than it used to cost; no doubt of that. I would rather have no mileage and live in Virginia or Maryland—not because of the States, you understand; I would rather, on account of the climate and economic conditions live in Oklahoma—but I would rather live in Virginia, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, or Maryland, so far as business is concerned, while a Member of Congress and get no mileage than live in my State and get it, because the gentlemen who live in those States near by can carry on their law practice, while it takes five days to go and return from Oklahoma, without doing any business.

The amount under the law is not exorbitant. In fact any gentleman who comes here knows we do not get any more salary than we need. Every man knows he pays out more than the allowance for his clerk hire. I heard the other day there was a proposition of allowing practically $100 for every 100,000 people for postage, and that a Senator should have the same. That would give me $200, not enough to pay for the free seed I distribute, while it gives to our Senators $1,700 each, and I know I get as much mail as either one of them gets. It would not be fair for the fellow who is handling fourth-class post offices and answering every one of the hundreds of fellows who writes here, as we are called upon to do. Why not be courageous and manly and stand up and vote for a law which you think is right and proper? [Applause.] You can not deceive the people. The people know it costs money. The people expect us to get a good salary and not to have to get money from any other sources. I have always told the people in my State I was going to take every dime allowed me, and not take one cent more, nor one cent from any other source. This is the honest policy.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, just a few words before we vote on this amendment. Be not deceived. If you vote to strike out this paragraph, you will vote for 20 cents a mile.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. No; I will not. We discussed this question from every conceivable standpoint, 5 cents, 6 cents, 7 cents, 8 cents, and 10 cents, and this is the only proposition we could get together on, and if you strike this amendment from the bill then the committee will not be able to get together on any given figure, and you leave the law as it is. [Applause.]

If you want to change this law, vote down the amendment and leave this paragraph in the bill. Then, if you want to change the provision of the committee as brought in, you can amend our proposition. The Army officers are paid 7 cents; the naval officers are paid 8 cents; other Government employees are paid actual expenses. It is not lowering the dignity of a Member of Congress to be called upon to furnish a voucher.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Excuse me, please.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina declines to yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. There are thousands of Government employees who are required by the law to file vouchers with the auditing officers of the Government. Justices of the court, generals in the Army, admirals in the Navy are also required to do so, and even Members of Congress under the present law file certificates with the Sergeant at Arms as to their travel. You are called upon when Congress is not in session by telegraph to attend the funeral of a deceased Member, and you go from your home and are told to keep an account of your expenses and to render the same to the Sergeant at Arms. Have you ever felt insulted and felt it was beneath your dignity to do so? Equality is justice. This law treats all the Members of Congress on an equality. Some say that you can not come here for 10 cents a mile; some say you can not come for 8 cents; some say you can not come for 20; but we say that whatever the cost the Government will pay it, and that treats everybody just alike, whether he lives in Maryland or whether he lives in California. Some men say if you want the reform cut down the salaries of the Senators' secretaries. Gentlemen, let us reform at home. Let us consider the item now before the House, and if there is some other item in the bill that you think ought to be reduced, when we reach it make the proper motion. The whole situation here is this, namely, 20 cents a mile is indefensible. Men know that it is more than sufficient.

Mr. RUCKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I decline to yield. Gentlemen, this provision is in the bill. Vote to leave it there. If you do not like the particular language, if you do not like the particular amount, it will still be open for amendment; but if you want to vote for 20 cents a mile, the way to do it is to vote for the pending amendment. Mr. Chairman, let us have a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment, and have it pending.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia offers an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out "$51,000" and insert "$25,500."

Mr. RUCKER. I do not understand that amendment is pending.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I would like to have the amendment to be amended by the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the original amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, lines 4 to 10, inclusive, strike out the paragraph and insert: "For mileage of Senators, $51,000."

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I understand that, at the request of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT], the latter part of the amendment is withdrawn by unanimous consent.

Mr. BARTLETT. I did not so understand.

Mr. RUCKER. I may be in error about it.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment and have it pending

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman offers the following amendment, to be pending. Is there objection?

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer a preferential amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PAGE] asks unanimous consent to offer an amendment, have it read at the Clerk's desk, and have it pending. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 10, strike out the sum "$25,500" and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"$12,750: Provided, That hereafter each Senator, Representative, Delegate, and Resident Commissioner shall receive mileage at the rate of 5 cents a mile, to be estimated by the nearest route usually traveled in going to and returning from each regular session, in lieu of the present rate of 20 cents a mile."

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer this amendment, and ask unanimous consent that it be considered as pending.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Provided, Mr. Chairman, that the pending amendment is defeated.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not think he can submit a provision to the House.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Let it go, then.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMPSON] asks unanimous consent to offer an amendment, have it read, and to be pending. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the Clerk will report the proposed amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, strike out all of lines 4 to 19, inclusive, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That all laws and parts of laws now in force allowing mileage to Senators, Representatives, Delegates, and Resident Commissioners be, and the same are hereby, repealed."

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I offer a preferential amendment to perfect the text, by striking out, beginning with line 5 and ending on line 6.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the proposed amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, lines 5 and 6, strike out the following language:

"Including actual traveling expenses of immediate and dependent members of their families."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT].

Mr. BARTON. May we have it reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment to the amendment will be again reported.

The amendment to the amendment was again read.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 73, noes 41.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Let us have tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Tellers were ordered.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSON] and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] will take their places as tellers.

Mr. SUMNERS. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SUMNERS. There are a number of Members who do not know what this amendment is.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment has been reported three times; but without objection, it will be again reported. [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection, and the Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, lines 4 to 10, inclusive, strike out the paragraph and insert: "For mileage of Senators, $51,000."

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 83, noes 46.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the Chair if the amendment offered by myself is not now pending as an amendment to the proposition which was just adopted, offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD]?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the gentleman's amendment. The Chair thinks it would have to be modified as to language in order to apply, and the figures, too.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, line 10, strike out the sum "$25,500" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "$12,750: Provided, That hereafter each Senator, Representative, Delegate, and Resident Commissioner shall receive mileage at the rate of 5 cents per mile, to be estimated by the nearest route usually traveled, in going to and returning to each regular session, in lieu of the present rate of 20 cents per mile."

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the word "five" and insert "ten."

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to reserve a point of order on that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] reserves a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I realize that, coming as an amendment to the proposition that has been adopted by the House, after having been offered before that time, this amendment now will have to be modified in language in order to be in order, unless I am permitted to offer this as a substitute for the proposition which has been written in the bill, and if necessary I will ask unanimous consent that the amendment just read may be offered, not as an amendment but as a substitute for the language just adopted by the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will suggest to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PAGE] that if he desires to have his amendment before the House he can move to strike out the amendment just adopted and insert his in lieu thereof.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I make that motion, to strike out the amendment just adopted and insert this in lieu thereof.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, what position does that put my motion in?

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment will be still pending and will be taken up in its regular order.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BRYAN. The amendment having just been passed, in which the amount is definitely fixed and the number of dollars definitely stated, is it in order to change that judgment of the House now? I should think not, because, if so, we can never come to a conclusion. As soon as we fix it at $12,000 we can make another amendment, making it $9,000, and some one else might move to make it $100,000, and in that event we might be detained here all day in the consideration of this one item, and final judgment could be made impossible.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PAGE] is in order, because it undertakes to change the existing law to that extent by reducing the appropriation from $25,500 to $12,750 and providing that the calculation be made on a basis of 5 cents a mile. This is not to change the amount but the conditions of the law, and on that ground the Chair thinks it is in order. But if the amendment were confined merely to the figures, the Chair thinks a point of order ordinarily would be well taken.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MADDEN. Then, if this is turned down on the basis of 5 cents a mile, it will be in order for a Member to offer an amendment to make it 7 cents a mile as a substitute?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not think it would be in order, unless there was a change of law attached to it that would make it subject to a different ruling.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, has the Chair ruled the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PAGE] to be in order?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. Then I move to strike out the word "five" where it occurs in the amendment and insert the word "ten."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] moves to strike out the word "five" where it occurs in the amendment and insert in lieu thereof the word "ten." The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BRYAN. Wherein does the word "five" or the word "ten" appear?

The CHAIRMAN Ten cents per mile.

Mr. BRYAN. The amendment adopted a while ago did not have that in. Is this an amendment to the amendment that the gentleman is offering?

The CHAIRMAN. It is an amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PAGE].

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I understand that the sum mentioned in the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina is $12,750.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Yes. That is one-quarter of the amount written in the bill, as 5 is one-fourth of 20.

Mr. BUTLER. Suppose the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia would prevail?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina has the floor.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I want to know if it is possible, after the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PAGE] has offered an amendment, for another gentleman to offer an amendment to that amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PAGE] did not offer an amendment to an amendment. An amendment has been adopted which has become a part of the bill. The gentleman from North Carolina is seeking to perfect the bill as amended. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] then undertakes to perfect his amendment by offering an amendment to that amendment, which is in the third degree.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I want to be heard on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina is recognized.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, during the discussion of the bill before the committee——

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. I understand the Chair had put the question, and now in the midst of a vote we have an argument on the main question.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not so understand. The Chair understood that the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PAGE] was undertaking to facilitate the consideration of the bill. It may be that the forward movement was proceeding too fast. [Laughter.]

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. During the discussion of the provision offered by the committee in the bill, Mr. Chairman, a number of gentlemen objected to the committee provision because of the fact that they were required to file a statement and said that criticism might come from certain sources as to what was in the statement, and so on and so forth, thereby indicating that but for that fact they were in favor of some amendment being made to the present law. Now in the amendment that I have offered I am giving to the membership of this House an opportunity to change the law, with a certification exactly as under the provisions of the present law, only changing the amount that is paid from 20 cents to 5 cents a mile.

Mr. Chairman, for nearly 10 years, at almost every session of Congress, I have advanced an argument for a reduction of the amount of mileage that is paid to Members. I do not care at this time to make any argument whatever upon this question. I merely want to say to the Members of the House that the amendment now pending, to pay the Members 5 cents a mile each way to and from each session of Congress, is ample to meet the expenses of travel to and from the Capital. And I believe that was the intent of the law when it was written at 20 cents. Conditions in the country have changed, and Members of Congress or anybody else can travel now for one-fourth of what they could travel for at the time this law was enacted. By adopting this we equalize the salaries of Members of Congress very much more nearly than they stand at present. That is all I care to say, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, suppose we adopt the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] at 10 cents per mile. For one I shall vote for that amendment. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PAGE] has moved an amendment which has in it the sum of $12,500, which is not sufficient to pay 10 cents a mile.

Mr. SHERLEY. If that is adopted, we can double the amount so as to conform to the rate.

Mr. BUTLER. Why does not the gentleman from Georgia include in his amendment a proposition to increase the sum to $25,000?

Mr. BARTLETT. I am willing to include that. I ask to strike out the words $12,500 and to insert $26,500.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to modify this amendment so as to include striking out $12,500 and inserting $26,500. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BARTON. Mr. Chairman, on the 2d day of last December I filed a motion to discharge the committee from the consideration of House bill 3919, introduced by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox]. We have had various propositions submitted to us in this pending bill by the way of amendments; but it seems to me that if we want to square ourselves with the country, the bill of the gentleman from Indiana calls for exactly what we should collect as mileage. It says that the Members, Delegates, and Resident Commissioners shall be paid their actual traveling expenses from their homes. Now, when we come to the consideration of the excess mileage of Federal judges, naval officers, and Army officers, we know that we allow them more than their actual traveling expenses, and we do it primarily, I think, on the ground that we allow ourselves more than our actual traveling expenses, and can not justify ourselves in refusing others. I, for one, can not see why a Member's family should be included, as this bill contemplates. The gentleman from Missouri asks, Do we make this effort through a spirit of patriotism or of cowardice? I say through a spirit of patriotism and not cowardice. I would be just as willing to vote on this proposition if the election had been held as I am now, when an election is pending. I do not think this is a question of politics. It is a question of business; and if we are going to get to an economical condition in running this Government, it seems to me the proper place to begin is among the membership of this House and in the administration of the affairs with which we are directly connected. I can not see any consistency in our doing more for the employees of the Senators for exactly the same kind of work than we do for ourselves in the matter of extra help and pay of secretaries. We certainly have as much to do in our offices as they have, and the employees should be treated exactly alike. I do not expect to get all the things I want at this time, and we probably shall not get them all under this bill or the bill of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox], which I am thoroughly in favor of; but I do certainly think we should make some reduction of the mileage as it now exists and adjust the difference in the pay of House and Senate employees.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT].

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CARTER. As I understand the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PAGE] as amended by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT], it moves to strike out and insert. Is that correct?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. CARTER. Is it in order to get a separate vote on those two propositions?

The CHAIRMAN. The question is substantially whether or not the committee will adopt the proposition to pay 5 cents a mile or 10 cents a mile or the amount carried in the amendment already adopted.

Mr. CARTER. We have two propositions—one to strike out and the other to insert. Can we not have a separate vote on those two propositions?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Oh, yes, Mr. Chairman; the motion to strike out and insert is divisible under the rules of the House.

Mr. CARTER. Then I ask for a division.

Mr. BARTLETT. The motion to strike out and insert is not divisible except by unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not understand that it was; and while the Chair has great respect for the opinion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT], the Chair differs with him on this. The Chair will settle that parliamentary question later.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, I rise to make a statement of my position in this matter, for the reason that on several occasions when this question has been up I have not had the opportunity to say anything. The committee bill authorizes the payment of the actual expenses for one trip each way each term for the Member and his family. I want to say that with one slight amendment I believe the proposition of the committee is correct. I believe that we ought to receive our reasonable and actual expenses, whatever they may be, both for ourselves and for bringing the actual and dependent members of our family here, as provided by the committee. I think perhaps there ought to be one amendment to the bill as reported by the committee. If a Member of Congress is called away to his home by sickness or urgent necessity, of such a character that he is expressly excused by the House with allowance of his traveling expenses, he ought to be allowed mileage on such a journey. I think, also, that if we try to fix this matter precisely, there ought to be given actual expenses, going and coming, in case of recess of the House, when the Member goes home during the recess. In other words, I believe the salary of a Member of Congress was intended to be $7,500, and that the actual expenses incurred by him in coming to and going from Washington were intended to be allowed as mileage. I believe that the committee have brought in a proper provision, except that what I have suggested ought to be added to it, so that if a Member is called home by sickness in his family or by official business his actual traveling expenses, reasonably incurred by him, ought to be paid. With that amendment I believe we ought to adopt the proposition of the committee. I wanted to state this to show my position on the matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] to the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PAGE].

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I think perhaps some of the membership of the House are a little confused by these amendments. As I understand the parliamentary situation, we have adopted an amendment which reenacts existing law so far as this part of Senators' compensation is concerned. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PAGE] has offered an amendment to reverse that action and allow Members 5 cents a mile. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] has offered an amendment to that amendment by increasing the amount to 10 cents a mile. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the House has expressed itself rather forcibly upon this question. We have already determined that so far as the compensation is concerned, Members of the House and Senate ought to receive the compensation which the present law gives to them. Those who believe that we should accept the compensation which the law now gives us, which the law gave us when we were elected, will vote down both of these amendments. That will leave the question just as the law now provides, giving to the Members that compensation which has been guaranteed to them for a number of years as a part of their salary.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, it is not necessary to consume the time of the committee on this proposition. The Members know whether they favor 20 cents a mile or 10 cents a mile or 5 cents a mile. Personally I would be glad to abolish all mileage. I would be willing to vote for 5 cents a mile. I would be willing to vote for 10 cents a mile. I am willing to vote for anything that reduces the present rate, which I believe is indefensible. But nobody can be enlightened by this debate. Members have their minds made up, and let us not waste the time of the House in talking further about it.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the committee's attention to the fact that this Congress does not propose to pay you any mileage in any event for the present session of Congress. If you let the law stand as it is now on the statute books, you are in reality cutting the mileage down to 10 cents a mile, because you will only get mileage during the remainder of your service in this House next December. In other words, you will get mileage once for two sessions.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by by Mr. BARTLETT) there were 30 ayes and 71 noes.

So the amendment to the amendment was lost.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PAGE].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. PAGE of North Carolina) there were 32 ayes and 63 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask that my amendment be reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Oklahoma.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, strike out all of lines 4 to 19, inclusive, and insert in lieu thereof the following: All laws and parts of laws now in force allowing mileage to Senators, Representatives, Delegates, and Resident Commissioners be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order that that amendment is not in order.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. I would like to hear why from the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GOOD. It is not in order to strike out a provision of the bill that has not been read, and we have only read to line 10, while the gentleman's amendment moves to strike out down to line 19, inclusive.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I do not think that is subject to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa makes a point of order that the amendment of the gentleman from Oklahoma is to strike from the bill a portion that has not been read.

Mr. SHERLEY. I think the gentleman is mistaken in the fact.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, when the Clerk had read to line 10 I offered my amendment.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, whether it has been read or not I do not know, but we have acted on the language down to and including line 19.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will suggest to the gentleman from Kentucky that the Clerk states that he only read to line 10 on page 2. Now, can the committee contemplate what is in lines 11 to 19 and undertake to strike out the language until that paragraph has been read?

Mr. SHERLEY. But would it not be in order for the gentleman from Oklahoma to amend by striking out lines 4 to 10, inclusive?

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. I ask that the other lines be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Hereafter, in lieu of the mileage now authorized by law, each Senator, Representative, Delegate, and Resident Commissioner shall be entitled to and be paid the traveling expenses, including the traveling expenses of immediate and dependent members of their respective families, actually incurred in going to and returning once from each session of Congress by the nearest route usually traveled, the same to be paid on certificates duly approved as in the manner heretofore prescribed for the payment of mileage.

Mr. GOOD. I reserve a point of order for the purpose of asking by whom the amendment has been offered.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMPSON] moved to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. GOOD. That is, the paragraph ending on line 10?

The CHAIRMAN. The two paragraphs, beginning on line 4 and ending on line 19.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I am going to object to the number of amendments being sent up to the desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma. Does the gentleman from Iowa make a point of order against the provision ending on line 11?

Mr. GOOD. I make the point of order against the amendment, because the committee has just refused to strike out that first paragraph; second, that it is not in order at this time to amend the paragraph beginning at line 11 and ending at line 19 for the reason that that paragraph has never been read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa is in error as to that portion of the paragraph from line 11 to 19 not having been read. It was read a few moments ago by unanimous consent, so that the gentleman from Oklahoma might offer his amendment. Now does the gentleman from Iowa make the point of order against that portion of the bill—lines 11 to 19?

Mr. GOOD. Then I make a point of order against the amendment which strikes out lines 4 to 10, inclusive. We have already passed upon it and read another paragraph, and it is not in order without unanimous consent to revert to the paragraph which the House has refused to strike out.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out lines 11 to 19 and insert what the Clerk has already read.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I do not think the House ought to take advantage of a technicality. The Chair distinctly said to the gentleman from Oklahoma that his motion was not in order until after the Clerk had read down to line 19. It clearly would have been in order to offer an amendment to strike out down to and including line 10 and inserting what the gentleman desires to insert. I submit in all candor that we ought not to make parliamentary procedure a trap for the unwary.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair agrees with the gentleman from Kentucky. The gentleman from Oklahoma only proposes to make this amendment apply to that portion of the bill from lines 4 to 10, inclusive.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I have. I asked awhile ago that that be so stated by the Chair—that it apply to that language left in the bill and insert the substitute language as amended—and the Chair said it would not be permitted at that time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not so remember it. The gentleman from Oklahoma is recognized to make his motion.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, I reserved the point of order on the paragraph from line 11 to line 19. I do not want to lose my rights.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman from Iowa to have reserved the point of order on that paragraph.

Mr. HAWLEY. I did so also.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph from line 11 to line 19, inclusive, and insert the paragraph I have sent to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa and the gentleman from Oregon reserve the point of order against the paragraph. The Chair would like to hear the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSON] or some member of the committee with reference to the point of order. Since the committee has adopted an amendment striking out the paragraph from lines 4 to 10, inclusive, and adopted a straight provision for a certain amount for mileage, will that portion of the bill from line 11 to line 19 be in order? The Chair would be glad to hear any gentleman upon that proposition.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, that has not anything to do with it, because, as the amendment now stands, they have stricken out the language from line 4 to 10 and changed the amount to $51,000, and there is no legislation needed one way or the other. We can go on and legislate and we may possibly pass legislation that would not require any part of that money to be expended.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, the former law has been restored by the House as against the provision brought in by the Committee on Appropriations. The provision from lines 11 to 19 on the face of it not carrying an appropriation does not make a reduction in expenditure, but I wish to call the Chair's attention especially to the fact that this legislation requires the putting on the statutory pay roll of a class of persons not entitled to receive pay, and that is the immediate and dependent relatives of the members of the families of Senators and Representatives. This being new legislation, it is obnoxious to the rule and subject to a point of order.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, is the Chair about to rule on the point of order to the paragraph beginning on line 11?

The CHAIRMAN. The paragraph from line 11 to line 19.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that this is clearly a limitation on this appropriation.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, the committee has expressed its opinion as to traveling expenses, so far as Senators are concerned, by striking out the paragraph in lines 4 to 10; but the paragraph now under consideration extends to others than Senators—in addition, to Representatives, Delegates, and Resident Commissioners. If the purport of the paragraph under consideration is identical to the one the committee has just considered, it would be subject to the point of order; but embodying a different provision it comes up as an original proposition for the committee to decide. The Chair has already decided that the former paragraph came within the Holman rule. If the former paragraph did, then this subsequent paragraph that we are now considering, which extends the purport of that to Representatives and Delegates, should be considered in order at the present time.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman indulge the Chair to put him a question?

Mr. STAFFORD. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. There was a provision in the section contained in lines 4 to 10 to reduce the expenditures by an appropriation, but there is absolutely nothing on the face of this proposition contained in lines 11 to 19 that proposes to reduce expenditures.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then the question for the Chair's consideration will be whether this comes within the second provision of the Holman rule, namely:

Provided, That it shall be in order further to amend such bill upon the report of the committee or any joint commission authorized by law or the House Members of any such commission having jurisdiction of the subject matter of such amendment, which amendment, being germane to the subject matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures.

I take it, as the Chair stated in his former ruling, that the Chair will take judicial notice of the fact that this provision reduces the expenditures of the Government, that it is aimed at that, and that it is, in fact, a retrenchment of expenditures.

The CHAIRMAN. But that only in connection with the proposition to reduce expenditures. The two coming together, it seems to the Chair, resolves the matter in favor of the reduction, but where it is a plain provision of a change of law, without showing on its face any disposition to reduce expenditures, it does not seem to the Chair that it is in order.

Mr. TAGGART. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the following as an amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has not yet ruled. Does the gentleman from Kentucky desire to be heard?

Mr. SHERLEY. I understood the Chair to sustain the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has not yet ruled. The Chair is free to admit that he is very much in doubt as to the rule that ought to apply to this second provision in lines 11 to 19, but he was convinced this morning that the provision in connection with a proposition of that kind ought to be resolved in favor of a reduction of expenditures. However, where it is purely a question of amendment to the law, of a change of law, without a proposition to reduce expenditures in the bill, the Chair is very much in doubt whether that rule ought to apply.

Mr. SHERLEY. I have no desire to take the Chair's time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would be very glad to hear from the gentleman.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, in my judgment, the paragraph now standing alone is clearly subject to a point of order, and the reason for it is this: That on its face it not only does not show a saving to the Government, but it does show an increase of those who indirectly shall be entitled to receive compensation, so that if any presumption were to be indulged in, the presumption would be that there would be an increase and not a saving; and, in my judgment, it is subject to a point of order.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to be heard. The gentleman from Kentucky has expressed better than I can the thought that was in my mind.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I do not know much about these rules, and I do not care to know much about them. I think the more a man knows about them the less he knows about the real, practical affairs of this Republic. I do know, however, that if we repeal a law that provides for the payment of mileage to Members of Congress and Senators and Delegates we can make all the appropriation we want to and there will not be a dollar go out of the Treasury. Now, I can not understand this hairsplitting business here, by which a Member of this House can contend when you provide for a regular repeal of laws allowing mileage, then to say that is a limitation and a decrease in the amount appropriated——

Mr. SHERLEY. No one has said that.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The gentleman from Oklahoma is evidently laboring under a misapprehension. The point of order was not made to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. No; the point of order was made to the provision in the bill. The proposition offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma would be in order, in my judgment, if he cares anything about that——

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. I do.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. But the proposition in the bill is an entirely different proposition.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. My understanding was that the point of order was against lines 11 to 19 in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has already intimated he was clearly of the opinion that there is nothing in this provision that indicates on its face it is a reduction of expenditures and it makes no appropriation whatever, and therefore, in the opinion of the Chair, the point of order is well taken. The Chair now recognizes the gentleman from Oklahoma, if he desires recognition.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert, after line 10, on page 2, the following: "That all laws and parts of laws now in force allowing mileage to Senators, Representatives, Delegates, and Resident Commissioners be, and the same are hereby, repealed."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the following as a substitute.

Mr. TAGGART. Mr. Chairman, I will at this time withdraw my amendment, which I had offered and which was before the committee, and which has reference to striking out that——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma was recognized some time ago to offer an amendment, and the gentleman from Illinois was clamoring before the gentleman from Kansas got up for an amendment. The Chair feels like he ought to recognize gentlemen who want to offer amendments in the order in which they desired to offer them. Now, the Chair will be very glad to recognize the gentleman from Kansas when these amendments are voted upon.

Mr. TAGGART. I am trying to get rid of an amendment. The Chair ruled out of order the very matter which I move to strike out by my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not understand the gentleman.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer a substitute to the motion of the gentleman, as follows.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitute, by Mr. MADDEN. At the end of line 10 insert the following:

"That upon the filing of a written statement of any Senator, Representative, Delegate, and Resident Commissioner to the effect that he does not desire to accept the amount credited to him for mileage it shall hereafter be the duty of the disbursing officer to cover the amount standing to the credit of any such Senator, Representative, Delegate, and Resident Commissioner back into the Treasury of the United States."

[Applause.]

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

Mr. TAGGART. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the matter as far as line 10 has been stricken out by the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is not well taken, for the reason that the gentleman from Illinois offers it as a substitute, to follow line 10.

Mr. TAGGART. I appreciate the patriotism of the amendment.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RUCKER. I want to know if this amendment is offered under the Holman rule; if so, it is not in order, as it does not tend to decrease expenses. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, it is said this is a saving on its face. I wish to say to the committee it will save the face of a good many of those gentlemen who are always so anxious in their efforts particularly to avoid going on record and saying they do not want mileage, to put them squarely on record, by making a report or a statement to the Sergeant at Arms of the House that they have no wish to receive mileage, after it is voted for them. I do not care whether there is any mileage voted or not. That is not the question that excites me, but there are a good many men here who do care.

Mr. PAYNE. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. MADDEN. Certainly.

Mr. PAYNE. Is the gentleman willing to amend his amendment by modifying it so as to apply also to those who do not care whether they get mileage or not?

Mr. MADDEN. I will be glad to apply it to them; and I will say to the gentleman right now that if the amendment is adopted and opportunity is given for Members to make the statement provided for in this amendment, I will promise I will not accept any mileage.

Mr. BATHRICK rose.

Mr. MADDEN. I refuse to yield. I think mileage is all right and we are entitled to it, as far as that goes. I can say without any fear of successful contradiction that I spend a great deal more than the mileage I receive for traveling expenses, and I pay the expenses of my secretary and his wife to Washington and back every year, and every time I go and come I pay the expenses of my secretary if he goes with me. There is no reason why I, receiving $7,500 a year, should get 40 cents a mile myself both ways and the man who acts as secretary to a Representative, and getting $1,500, and some of them not getting anything at all, as a matter of fact, or very little, should not have their traveling expenses. [Applause.] Now, I believe, if we are going to provide mileage, we ought to provide for it in some legitimate way, and I would cut out all this bunk business. I say to you that half the talk on the floor of the House upon the matter of mileage is only done for the newspapers; it is only done so that the record may go out home that some of the men on this floor are in favor of economy.

Why, this is no economy. It is a bagatelle. It is not even "peanut politics." As JOHN SHARP WILLIAMS said when he was a Member of the House, this is not as big as "peanut politics"; it is "mustard-seed politics." [Applause.] What we ought to do is to be on the square with ourselves. I do not care whether you pay 1 cent a mile or 5 cents a mile or 10 cents a mile or 20 cents a mile. We have already taxed our salaries 1 per cent for income tax. Now, why not take off the other 24 per cent and make it 25 per cent? Let us do it. Let us be on the square with the country, and do not let us try to save $25,000 and burn up hundreds of millions of dollars in other ways. This Government could be run for $250,000,000 or $300,000,000 less than it is being run for now, and could be run better than it is being run. Why talk all month or all week or all day just so that the people of the United States will think we are economists, for $25,000? When you start to talk about $25,000, all men here object to it; but if you talk about $1,000,000, it goes over their heads and they forget all about it.

Now, I am in favor of what these men say they want to do, and I wish to give them a chance to refuse the mileage.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate on the present paragraph and amendments thereto close in one minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent that debate on the present paragraph and amendments thereto close in one minute. Is there objection?

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the right to object.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, then I ask unanimous consent that all debate on the pending paragraph and amendments thereto close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I want to offer an amendment. It is not along the lines, though, that we have been discussing.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, we have been discussing this matter now for nearly three hours.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. If the gentleman will suspend, I told him it was not along the line of these other amendments.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Your amendment can be offered.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I want to discuss it for five minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, we have been discussing this matter for two hours and a half.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto close in five minutes?

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Reserving the right to object——

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on the pending paragraph and amendments thereto close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina moves that all debate on the paragraph and amendments thereto close in five minutes. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from South Carolina.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMPSON] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I offered this amendment here at the time the provision was pending to strike out all allowance for mileage in the bill and substitute in lieu of mileage a provision allowing actual expenses of the Representative and dependent members of his family. Now, I did that, Mr. Chairman, because I do not believe that the provision of the committee allowing actual expenses of Members and dependent members of their families will save anything to the people of the country in the way of mileage, because it opens up an avenue whereby a Member can bring his wife, and if he has been married a second time he can bring his step-children, he can bring his cousins, his uncles, and his aunts, and his grandchildren, and everybody who lives with him, to Washington, and charge it up under the provision here to the Government. I think we ought to leave it as it is if we are going to allow anything or we ought to repeal it entirely—one of the two.

Now, I am in favor of cutting off all mileage and I am not in favor of allowing actual expenses to Members and the dependent members of their families in lieu of mileage. If the salary of a Congressman is not sufficient pay, I know of no law which compels a man to accept a nomination for Congress or compels him to serve after he is nominated if he chooses not to do so. I have an idea that this amendment of mine will be voted down here; but if I can, I give notice we will have a roll call in the House, where a record can be made. Mr. Chairman, we go on from year to year increasing the number of employees of the Government, increasing their pay, increasing the allowance to ourselves, and increasing the taxes of the people. Then we go out before the people and talk about economy. We ought to live up to our professions. We increase the pay of Government officials in the face of the fact that the people are struggling for existence and are burdened with debt. We will be met all through this bill with propositions and amendments to increase the pay of clerks and employees who are not resigning because the pay is too small. We forget the thousands of barefooted girls and boys who are working to pay the increase.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. I will.

Mr. GOOD. I wish to say that I think the gentleman is in error. I think the Chairman has already sustained the point of order on the provision of which the gentleman is complaining.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. I understand that; but I wanted to vote on it.

Mr. Chairman, we denounced the Republicans in our Baltimore platform for extravagance. Our platform contains this provision:

> We denounce the profligate waste of the money wrung from the people by oppressive taxation through the lavish appropriations of recent Republican Congresses, which have kept taxes high and reduced the purchasing power of the people's toil. We demand the return to that simplicity and economy which befits a democratic government and a reduction in the number of useless offices, the salaries of which drain the substance of the people.

There is not a Member of this House who did not during his campaign dwell on Republican extravagance and tell the people how enormously the pay roll had been increased during Republican administrations.

In 1816 there were 6,327 persons on the Federal pay roll; in 1863 this number had increased to 49,212, less than a thousand a year during that half century of Democratic rule. In 1871 it had increased to 53,912, and in 1881 to 107,095; in 1899 it had increased to 208,215, and 1909 it had increased to 370,065, a little more than 16,000 per year during the decade from 1899 to 1909. In 1913, according to the official register of the United States, the number of employees on the Federal pay roll had increased to 470,015, or, in round numbers, 100,000, lacking 50, during the four years from 1909 to 1913—an increase of 25,000 per year.

No wonder the Democrats, in their Baltimore platform, cried out and called the attention of the people of this country to the enormous increase in useless employees and the expense in sustaining this large number of useless employees burdened upon the taxpayers of this country. Did we speak sincerely when we declared in the concluding paragraph of our Baltimore platform:

Our platform is one of principle, which we believe to be essential to our national welfare. Our pledges are made to be kept when in office, as well as relied upon during the campaign, and we invite the cooperation of all citizens, regardless of party, who believe in maintaining unimpaired the institutions and traditions of our country.

The appropriations estimated, and which will probably be made by this Congress, will exceed a billion dollars. Indeed, it is prophesied that they will amount to the enormous sum of eleven hundred millions of dollars—the greatest in the history of the country. I voted against the appropriation carrying nearly $12,000,000 to support the District of Columbia. I voted against the appropriation of $42,000,000 for river and harbor improvement, and I tried to get a roll call on the adoption of that bill, but without success. I voted against the appropriations to erect fortifications; and I shall continue to vote against all of these enormous expenditures that are unnecessary, and which are largely made up of items which, in my judgment, are appropriated to support a useless army of useless employees.

There is already agitation going on among these employees in favor of the enactment of a law that will retire them on a pension after they have served a certain number of years and reached a given age. I am opposed to this. If we are going to pension people who have reached an old age, we ought to go into the country, outside of the Government employees, and hunt up the old men and old women who have toiled during their long lives to pay the taxes that go toward the support of this Government, and who are dying in poverty, and pension them. If these employees who are drawing good salaries are not satisfied with the salary they receive, I know of no statutory provision that prohibits them from resigning from their office and turning it over to some other person. On the contrary, the men and women of this country outside the Government service toil to support it in time of peace and fight its battles in time of war, and when old age and sickness come upon them they are left to die in poorhouses and in poverty. The Government employees are here, and they can come before Congress and make their appeals. The old, decrepit men and women of our country, who have spent their lives in its service, are not able to come here and present their case; and I for one am unwilling to leave them neglected while those who have received a good salary all their lives are permitted to retire in their old age and live on a Government pension.

We ought not to be surprised at the unrest and complaint that exists all over this country about our conduct here when we vote in favor of indirectly increasing our salary by allowing mileage or expenses and when we vote to increase the pay of the clerks allowed us by law, when those clerks, in a large number of cases, are our own sons or daughters or relatives.

I shall vote against all such increase, and hope that when we get back into the House we may be able to get a roll call so that the people of the country can know how every man stands on these questions.

Mr. Chairman, I have spent more than the mileage that I was allowed in coming and going to and from my home in Oklahoma to Washington. In the first place, I brought my family with me; and, in the second place, I have made three trips back and forth. I do not believe, however, that the Government is responsible for my having a family or that my journeys back and forth on private business should be charged and collected from the Public Treasury. I have also paid out a sum largely in excess of the amount allowed me for clerk hire, but the Government is not responsible for this. I do not think a man should seek office that he may grow rich out of the salary. I desire the office to which the people of Oklahoma elected me because I believe I can be of some service to them, and I would rather have their approval than all the money in the United States Treasury.

The pay we receive and the clerk hire allowed is sufficient, and I would resign before I will vote to increase either.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. MADDEN. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 68, noes 27.

So the substitute was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment as a substitute.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee again divided; and there were—ayes 26, noes 66.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were refused.

So the amendment as a substitute was rejected.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MURDOCK. Has the Madden amendment been adopted?

The CHAIRMAN. It has not.

Mr. MURDOCK. I just wanted to know. [Laughter.]

Mr. FESS. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FESS. The Chair sustained the point of order against those lines from 11 to 21, did he not?

The CHAIRMAN. He did.

Mr. FESS. And they go out of the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. FESS. There was not anything substituted for the paragraph, was there?

The CHAIRMAN. No, sir; nothing.

Mr. FESS. What is the status of the mileage proposition now?

The CHAIRMAN. There is appropriated for mileage for Senators $51,000.

Mr. FESS. How much for the House?

The CHAIRMAN. We have not reached that portion of it, so the Chair can not tell the gentleman. The Clerk will read.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I offer a new paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] offers an amendment as a new paragraph, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert as a new paragraph, after line 19, stricken out, the following:

"That whenever a vacancy occurs in either House of Congress, by death or otherwise, of any Member or Delegate elected thereto, after the commencement of the Congress to which he has been elected, the person elected to fill it shall be compensated and paid from the time that his credentials in due form of law have been filed with the Clerk of the Senate, if elected to the Senate, or with the Clerk of the House, if elected to the House."

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against that amendment at this place, because it is not germane.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Will the gentleman reserve his point of order?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. One moment. We are now dealing with the Senate. There is already a law as to Senators. They receive compensation from the time of the presentation of their credentials. That has not been the practice in regard to the House. But the gentleman's amendment is not germane at this point.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that the point of order is well taken. The amendment is not germane at this point in the bill. The Clerk will read.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I wanted the gentleman to withhold his point for a moment until I could be heard.

The Clerk read as follows:

Clerks and messengers to the following committees: Additional Accommodations for the Library of Congress—clerk $2,220, messenger $1,440; Agriculture and Forestry—clerk $2,500, assistant clerk $1,800, messenger $1,440; Appropriations—clerk $4,000, two assistant clerks at $2,500 each, two assistant clerks at $1,440 each, messenger $1,440, laborer $720; to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate—clerk $2,500, messenger $1,440, messenger $1,200; Canadian Relations—clerk $2,220, messenger $1,440, messenger $1,200; Census—clerk $2,220, assistant clerk $1,200, messenger $1,440; Civil Service and Retrenchment—clerk $2,220, messenger $1,440, messenger $1,200; Claims—clerk $2,500, assistant clerk $2,000, assistant clerk $1,440, messenger $1,200; Coast and Insular Survey—clerk $2,220, messenger $1,440; Coast Defenses—clerk $2,220, assistant clerk $1,440, messenger $1,200; Commerce—clerk $2,500, assistant clerk $1,800, messenger $1,440; Conference Minority of the Senate—clerk $2,220, assistant clerk $1,800, messenger $1,200; Conservation of National Resources—clerk $2,220, assistant clerk $1,200, messenger $1,440; Corporations Organized in the District of Columbia—clerk $2,220, messenger $1,440; Disposition of Useless Papers in the Executive Departments—clerk, $2,220, messenger $1,440; District of Columbia—clerk $2,500, assistant clerk $1,800, messenger $1,440; Education and Labor—clerk $2,220, assistant clerk $1,440, messenger $1,200; Engrossed Bills—clerk $2,220, messenger $1,440; Enrolled Bills—clerk $2,220, assistant clerk $1,440; To Examine the Several Branches of the Civil Service—clerk $2,220, messenger $1,440; Expenditures in the Department of Agriculture—

clerk $2,220, messenger $1,440; Expenditures in the Departments of Commerce and Labor—clerk $2,220, messenger $1,440; Expenditures in the Interior Department—clerk $2,220, messenger $1,440, messenger $1,200; Expenditures in the Department of Justice—clerk $2,220, assistant clerk $1,440, messenger $1,440; Expenditures in the Navy Department—clerk $2,220, messenger $1,440, messenger $1,200; Expenditures in the Post Office Department—clerk $2,220, messenger $1,440, messenger $1,200; Expenditures in the Department of State—clerk $2,220, messenger $1,440; Expenditures in the Treasury Department—clerk $2,220, messenger $1,440, messenger $1,200; Expenditures in the War Department—clerk $2,220, messenger $1,440, messenger $1,200; Finance—clerk and stenographer $3,000, assistant clerk $2,220, assistant clerk $1,600, assistant clerk $1,440, messenger $1,440; Fisheries—clerk $2,220, assistant clerk $1,440, messenger $1,440; Five Civilized Tribes of Indians—clerk $2,220, messenger $1,440; Foreign Relations—clerk $2,500, assistant clerk $2,220, messenger $1,440; Forest Reservations and Protection of Game—clerk $2,220, messenger $1,440; Geological Survey—clerk $2,220, messenger $1,440; Immigration—clerk $2,220, assistant clerk $1,800, messenger $1,440; Indian Affairs—clerk $2,500, assistant clerk $1,440, messenger $1,440; Indian Depredations—clerk $2,220, messenger $1,440; Industrial Expositions—clerk $2,220, messenger $1,440, messenger $1,200; Interoceanic Canals—clerk $2,220, assistant clerk $1,440, messenger $1,200; Interstate Commerce—clerk $2,500, two assistant clerks at $1,800 each, messenger $1,440; To Investigate Trespassers on Indian Lands—clerk $2,220, messenger $1,440; Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands—clerk $2,220, messenger $1,440, messenger $1,200; Judiciary—clerk $2,500, assistant clerk $2,220, two assistant clerks at $1,800 each, messenger $1,440; Joint Committee on the Library—clerk $2,500, assistant clerk $1,440, messenger $1,200; Manufactures—clerk $2,500, assistant clerk $1,440, messenger $1,440; Military Affairs—clerk $2,500, assistant clerk $2,220, assistant clerk $1,440, messenger $1,200; Mines and Mining—clerk $2,220, messenger $1,440, messenger $1,200; Mississippi River and its Tributaries—clerk $2,220, messenger $1,440; National Banks—clerk $2,220, messenger $1,440; Naval Affairs—clerk $2,500, assistant clerk $1,440, messenger $1,440; Pacific Islands and Porto Rico—clerk $2,220, assistant clerk $1,800, messenger $1,440; Pacific Railroads—clerk $2,220, messenger $1,440; Patents—clerk $2,220, messenger $1,440, messenger $1,200; Pensions—clerk $2,500, assistant clerk $1,800, three assistant clerks at $1,440 each, messenger $1,440; Philippines—clerk $2,220, assistant clerk $1,800, messenger $1,440; Post Offices and Post Roads—clerk $2,500, three assistant clerks at $1,440 each, messenger $1,440; clerk of printing records $2,220, assistant clerk $1,800, messenger $1,440; Private Land Claims—clerk $2,220, assistant clerk $1,800; Privileges and Elections—clerk $2,220, assistant clerk $1,440, messenger $1,440; Public Buildings and Grounds—clerk $2,500, assistant clerk $1,440, messenger $1,440; Public Health and National Quarantine—clerk $2,220, assistant clerk $1,440; Public Lands—clerk $2,500, assistant clerk $1,800, messenger $1,440; Railroads—clerks $2,220, messenger $1,440; Revolutionary Claims—clerk $2,220, messenger $1,440; Rules—clerk $2,220, assistant clerk $1,800, messenger $1,440; Standards, Weights, and Measures—clerk $2,220, messenger $1,440; Territories—clerk $2,220, assistant clerk $1,440, messenger $1,440; Transportation and Sale of Meat Products—clerk $2,220, messenger $1,440; Transportation Routes to the Seaboard—clerk $2,220, messenger $1,440; University of the United States—clerk $2,220, messenger $1,440; Woman Suffrage—clerk, $2,220, messenger $1,440; in all, $364,640.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. FOWLER. I do so for the purpose of getting a little information on this long paragraph. On page 5, line 8, I find an item for a clerk to the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Commerce and Labor. I wanted to know if that term, "Expenditures in the Department of Commerce and Labor" is really carried now?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. That is provided for by law. In order to save time and to let the committee know the facts in regard to the appropriation for the employees of the Senate, I will say there is nobody appropriated for in the bill now before the committee except such as are now provided for by law. They did ask for some increases, but we did not put the increased force in the bill. They asked some reductions, and we very cheerfully granted them.

Mr. FOWLER. Yes. I am not complaining of your bill at all, but of the term "Department of Commerce and Labor"——

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. That is a committee in the Senate.

Mr. FOWLER. I understand that it refers to a committee, but I was harboring the feeling that certainly they would not carry that term now after the two departments had been separated.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. That is true; but that committee still exists in the Senate, and the law provides that it shall have certain clerks.

Mr. FOWLER. Certainly. That was the object of my inquiry, to know whether they still carried that term in the Senate.

Now, on page 7, line 24, at the bottom, there is a provision for a clerk to the Committee on the University of the United States. I would like to know just what "the University of the United States" is?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. It has not been built yet.

Mr. FOSTER. They are just talking about it.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. There are certain gentlemen who are anxious that it should be built, and they are talking about it in the Senate.

Mr. MURDOCK. It was proposed by George Washington, was it not?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. FOWLER. Have they done anything?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I am not advised as to the activities of that committee.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The same question might be asked with reference to other committees in the Senate. [Laughter.]

Mr. FOWLER. I know; but I think that this is as useless as a sidesaddle on a hog. [Laughter.]

Mr. WALTERS. There are two jobs there—a clerk and a messenger. [Laughter.]

Mr. FOWLER. I know; but I do not want to be extravagant. I never heard of this committee doing anything, and I do not know of anything it can do except to draw salaries for clerks. I wanted to know of the distinguished gentleman from South Carolina if he had made any inquiry of the Senate with respect to the Committee on the University of the United States, as to whether they intended to do anything or were trying to do anything?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. "The gentleman from South Carolina" has enough work of his own without looking after that.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOWLER. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. Has the gentleman ever read the enlightening speech made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] on the National University?

Mr. FOWLER. I listened to that speech, I think, one day in the House with a great deal of interest; but this committee has never been influenced, as I understand, by that magnificent speech. If the gentleman will take the responsibility of saying that he has put some life into it, some activity into it, and show some results, I will withdraw my inquiry.

Mr. FOSTER. Perhaps he is the first gentleman who has made a speech on the subject since the committee was appointed.

Mr. FOWLER. He is the first Member who has given any encouragement to it.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; and we ought to encourage the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. BRYAN. Perhaps the committee is trying to digest that speech. [Laughter.]

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOWLER. Yes; I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. FESS. It is really a correction I wish to make. I will state to my colleague, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER], that I never had the honor of making a speech in Congress on that subject, but the gentleman probably did me the honor of reading a statement I had made concerning it, and I hope that will be read at the other end of this building.

Mr. FOWLER. If the committee is doing anything, or will do anything, for the education of the people of this country, I have no objection; but it certainly has been long enough there to have done something if it could do anything.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] moves to strike out the last two words.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to say to the Members of the House that, as I recall it, this National University Committee was created in 1890 on the suggestion of Senator Edmunds. That committee has made several reports, recommending, usually by unanimous reports, the establishment of a national university here in this city, and I trust there will be no interference with the revival of the interest in this particular proposition, as is suggested by the bill that has been introduced by Senator DILLINGHAM, which is now before this committee of the Senate, and which, I think, is there receiving very considerate attention.

On this side of the Chamber we have been going into this matter, and I hope that some day this membership will do me the honor of giving me an opportunity to say why I think the next greatest step that this Congress could take would be to make it possible to gather in this Capital City, the greatest scientific center now in the world, the finest group of scholars and research workers that could be found in the world. This is a thing I am most concerned about.

Mr. FOWLER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FESS. Very gladly.

Mr. FOWLER. Is it not a fact that the great universities of the world are not in capital cities as a rule?

Mr. FESS. The great university in Germany, probably the greatest in the world, is in the capital city of Germany, and the greatest university of France, the next greatest university of the world, is in the capital city of France. But the great universities of England are not in the capital city. We want the greatest university not only in this country but in the world in our Capital City here.

Mr. FOWLER. Is it not a fact that there was an effort to give some strength and dignity to a university in the Capital City of our country by naming it "George Washington University"; and is it not a further fact that it has never grown to any prominence or recognition?

Mr. FESS. There was an attempt, I will say to the gentleman, to give to an existing university that name; but, Mr. Chairman, may I state to the membership of this House that here in this city can be found in the way of laboratories, of exchanges, of bureaus, and other establishments if attempted to be duplicated by any great university for laboratory work would require such an outlay of money that no university in the world outside of a Government-aided institution could do it.

No private institution can do it; not even the princely-endowed institutions, such as Harvard, Columbia, Chicago, and Stanford. No institution could duplicate it. It could not do it short of an endowment of $100,000,000. No university could do it; and I hope that some time this membership will give a sympathetic hearing to the proposed organization, correlation, and coordination of these rare establishments in this city belonging to us, to open them for the purpose of research work that would attract not alone students in our country, but students from all the world. And when our universities give to their professors at periodic times a year's leave of absence to pursue their studies, they would not need to go to Berlin or to Paris or to any foreign country for advanced study, but they could come to Washington—this great center, the richest and rarest in the world for purposes of this kind—and we would gather here the rarest group of scholars to be found anywhere else in the world. I would be willing to give the best effort of my life, no matter how long it would take, if I could but bring a sympathetic recognition on the part of this House of such a marvelous opportunity as this proposed organization of the existent elements of a national university now awaiting organization. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, of the many national inconsistencies noticed in our history the most striking, and most difficult to explain, is the Nation's treatment of Washington's desires for the establishment in the Capital of a national university. Any cursory reading of his letters and papers, private and public, will indicate his insistence upon such a consummation. He made it a specific item of recommendation at different times in his messages to Congress. He communicated his views in writing to such men as Randolph, Hamilton, and Jefferson, members of his Cabinet. He made specific recommendations to State officials of Virginia, including Gov. Brooke, in 1795; he solemnly urged it in his Farewell Address in 1796, and in the same year he communicated his wish to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, even going so far as to indicate his willingness to set aside a fund for its establishment, and to specify the probable site of the plant.

Before his death he had the indorsement of most public men inside and outside of the two Houses of Congress. In 1799 his will contained a bequest of 50 shares ($500 each) of Potomac stock for the beginning.

His scheme was most heartily indorsed in official capacity by John Adams, Thomas Jefferson, James Madison, James Monroe, J. Q. Adams, and Andrew Jackson. Jefferson, one of the country's earliest patrons of education, even went to the extent of proposing to Gen. Washington the transplating of a European college, faculty and all, as an early step in the enterprise.

The appearance near the forties of sectional differences and the expression of the fear of too much centralization caused the friends of the enterprise to rest. In the forties and fifties much talk and some efforts were active in building such an institution at Albany, N. Y. The Civil War further shut out interest in the Washington project.

Interest was finally revived in 1869 by John W. Hoyt, who had made a tour of careful inspection of the European institutions of higher learning. The merits of Commissioner Hoyt's efforts lie in his effective work in creating a favorable impression among educators of the country. The results of his propaganda were noticed in the interest of the National Teachers' Association. At its annual meeting in 1869, held at Trenton, N. J., the association adopted a resolution offered by A. J. Rickoff, of Ohio, committing the association to the project. It also appointed a committee of 35, representing all parts of the Union, and all the liberal as well as business professions, and upon which appear the names of Rickoff, of Ohio, and Wickersham, of Pennsylvania. From that day to this this great association has stood committed to the consummation of the great undertaking. Of all its many great heads not one has rendered more valiant service than its present head, President Swain, of Swarthmore College.

It was largely through this body, ably seconded by numerous great scholars in college and university circles, that there was won support of such men as Senator Charles Sumner, T. O. Howe, J. W. Patterson, M. H. Carpenter, J. J. Ingalls, W. B. Allison, L. Q. C. Lamar, A. H. Garland, and many others. Through the influence of these men a bill was introduced in both Houses of Congress in 1872. By this time the propaganda was winning the support of the most of the college heads of the country. One very important exception was President Charles W. Eliot. In 1873 President Grant made the university proposition an item of favorable recommendation in his annual message. The National Education Association continued by resolution and addresses to keep the matter before the public. President Hayes indorsed the project in 1878. L. Q. C. Lamar, Secretary of the Interior under Cleveland, called the attention of the country to the neglect in his report to the President. In 1890 the Senate created a special standing committee, to be known as the National University Committee, which is still in existence, although quite dormant. The National Association of State University Presidents, representing all the State universities of the Nation, is also another significant association backing the movement.

Looking over the activities working for this consummation, one is bewildered over the fact that in the face of it all there is nothing accomplished by the Government.

Note the factors:

1. Urged by Washington.
2. Seconded by at least 10 of his successors.
3. Supported by at least half a dozen justices of the Supreme Court, including Chief Justices Jay, Rutledge, Marshall, and Chase.
4. Formally recommended by at least 20 Cabinet ministers, among them the most brilliant lights of our Nation.
5. Formal support by the heads of both the Army and Navy.
6. Enthusiastic advocacy of the heads of colleges and universities, at least 400 of them, including Johns Hopkins, Chicago, Leland Stanford, and Cornell.
7. Almost unanimous indorsement of both the scholars and learned associations of the country.
8. Advocacy by the leading clergymen of the country.
9. Advocacy of the public-school men and women in the country.
10. Support of various women's organizations of the land.
11. Warm support at different times of the Senate as a body.

This array of advocates would seem enough to enact any law that had an element of merit in it.

This support is based upon the following facts:

Notwithstanding the galaxy of American higher-educational institutions, its colleges, universities, and technical institutions, many of which stand very high educationally, the country does not have a university in the true sense.

In every American institution, however good, the chief work, the mass of students, the large proportion of teaching force, the major use of laboratories, and so forth, are devoted to undergraduate work, to college rather than university work. We have no single institution devoted to the sort of work chiefly done by the Berlin University.

What we must have in Washington is an institution to multiply, to develop scholarship; not to teach learners, but to produce research workers; not so much to disseminate knowledge already known, but to cultivate the power to find what is yet unknown.

Such an institution will not interfere with nor supersede the hundreds of institutions already existing, but it will supplement them, as it will indeed depend upon them for its supply of students seeking the rank of special experts. Instead of weakening the existent university or college, like the multiplied collective strand, it gains all its strength from a combination of all without weakening any one. Such an institution will not compete by duplicating simply because entrance here will not be allowed to anyone who has not, in at least some line, reached the rank of a degree from the standardized institutions. This instead of crippling the existent university will be a spur to improve its work and maintain its standard. While it will largely depend for material upon the hundreds of institutions of higher learning, it will in turn substantially assist them by returning to them at divers times the best-trained investigators in the world to fill up their teaching force. This institution will hold a relation to the people of the States that is not now known by any institution in the country. It will be looked upon by our citizens with that sense of ownership with which we look upon our National Capital. It will be in a unique sense our university, and will develop the sense of pride and support not now felt by any institution. It will thus be sought by all our ambitious men as they pass from university to the more specialized field of expert investigation. Graduate, as well as professor, who may be desired for some special work now and then, will look toward it. It will thus divert the flow of American students from Berlin, Paris, Oxford, Jena, and Vienna to Washington.

Not only this, but it will most certainly become the most metropolitan institution, patronized by the largest groups of European students as well as students from all other progressive countries in the world. The records of immigration to America for the past 50 years are conclusive of this statement. There is no doubt that the reflex influence of such an institution in which these advanced thinkers of the world will be submerged in an atmosphere of freedom and self-government is beyond our comprehension. In these days of armament, when the fear of war is causing all nations insanely to impoverish themselves in building up a defensive foundation, it would not be chimerical to say that a national university filled with the investigators from the warlike countries would be a surer defense than battleships, for such an institution will further and complete our university affiliations begun by President Harper by which exchanges are made between professors. We can send a professor for a year to each of the great national universities in Europe in exchange for one from each university there. Such an amicable association between the great thinkers of this and European countries would insure a better understanding of each.

There can not be serious doubt of the effect of such a national university upon scholarship in our own country. Washington long ago had come to be one of the greatest scientific centers of the earth. Here are assembled the most remarkable collections in the way of scientific material known to the scientific world. Here the various departments of scientific investigation, headed by the world's best experts, aided by a group of trained workers, with separate laboratories and experimental facilities, run up into the hundreds. Here also are domiciled almost a score of associations devoted to the investigations of truth in various spheres. These make Washington attractive to the scholar of all countries. Many of the societies that are not domiciled here hold their annual meeting at the Capital.

If anyone should doubt the wisdom of the establishment of such an institution upon the ground that we do not need it, or upon the ground of expense, or of corrupt control, or upon any other ground, a complete answer is the Smithsonian Institution. This institution, established in 1846 with a $500,000 bequest, has proved itself to be one of the most successful in the advancement of knowledge. To-day it is well housed in buildings worth at least as much as the original gift, and it has accumulated collections of books and manuscripts by the simple method of Government exchange, with slight cost to anyone of an amount beyond the original gift. Besides this, here under such men as Henry Baird, Powell, Newcomb, Goode, Langley, and others, have grown up these rare agencies of advancement in useful knowledge. Here was where telegraphy was perfected and then turned over to the Government. Research on the lines of climate, meteorology, and so forth, was conducted by these leaders of science and was finally allowed to grow under governmental agencies into the present Weather Bureau. Under the direction of Prof. Baird investigations of life in the sea, with special relation to fish purely in a scientific interest, grew into the Government Fish Commission, now so important as an agency under experts attempting to find the secret that will enable the race to multiply and thus supply needed food from the wastes of ocean waters. Other important governmental agencies had their beginnings here. The Congressional Library, America's greatest collection of books, rare and otherwise, housed in the world's most beautiful building, was started in the same way by the same institution.

In view of such results flowing from this single establishment, well may we ask, what is the possibility of a national university under a similar management with means multiplied and a field unlimited? Even to-day there exists in the Capital the university, only awaiting organization, housing, and research students. Probably in no one place in the world is there such a rare and numerous aggregation of material for laboratory use as in Washington. Located in various parts of the city are museums, bureaus, observatories, exchanges, laboratories, etc., any one of which is not to be found in equal richness of material in any place in the country. The Agricultural Department alone is a good example. Here in one department of investigation are found: (a) The Weather Bureau, with almost a score of experts at work; (b) the Bureau of Animal Industry, with over a dozen experts; (c) the Bureau of Plant Industry, with nearly 40 experts; (d) the Forest Reserve, with about 30 experts; (e) the Bureau of Chemistry, with at least 35 experts; (f) Bureau of Soils, with 7 experts; (g) the Bureau of Entomology, with more than a dozen experts; (h) the Bureau of Biological Survey, with a half dozen experts; besides experts from 6 to 15 in charge of separate Bureaus of Accounts and Disbursements, Publications, Statistics, Library, Experiment Stations, and Public Roads. This last is the youngest of dozens of research foundations here in the Capital which fitly represent the scientific operations of the Government. There is scarcely a single field of expert investigation that is not well worked here, and by the world's greatest experts, and with the highest results. The annual reports of these various bureaus, that number in the hundreds, would make a library. The monetary value represented will reach at least $40,000,000. To operate them requires about $5,000,000 a year. The experts employed, and those elsewhere affiliated with the work here, will number into the hundreds.

The new discoveries announced from time to time are world-wide in import, and some of them revolutionize scientific knowledge. Air navigation will be solved by governmental investigation. The Panama Canal was made possible by governmental engineering skill. Yellow fever was annihilated by a Government expert. Probably more useful applications of scientific knowledge have been perfected in Washington than in any other place in the world.

Those who yearn for the establishment of a national university are moved by the easy possibility of utilizing these unequaled resources for stimulating wide-awake students of research to new fields of discovery. Not to disseminate knowledge already known, but to aid in finding knowledge not yet known—that is the function of a national university. The various State, denominational, and independent institutions are to supply the graduate students, and the Government must open to them these rich fields—laboratories, museums, observatories, and so forth—for further investigation and discovery.

Scholarships may be supplied representing from $500 to $2,500 annually. These can be employed by the student, so cooperating with the Government, that the student can work part time and investigate part time as is done in some cities where college and vocation are affiliated. In this way the civil service can be raised, and at the same time ambitious learners can continue the work of discovery. It will mean economy and efficiency in Government service and employment and education of research men and women. It would be difficult to estimate the possibilities of such an establishment. This is not chimerical, but most rational. It but awaits the shaping hand.

Congress should at once authorize the President to appoint a board of control with power to select sites. To be effective it should make an ample appropriation. The university organization need not be difficult, but it must attempt to be representative without losing efficiency. There is no need to fear political control, since such an aggregation of scholarship as is contemplated would elevate it above even the hint of party bias. Indeed, such an association of men of the type, for example, of President Wilson would be proof against cheap political influence, and would be most salutary in elevating the political tone of the Capital. It would at once appeal to men of great means, which would make it easy for the small contribution of Gen. Washington to be increased into the hundred-million figure.

I doubt not that in a brief time such an institution would be the most intellectual center in the world. It would surpass the universities of Paris and Berlin in every phase. If limited to graduate work, whether it granted degrees or not—probably not—and taking its material from the more than 400 institutions of higher learning—not duplicating their work, but supplementing it—it will be the culmination of a structure with its supports in every institution in the various States, all of which will look to it as their own goal; and it will easily become a center of research unlike anything known to man.

This possibility has awakened the intellectual interests of our country. It is the explanation of the enthusiastic support of the National Educational Association, the Association of State University Presidents, various philosophic and scientific associations, the clergy of the country, the committee of 400 representing the best thought and action in America, and the support of the Senate and House committees, and at three different times by favorable action of the Senate as a body. Political indifference, party jealousy, and fear, together with unwillingness to inaugurate a movement that must be perpetual, are the explanation of no definite action by Congress. Believing the time for successful action was at hand, I introduced a bill looking to the establishment of this institution, which I desire to insert:

A bill (H. R. 11749) to create a national university at the seat of the Federal Government.

Be it enacted, etc., That there shall be established at the seat of the Federal Government of the United States an institution of higher learning, to be known as the National University of the United States.

SEC. 2. That the purpose of said university shall be threefold.

First. To promote the advance of science, pure and applied, and of the liberal and fine arts by original investigation and research and by such other means as may appear suitable to the purpose in view.

Second. To provide for the higher instruction and training of men and women for posts of importance and responsibility in the public service of State or Nation, and for the practice of such callings and professions as may require for their worthy pursuit a higher training.

Third. To cooperate with the scientific departments of the Federal Government, with the colleges of agriculture and the mechanic arts founded upon the proceeds of the Federal land grant of the act of 1862, with the State universities, and with other institutions of higher learning.

SEC. 3. That no student shall be admitted to the university unless he shall have obtained the degree of master of science or of master of arts from some institution of recognized standing, or shall have pursued a course of study equivalent to that required for such degrees.

SEC. 4. That the university shall confer no academic degrees.

SEC. 5. That the university shall be governed and directed by a board of trustees in cooperation with an advisory council.

SEC. 6. That the board of trustees shall consist of the Commissioner of Education of the United States and 12 additional members appointed by the President of the United States for a term of 12 years. The appointed members shall be arranged in classes, so that the term of one member shall expire each year. The President of the United States may at any time remove any member of the board for neglect of duty or malfeasance in office.

SEC. 7. That the advisory council shall consist of one representative from each State in the Union. The representative from each State shall be the president or acting president of the State university in case there be a State university in said State; if not, the governor of the State may appoint a citizen of the State learned and experienced in matters of education to represent said State in the advisory council.

SEC. 8. That the board of trustees shall make all statutes, by-laws, and general rules in accordance with which the affairs of the university shall be conducted. But all such statutes, by-laws, and general rules shall, before going into effect, be submitted to the advisory council for its consideration. If the advisory council shall, by a majority vote of all the qualified members, disapprove of any such statute, by-law, or general rule, it shall not go into effect until it shall have been reenacted by a two-thirds vote of the board of trustees: Provided, That if the advisory council shall take no action within six months after submission of such statute, by-law, or general rule, the said statute, by-law, or general rule shall go into effect: Provided further, That the advisory council may at any time take up the consideration of such statute, by-law, or general rule, and if it disapprove of the same, the said statute, by-law, or general rule shall cease to be in effect from and after six months from the date of such action, unless the board of trustees shall in the meantime have reenacted such statute, by-law, or general rule by a two-thirds vote: And provided further, That in case the advisory council shall disapprove of any statute or other action of the board of trustees the said board shall, before taking final action in the premises, give a formal hearing to a representative or representatives appointed by the council for the purpose of presenting the matter to the consideration of the board.

SEC. 9. That the board of trustees shall provide for the administration of the affairs of the university within the statutes thus enacted. It shall make all appointments and all assignments of funds. It shall issue all orders and instructions necessary to the management of the university. It shall provide suitable grounds and buildings for the work of said university; but in no case shall it incur financial obligations in excess of actual appropriation by Congress, or of actual income from tuition, fees, endowments, or gifts for special purposes. The actual administration of the university shall be intrusted to properly qualified agents of the board, who shall be responsible to the board for the performance of their duties. The board may delegate by statute to a president of the university or to such separate faculties or other officers or employees as it may provide for such functions in the administration of the university as may seem to it wise; and it may reassign such functions at any time. It may create such boards or commissions as in its judgment may best serve the interest of the institution and may abolish them at will. But the advisory council may at any time protest against any order, vote, resolution, appointment, appropriation, or instruction made by the board of trustees. In such case said order, vote, resolution, and so forth, shall stand suspended until the board of trustees shall, by a two-thirds vote, reenact such order, and so forth.

SEC. 10. That the advisory council may at any time make recommendations to the board of trustees respecting any matter concerning the university, and it shall be the duty of the board of trustees to give formal consideration to all such recommendations and to take such action in the premises as may seem to it good.

SEC. 11. That no member of the board of trustees or of the advisory council shall receive any pecuniary remuneration for his services as member of said board of trustees or advisory council; but the necessary expenses incurred by members in attendance upon meetings of said board or advisory council shall be defrayed by the university.

SEC. 12. That the board of trustees and the advisory council shall elect their own officers and define their respective duties, and a majority of each shall constitute a quorum to do business.

SEC. 13. That the board of trustees shall meet in regular session four times each year, namely, on the first Wednesday after the first Monday in January, April, July, and October. Special meetings may be called at any time by the chairman, and shall be called by him on request of five members of said board. One month's notice shall be given in case of all special meetings. The advisory council shall hold two regular meetings in each year, during or immediately following the regular meetings of the board of trustees in January and July. Special meetings may be called by the board of trustees, by the chairman of the advisory council, or upon the request of 10 members of the advisory council. One month's notice of all special meetings shall be given.

SEC. 14 That the board of trustees may accept unconditional gifts, legacies, donations, etc., from private individuals for the benefit of the university; but no such gift, donation, or legacy shall be accepted with any condition unless the same shall be approved by the board of trustees, the advisory council, and the Congress of the United States.

SEC. 15. That the various museums, libraries, bureaus, observatories, and departments of expert research belonging to the Federal Government shall be open for the use of graduate students without interference with the real function of such establishments.

SEC. 16. That the sum of $500,000 is hereby appropriated for the uses of said university for the fiscal years 1914 and 1915.

SEC. 17. That the board of trustees shall, as soon as the members shall have been appointed, proceed to organize under this act and carry out the intent and purpose of the same.

This bill provides that there shall be established in the District of Columbia an institution of higher learning to be known as the National University of the United States.

Its purpose is to promote the advance of science, pure and applied, and of the liberal and fine arts by original investigation and research, and such other means as may appear suitable to the purpose in view.

Furthermore, to train men and women for posts of responsibility in the public and private service of State and Nation; also to cooperate with the scientific departments of the Federal Government and with the various colleges and universities, public and private, throughout the country. This last purpose is one of the most important. I will append a fuller statement later of this feature.

It is to be a graduate institution. Students will not be admitted until they have secured the degree of bachelor of arts or science at some reputable college in this or other countries or for a full equivalent training.

The ultimate authority in the government of the institution is vested in a board of trustees appointed by the President of the United States; but this board must consult and consider the counsel and advice of a national advisory council consisting of one representative from each State in the Union, this representative to be the president of the State university in those States in which there is a State university, and, in those States where no such institution exists, a person to be appointed by the governor of the State.

This form of organization secures two great advantages. In the first place, it secures the efficiency, economy, promptness, and vigor of administration characteristic of a small board vested with full authority to act.

The advisory council may at any time, however, exert a suspensive veto in such a way that the board must reconsider any action vetoed by the council, but may reaffirm its action by a two-thirds vote in spite of the advice of the council.

The administrative features of the university are to be under a board of control. But suppose the board of trustees should do something that this advisory council, made up of one man from each State, does not agree to. That action can not go into effect until after six months, when this advisory council, made up of one man from each State, shall act. If the advisory council does not ratify what the board of trustees has done, then the board of trustees can override the advisory council by a two-thirds vote, and if they do not get a two-thirds vote the action of the board is annulled.

In this way the board of trustees secures the advice of a national representative body, reflecting the sentiments and opinions of each State of the Union.

The institution is authorized to accept gifts and donations of money or property from any private citizen or public body, provided these gifts be given with no conditions attached for the general purposes of the university. If any money is offered with conditions, it can only be accepted with the consent of the Congress of the United States.

This university will have an organic affiliation with educational institutions of other countries by which we will have the exchange of professorship. It would be difficult to estimate the influence upon a better relationship with all countries of ideas as an organization of this sort located at the capital of the Nation. It would be a far greater insurance against world warfare than battleships.

It goes without saying that such an institution must be free from all characteristics that dominate modern college life. Modern athletics, college spirit, and the consequent police disciplinary features, all proper in their places, will have no place here. Even degrees are not to be sought.

The scope of the work of the university will not interfere with any other institution of higher learning, as it can not duplicate such work. It is not to be an additional university similar to those already established. Such an institution is both unnecessary and undesirable. As Harvard is above Antioch because of its wider scope and greater equipment, so the national university must be above Harvard. As the college feeds the university in America, so the college and university must feed the national university. The latter can not interfere with the former, but must largely depend upon them.

For the same reason the national university can not interfere with either local or denominational institutions, but will be a substantial advantage to them. The national university is to be the climax of American educational structure, beginning with the kindergarten and ending in this consummation. It is the virtual assembling of the country's richest material found in this greatest center of scientific activity of the world by opening it to the research graduates under the direction of the finest group of experts in the world.

It is really using in a systematic way the material of a great university awaiting organization.

It will not interfere with the valuable work of the experts here, but will be an assistance. No doubt there will be found in the groups of students men who will far surpass their directors in the years to come. When Sir Humphrey Davy was asked his greatest discovery he instantly replied, "Michael Faraday" (his student). When John Adams was asked what was his greatest service to the Nation he replied, "John Marshall," the great Chief Justice. So it will be here. The greatest work of these governmental experts will not be laws of nature, but rather research men in the realm of the laws of nature, and so forth. Berlin University stands without doubt as the greatest single force in the Empire of Germany. The University of Paris in a less degree has such relation to France.

The national university will not only hold that relation to this country, but in the very best sense it will occupy that relation to all the nations of the world. In the best sense it will become the university of the world. There are more points of cosmopolitan interest in America than in any other country. We do not want the university merely for the sake of preventing our thousands of graduate students going to Berlin for advanced work which they can not get here in our own country. Perhaps it is an advantage in a way to have our advanced thinkers spending time in European centers of learning, but it will answer the objections that they must go or else cease their investigations.

But mainly the university will become the center of graduate work for the advanced students of all the world. In this connection the recent dispatch from South America is significant.

The act carries with it an appropriation of $500,000 for the fiscal year 1914, and provides that the board of trustese shall proceed to organize under this act and carry out the intent and purpose of the same, as soon as the members shall have been appointed by the President.

In this most beautiful Capital of the greatest Nation, with the galaxy of great buildings housing such treasures of art and science, with its many associations representing great learning, the one most significant item of world meanings, the crown of it all is lacking. Somewhere within this center must be located the national university. Should Virginia see fit to re-cede a portion of the District ceded back to her in 1846 and allow the Nation to surmount the open space across the Potomac facing the Capital with a group of buildings to administer in the interest of the advancement of knowledge, it would seem ideal to me.

How about the expense? First, this richest Nation of the world can well afford to support it out of its Treasury. If it would make good the $25,000, the gift of the Father of the County, for the purpose, it would materialize now not less than $4,000,000. If the Nation would be willing to add to this first gift such gifts as may be offered by benefactors, the endowment can be placed easily in the $100,000,000 mark. It would appear that the time is here for us to act and materialize the dream of Gen. Washington, so ardently urged by his successors, Adams, Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, J. Q. Adams, Jackson, and others.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of Sergeant at Arms and Doorkeeper: Sergeant at Arms and Doorkeeper, $6,500; horse and wagon for his use, $420, or so much thereof as may be necessary; Assistant Sergeant at Arms, $2,500; Assistant Doorkeeper, $3,000; Acting Assistant Doorkeeper, $3,000; messengers—4 (acting as assistant doorkeepers) at $1,800 each, 37 at $1,440 each, 2 on the floor of the Senate at $2,000 each, 1 at card door $1,600; clerk on Journal work for CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, to be selected by the official reporters, $2,000; storekeeper, $2,220; upholsterer and locksmith, $1,440; cabinetmaker, $1,200; 3 carpenters, at $1,080 each; janitor, $1,200; skilled laborers—4 at $1,000 each, 1 at $900; laborer in charge of private passage, $840; 3 female attendants in charge of ladies' retiring room, at $720 each; telephone operators—chief at $1,200, 2 at $900 each, night operator $720; telephone page, $720; press gallery—superintendent $1,800; assistant superintendent $1,400; laborers—1 $840, 27 at $720 each; 16 pages for the Senate Chamber, at the rate of $2.50 per day each during the session, $4,600; in all, $133,220.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I am curious to ascertain from the chairman of the Subcommittee on Appropriations the exact method that his committee follows in allowing these appropriations for the Senate. A few moments ago he stated that somebody recommended increases and also decreases, and that the committee allowed the decreases but did not allow the increases. Will the Chairman kindly inform the Committee of the Whole what rule is followed as to these provisions relating to the Senate which we are now considering?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. In answer to the gentleman from Wisconsin, I will say that the estimates for the force of the Senate are made up by the Secretary of the Senate and transmitted through the proper channels to the Committee on Appropriations. Nobody appears for examination before our committee. We are not, therefore, in a position to know whether the new places asked for ought to be granted. Where a man is dropped we never hesitate to make the appropriation accordingly.

When the bill goes to the Senate, all the items that the Secretary of the Senate has sent over to the House, with the estimates, will be put into the bill by the Senate, and in conference the conferees are able to ascertain why this additional force is asked for.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then the committee does not pass at all upon the recommendations for new legislation that the Secretary of the Senate embodies in his estimates.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. No; we do not.

Mr. STAFFORD. For instance, I assume that the gentleman and other members of the committee have noticed the progress made by the Senate in the adoption of an automobile truck and an automobile delivery wagon for the dispatch of its mail matter, an advance which is commendable and which I believe should be adopted by the House. In this paragraph which we are now considering we have included an allowance for horse and wagon of $420, but no provision anywhere in the bill for an automobile truck or an automobile delivery wagon. I assume that when this bill gets over to the Senate and is passed upon by the Committee on Appropriations of that body they will incorporate into the bill these additions that they have recommended to your committee.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. The item now under consideration is the force of the Sergeant at Arms. He does not deliver the mail.

Mr. STAFFORD. I assume that he does not; but in the subsequent paragraphs there is no provision anywhere for automobile trucks or automobile delivery wagons. I was curious to ascertain the cost of that new method of delivering the mail, which certainly expedites the delivery of the Senate mail, as compared with the obsolete method of an old horse and shay in use by the House.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the pro forma amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

More than 30 years ago, when this branch of Congress became Democratic and pledged to economy, it reduced the salaries of the various employees of the House. The Senate refused to permit the reduction of the salaries of its employees, and it finally resulted in the Senate employees retaining their salaries and the House employees receiving reduced salaries. That has been going on now for over 30 years—a discrimination in every one of these legislative appropriation bills we pass in favor of the employees of the Senate as against the employees of the House. How much longer we are going to submit to this injustice to our own employees I do not know. It seems to me that the members of the Committee on Appropriations of the House ought to insist upon the same salaries being paid to corresponding officers in the Senate that are paid in the House, either by a reduction of the Senate employees or a restoration to the former scale of salaries paid prior to the cut of thirty-odd years ago. There ought not to be any reduction, because the cost of living has greatly increased, and there does not seem to be any hope, even in the face of the promise of the Democratic platform—that the cost of living is going to be reduced. So, I submit to the members of the Committee on Appropriations that I hope they will find a time when they will stop discriminating against our employees in the House and insist upon fair play. It is due us that we should not, at every session of Congress, vote here that an employee of the Senate shall receive from one hundred to several hundred dollars more for doing the same kind of work, except doing less of it. And the committee should also take up the question of the attitude in which the membership of this House place themselves by putting a valuation of $2,000 upon the services of a private secretary to a Senator and $1,500 for similar services rendered by a secretary to a Member of the lower House of Congress.

There is no more justice in that than there would be in passing an appropriation bill fixing the salaries of United States Senators at $7,500 and the salaries of Members of the House at $5,000. You have ceased to give a month's extra pay, which would restore in a measure the former salaries paid to our employees; but now, while you are seeking various remedies to reduce and retrench and improve the system, you might find time and opportunity to do what is right and just by the faithful and efficient employees of this House. Also let us not reflect longer upon ourselves by voting to a United States Senator a private secretary at $2,000 a year, a stenographer at $1,200, and a messenger at $1,440 a year. We can improve the efficiency of our work as the representatives and servants of the people by equipping ourselves with additional clerical force and voting an appropriation for a stenographer for each Member in addition to the secretaries. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. AUSTIN. I ask two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks that his time be extended two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. AUSTIN. There are plenty of ways and avenues for increasing the usefulness and effective work of a Member of Congress in the interest of the people whom he represents. But we are limited on account of the fact that we have only one secretary. There are many ways of doing good for the people at home if we only had the opportunity, if we would keep ourselves supplied with a sufficient force to carry out the work of the various Government channels which means much to the farmer and the miner and the business man at home.

Above all, I ask Members of this House to stand for a square deal in legislating here for the employees of the House and stop passing appropriation bills where they are not fair or just to ourselves, and certainly not fair or just to the employees of the House of Representatives.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, just a moment. The gentleman from Tennessee has made a very interesting talk. The truth is, he has made that same speech every year for many years. I have no doubt that he has thought over this thing until he really believes that the employees in this House have not been fairly treated in the matter of compensation. Now, the truth of the matter is that the Clerk of the House of Representatives receives the same salary as the Secretary of the Senate, the corresponding officer. The Sergeant at Arms of the House of Representatives receives the same salary as the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate. It is true that the salaries were reduced 38 years ago, but they have long since been restored. There is a discrimination in the amount of assistants that Senators have as compared with that of the clerks and assistants of the House of Representatives.

Mr. AUSTIN. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. AUSTIN. Are there any other inequalities in this appropriation bill?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I think, as far as the employees of the House holding important positions are concerned——

Mr. AUSTIN. I am not speaking about those holding important positions; I am speaking about the subordinate ones—the employees of the House and the Senate that do corresponding or similar duty.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. No material difference. All the positions from clerk up, at any rate, are the same. We can not correct all the inequalities that may be practiced everywhere in the world.

Mr. AUSTIN. It looks to me as if we might correct some right here in the building—here and at the other end of the Capitol Building.

The Clerk read as follows:

Clerks to Senators: For 30 annual clerks to Senators who are not chairmen of committees, at $2,000 each, $60,000.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 10, at the end of line 10, by striking out the figures $2,000 and inserting $1,500, and striking out the figures $60,000 and inserting the figures $45,000.

[Mr. RUCKER addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the figures "1,500" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "1,200."

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I do this for the purpose of emphasizing one thought, and that is that the permanent law fixes the salary of this class of employees at $1,200 a year. I am not contending at all that $1,200 is sufficient, but it ought not to be $1,500 or $2,000 when the permanent law says $1,200. The only central thought which I do desire to emphasize is that if there is a need for an increase of the salary not only of these men but all other employees of the Government, that we ought to have the manly courage to bring in a statute here to fix the salaries so that we would not be compelled year after year to make an appropriation in excess of permanent law. In other words, I believe that the laborer is worthy of his hire, but when the statute fixes the compensation I believe it is just as wrong to violate that statute as it is to violate a penal statute; the only exception is that the individual who violates the one may not be punished by the courts, whereas in the other he is liable to prosecution criminally.

Mr. Chairman, I, for one, do not believe that $1,200 is enough to defray the expenses of clerical help in the office of Congressmen. I know myself that I have worked in my office all the way from 12 to 20 hours a day, and I know that if I did not work these long hours I would leave undone a large portion of the work that ought to be done for my constituents. I can not stand it forever, neither can any other man stand it always. Flesh and blood will give way under long hours of physical and mental strain. When you get the proper relief it will be by a law fixing the salaries so that they will be commensurate with the service, and will prevent us in the future from violating the plain statute by appropriating salaries in excess of the statute.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken, and the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. RUCKER) there were 19 ayes and 31 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to ask the gentleman, chairman of the committee, this question: On page 5, line 18, it provides for Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department—clerk, $2,220; messenger, $1,440; messenger, $1,200. Was it the intention of the Committee on Appropriations to provide two messengers for a single committee of the Senate?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. The law provides for it. We have not appropriated for a man who is not provided for by law.

Mr. AUSTIN. Here is the Committee on Mines and Mining, page 6, line 21:

Clerk $2,220, messenger $1,440, messenger $1,200.

There are two messengers for that committee.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I suppose the gentleman is not unmindful of the fact that it is claimed in the Senate that each Senator ought to have at least three clerks.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman will find many more Senate committees provided for in this bill which are in the same category.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. It applies to all of them.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. And that is something which the committee can not help. I call attention to another fact, and that is something the Committee on Appropriations can not be blamed for. The Committee on Appropriations can not help it, neither can the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN]; that is that there are only 96 Members of the Senate, and if I remember, there are 71 committees as compared with 39 or 40 committees in the House with 435 Members. The contention is made that the committees are necessary, and that some are created for the purpose of giving the Senators necessary help in the work they have to do.

Mr. AUSTIN. Here is a Committee on Revolutionary Claims. Does the gentleman know whether that committee has reported a bill in years?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I dare say the committee never has any bills to consider, because the claims are all paid or are out of date.

Mr. AUSTIN. The Senate is Democratic, and with the Democratic House is pledged to economy.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman from Tennessee must not hold the Democratic Members of this House responsible for what was done in a Republican Senate. I want to say that all these committees were created by a Republican Senate and maintained by a Republican Senate.

Mr. AUSTIN. I know that; but we expect a Democratic House and the Appropriation Committee to economize and not make such a wasteful and unnecessary expenditure of the public money as is carried in certain portions of this bill.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I am gratified that the gentleman from Tennessee admits that the Republican Senate is responsible.

Mr. AUSTIN. That does not excuse or relieve the party now in power for continuing so-called Republican extravagance.

The Clerk read as follows:

Stenographers to Senators: For 23 stenographers to Senators who are not chairmen of committees, and 3 stenographers to the chairmen of the 3 minority committees, at $1,200 each, $31,200.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. There is one matter which I desire to get more plainly before the House. My colleagues on different sides of the aisle in a discussion, one of them a distinguished member of the Republican Party and one a distinguished member of the Democratic Party, have developed one fact to my mind, and that is that the Democratic and the Republican Parties are both very extravagant. According to the gentleman on the other side of the aisle, the Republican Party has established very heavy expenditures, some very extreme appropriations for committees and an unusual number, and the Democratic Party comes along and appropriates money for all of those committees, and increases the number, so that we have at least the fact demonstrated that the Democratic Party and the Republican Party, notwithstanding their pledges, are very extravagant, and neither one of them will devote itself to economy, but is guilty everywhere of extravagance and makes extremely large appropriations.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRYAN. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Just for this suggestion, and that is that the Committee on Appropriations in presenting this bill to the House has done nothing more than comply with the law and appropriate or make suggestions for appropriations for positions already created by law. The Committee on Appropriations can not change the law.

Mr. BRYAN. The Democratic Party has charge of the House and has charge of the Senate, and why does it not amend the law if the law is not entirely satisfactory to Democratic standards. The Democratic Party is pledged to economy, and it says in effect that the only plank that it has a right to violate is the plank in respect to Panama Canal tolls. Why do you violate also the plank about economy, but without acknowledging the fact?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to suggest to the gentleman that the most expensive individual this country ever enjoyed was the gentleman whom the gentleman from Washington supported for President in the last campaign, and most of our evils can be traced and attributed to the time he occupied the White House. We are doing our best to recover, but it will take some time to do it.

Mr. BRYAN. He put a good deal of money into circulation by causing the Panama Canal to be built, which the Democratic Party, over the protest of the distinguished gentleman from New York, surrendered the other day to England. The gentleman to whom the gentleman is referring——

Mr. FITZGERALD. He put money into circulation in many more ways than by the construction of the Panama Canal. He put it into circulation by ignoring the law, by violating the law, and doing as he pleased with regard to the law, and for that he was properly treated at the last election, and will undergo a much more regrettable experience if he attempts it again.

Mr. BRYAN. He is the one man that you always remember when you think about turning somebody down. When you think about your troubles you always think about Theodore Roosevelt, and gentlemen on this side think about the same character, and he will be here a long time yet to bother you.

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. And he is mainly responsible for the minority President in the White House to-day.

Mr. BRYAN. Yes; you have him to thank for the defeat of the Republican Party and for your President, Woodrow Wilson, and the gentleman knows it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Contingent expenses: For stationery for Senators and the President of the Senate, including $6,000 for stationery for committees and officers of the Senate, $18,125.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I will ask the gentleman from South Carolina, in charge of the bill, whether the Senators are permitted to use all of the stationery they want at the expense of the contingent fund of the Senate, or if this item provides for a special appropriation of a fixed amount for stationery for each Senator?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. The law fixes the amount at $125 each.

Mr. MADDEN. Does this provide for the appropriation of that?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. That is for committees.

Mr. MADDEN. This says for stationery for Senators.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Six thousand dollars is for committee use and the balance of it goes to the individual Senators, and the law fixes the amount each Senator can get at $125.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman must be mistaken about that. How does he arrive at those figures? This is for stationery for Senators and the President of the Senate, including $6,000 for stationery for committees and officers of the Senate, $18,125 being appropriated. Is that $12,125 that is left made up of the amount of $125 for each Senator?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Yes.

The Clerk read as follows:

For miscellaneous items, exclusive of labor, $50,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I wish to inquire what is included in these miscellaneous items for which there is appropriated $50,000? I notice the companion item under the House heading, and we appropriate only $75,000. The Senate is only one-fourth as large as the House membership. Why should they receive such a largely disproportionate amount?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I will state to the gentleman from Wisconsin that the miscellaneous and contingent appropriation for the Senate is expended in investigations, a great many of which has been carried on by the Senate.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, no; the next item is for that purpose. This is for miscellaneous items, exclusive of labor, $50,000.

Mr. MADDEN. It is for the soda water and ginger ale and the Apollinaris water, and all that sort of stuff.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. It is the expense of the Senate and of the committees. For instance, if the committee should go to New York or any other place, or if they have hearings.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is also extended to the expenses connected with the personal upkeep of a Senator?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I do not know about that.

Mr. FITZGERALD. No personal service.

Mr. STAFFORD. The claim has been made from time to time in the public press that in a certain branch of our Government there are large sums of money expended for vichy waters and beverages, tooth powders, and all the other embellishments that go to make life pleasant, and I did not know whether it was this item, which is a large one, that provided for those luxuries.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I think the gentleman is wrong about that. The gentleman may go over to the stationery room and buy a bottle of perfume and have it charged to him, and if he did it would appear in the report of the Clerk of the House, but it is not something that the Government of the United States pays for at all. There is a stationery room at each end of the Capitol, where various articles are kept for the convenience of Senators and Members, and these newspapers have referred to the accounts of Senators and Members there.

Mr. STAFFORD. As far as the House is concerned, we can all testify there is no abuse whatever of the allowances to Members or the privileges granted Members through the stationery room; but I have heard, and somewhat reliably, that in another body they were more liberal in their preferment as to certain articles which are sometimes used for a person's adornment and comfort.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. They have been always more liberal in providing certain things.

Mr. HAWLEY. Will not the gentleman be more specific and inform us what those things are?

Mr. STAFFORD. As this is a matter involving another body which is coordinate with ours, I do not know whether it is hardly proper to go into specific details as to the purposes for which this appropriation is used.

The Clerk read as follows:

For contingent expenses, $200, one half to be disbursed by the Secretary of the Senate and the other half to be disbursed by the Clerk of the House of Representatives.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I wish to inquire of the gentleman in charge of the bill what is the necessity for this contingent expense of $200? It is a small item, but how do they expend that money for contingent expenses of police?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. That is a very small appropriation——

Mr. COX. I know it is.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Of $200, $100 to be disbursed by the Senate and $100 by the House. They purchase out of that money revolvers for policemen, handcuffs, and such things as the police force need. What they do not need is covered into the Treasury.

Mr. COX. Does the gentleman mean to say that the police around here carry pistols?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. They are supposed to.

Mr. FITZGERALD. They are watching the Sergeant at Arms's office at night.

Mr. COX. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

For compensation of Members of the House of Representatives, Delegates from Territories, the Resident Commissioner from Porto Rico, and the Resident Commissioners from the Philippine Islands, $3,304,500.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 11, after line 18, insert as a new paragraph:

"The salaries of Representatives in Congress, Delegates from Territories, and Resident Commissioners elected for unexpired terms shall commence on the date of their election and not before."

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It is not subject to a point of order, Mr. Chairman, and I am ready to have it disposed of.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I suggest the gentleman make the point of order and let us settle it.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Washington rise?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. To discuss the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana make the point of order?

Mr. COX. I reserve the point of order for the purpose of getting an explanation.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I will make an explanation of what the amendment is. As the law is now construed, Mr. Chairman, where a vacancy occurs by the death or resignation of a Member, or in any other manner, and a person is elected to succeed him, that person so elected draws a salary not from the time of his election, but from the date of the death of his predecessor.

Mr. COX. I did not get the force of the gentleman's amendment. He only intends it to apply in the case of a vacancy?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. COX. I thought it applied to all Members. I withdraw the point of order. I think it is a good amendment.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, it is already the law, as I understand it, as applied to Senators. The Senate many years ago adopted an amendment to an appropriation bill, the language of which is similar to that offered here, which provides that salaries of Senators elected under similar circumstances shall begin with the date of their election.

Mr. RUCKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I will.

Mr. RUCKER. About the only thing included in this amendment will be to save the Government the expense between the date of the death and the date of election?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes. The gentleman from Washington has some figures which he desires to present upon this matter. Within the last two or three years there have been perhaps $30,000 paid out which would have been saved under the circumstances described in connection with this amendment. I yield the floor to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, this is, in substance, the amendment I offered a while ago. According to the statement made to me by the Clerk, we have been paying out something over $10,000 a year in this manner. Since December, 1910, we have paid out $33,750, if I have made the correct calculation. I do not want to say there has been anything wrong about any Member accepting this gratuity. There was not. He had no alternative, as far as I know, except of leaving it, as it belonged to him. But certainly we ought to amend the law in this respect, for it is paid to a Member who performs no service, he drawing the salary from the time of the death of the man whom he succeeds. My attention was first called to it when my illustrious colleague, Francis W. Cushman, died. The man who succeeded him was elected several months afterwards. He came to me with great surprise, saying that he had been made a present of quite a sum. He said, "I do not want that money; I do not know what to do with it." I said, "There is nothing else for you to do but to keep it." I am surprised that this matter has not received the attention of the committee long before.

Mr. RUCKER. Let me ask the gentleman if it is not either the law or the practice in the case of a contested election, if the contestant was seated, to pay him the salary from the beginning of the term, and also pay the contestee who is turned out a salary for the time he had served?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. That is true.

I trust there will be no objection to this amendment.

[Mr. RUCKER addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I was trying to get recognition all the time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair begs the gentleman's pardon. He did not see the gentleman. The Chair will ask unanimous consent that the vote by which the amendment was adopted be vacated. Does the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] say he was trying to get the attention of the Chair when the motion was put?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I was, most emphatically. However, I do not wish to take up the time of the House unnecessarily. However, this amendment has been voted the way I wanted to see it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not desire to keep the gentleman from Iowa from talking to this amendment.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. No; I did not think anything of the kind.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman wish to talk on this amendment?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. No; the matter has been voted on.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For actual traveling expenses incurred by Representatives, Delegates, and Resident Commissioners, including actual traveling expenses of immediate and dependent members of their families, incurred in going to and returning once from each session of Congress by the nearest route usually traveled, the same to be paid on certificates duly approved and in the manner heretofore prescribed for the payment of mileage, $87,500.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the paragraph. In support of the point of order I would like to make three statements.

In the first place, this is legislation upon an appropriation bill, but it would effect, upon its face, apparently, a reduction in expenditures and would probably be in order under the Holman rule. But whether it does effect a reduction in expenditures under the terms of the paragraph or not is purely a speculative matter. An account has to be taken of the whole number of persons in the families of all the Members which the Members would be entitled to bring with them to Washington under the terms of this paragraph. And that being a matter of pure speculation, no statement as to a reduction being effected other than a less amount that is offered to be appropriated than heretofore, does not establish a case of actual reduction.

But the second point I rely on more than that. It introduces into the law those who are now strangers to the law, to wit, immediate and dependent members of their families, the "their" referring to Members of the House. These persons are not recognized by the law. It introduces into the law a class of people who are entitled to certain allowances to be paid out on their account who are not now authorized under the law to have anything paid out on their account at all.

The third point is, that in order to save the case for these strangers to the law—to be included in its benefits—an apparent reduction is made in the total amount named to be appropriated.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if under a color of reducing an appropriation strangers to the law and aliens to its provisions can be introduced, it opens the way for a phase in legislation to which there is no end. It would pervert the use of the Holman rule, which was designed to reduce expenditures, by allowing a large number of others to be included in the expenditures—a thing which is contrary to the purpose of the rule.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, especially on account of these two last considerations, I hope the Chair will see his way clear to rule the amendment out of order, especially because of the vice in it.

I wish to repeat that last statement, Mr. Chairman, that under the cover of an apparent reduction, an alleged reduction of expenditures, there is sought to be brought under the benefits of the law a large number of people who are to become the beneficiaries under the law who are now aliens and strangers to the law, and it is therefore a perversion of the intent of the Holman rule. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair discussed this matter this morning when it came up under the second paragraph of the bill, but did not make a statement with reference to the point of order about bringing new and alien people into the law and giving them a benefit from it.

By a careful reading of this proposed paragraph of the bill it will be observed that no one is to receive a benefit under this proposed law who does not receive a benefit under the present law. The Senator or Representative or Delegate receiving the mileage, the expense of mileage, for his family now receives his mileage, and the only question to look at is the question whether or not the expenses under the proposed system would be less than they would be under the present law.

Mr. HAWLEY. Will the Chair submit to an interruption?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. HAWLEY. Under the terms of this provision will not the Members of the House receive, on behalf of others named in the provision, a benefit for those for whom they do not receive a benefit now?

The CHAIRMAN. Undoubtedly the provision proposes to designate for what they shall receive the allowance for expense, but no one under this provision is allowed to draw money for that expense except those who are permitted under the law to draw mileage, so that the Chair does not think the point of order is well taken, and overrules it. The Clerk will read.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 12, line 19, by striking out the paragraph commencing on line 19 of page 12 and ending on line 2 of page 13 and inserting the following: "For mileage of Representatives and Delegates and expenses of Resident Commissioners, $175,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD].

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, it is not necessary to waste time on that. We have already wasted two hours and a half. Let us have a vote.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I want to say one word, that the amendment I offer is to restore existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD].

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. STAFFORD. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 37, noes 35.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment as a new paragraph at the end of line 2, page 13.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] offers an amendment as a new paragraph. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding as a new paragraph at the end of line 2, page 13, the following:

"That upon the filing of a statement by a Senator, Representative, Delegate, and Resident Commissioner to the effect that he does not wish to receive the amount placed to his credit for mileage, it shall hereafter be the duty of the disbursing officer to cover such money as may be in his possession to the credit of any such Senator, Representative, Delegate, and Resident Commissioner for mileage into the Treasury of the United States: Provided, That any Senator, Representative, Delegate, and Resident Commissioner who has not filed such statement or drawn such mileage within a period of 90 days after the same has become available shall be deemed to have waived his right thereto, and the same shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States."

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment, first, because it is legislation; and, second, because we have already voted on the precise amendment in another part of the bill. The House has voted it down.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina makes a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a word on the point of order. Here is an opportunity given to a number of gentlemen who say they are already receiving more mileage than they want. [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I want the gentleman to discuss the point of order. We have discussed this thing for two hours and a half, and the gentleman offered that amendment before, and the House voted it down.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois will discuss the point of order.

Mr. MADDEN. I hope my friend from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSON] will not assume the position that the Chair occupies, and I hope the Chair will not decide that I am not discussing the point of order.

I was endeavoring, Mr. Chairman, to lay a foundation for a statement on the point of order, and he did not give me an opportunity to lay a foundation for the building before he destroyed the superstructure.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Lay the foundation then. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I submit that this is entirely within the rules of the House, under the Holman rule. It offers an opportunity to reduce the expenditures, and offers that opportunity on the face of the amendment itself.

A great many gentlemen on the floor of the House have stated that they wish to reduce their mileage expenses; that they do not want the amount of mileage that has been voted to them. [Laughter.] This gives them the opportunity, then, of making the statement as to just how much mileage they do want, and I assume that when they make the statement they will say that they want to reduce the amount that is voted. [Laughter.]

Some gentlemen have stated that they believe mileage ought not to be voted at all, and this gives them an opportunity to refuse to receive the mileage that is voted them. I contend that, with such an opportunity as that, the amendment on its face, under the Holman rule, shows a decrease of the expenses of the Government. That being the case, there can be no doubt about the propriety of voting upon the amendment; and besides that, for the first time in the history of legislation an opportunity is afforded to the disbursing officer to turn into the Federal Treasury the money which men having a right to receive it refuse to take. [Laughter.] To-day, Mr. Chairman, if money stands to the credit of a Member of the House in the office of the Sergeant at Arms, and he refuses to take it, that money is held there.

Mr. OGLESBY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. No, Mr. Chairman; I decline to yield. That money is held there for all time. If during his lifetime the man refuses to accept it, it remains there to the credit of his account. If after his death his immediate family refuse to accept it, it still remains to the credit of his estate, and a hundred years from then, if some person remotely related to the man to whose credit the money was placed, and having a more elastic conscience than the Member, makes claim to the money, it is paid over to him.

Mr. RUCKER. How many cases are there like that?

Mr. MADDEN. There have been cases, for example, where men were elected to fill vacancies, where the vacancy was not filled for more than six months, and the salary continued to accumulate, and the man elected six, eight, or nine months after the vacancy occurred drew the salary for all that intervening time. Now, I submit that this money ought not to be allowed to accumulate. It ought not to be possible for the disbursing officer to keep it in his possession. He ought to be obliged to turn it into the Treasury of the United States; and this amendment proposes to give these philanthropic gentlemen serving the people of the United States as Members of Congress an opportunity to decline to receive that which they think is unjust and unfair.

Mr. OGLESBY. Will the gentleman yield now?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The point of order is sustained. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Clerks, messengers, and janitors to the following committees: Accounts—clerk $2,500, assistant clerk $1,800, janitor $1,000; Agriculture—clerk $2,500, assistant clerk $1,800, janitor $1,000; Appropriations—clerk $4,000 and $1,000 additional while the office is held by the present incumbent, assistant clerk and stenographer $2,500, assistant clerks, one $1,900, one $1,800, janitor $1,000; Banking and Currency—clerk $2,000, assistant clerk $1,200, janitor $720; Census—clerk $2,000, janitor $720; Claims—clerk $2,500, assistant clerk $1,200, janitor $720; Coinage, Weights, and Measures—clerk $2,000, janitor $720; District of Columbia—clerk $2,500, assistant clerk $1,800, janitor $720; Election of President, Vice President, and Representatives in Congress—clerk $2,000; Elections No. 1—clerk $2,000; janitor $1,000; Elections No. 2—clerk $2,000, janitor $720; Elections No. 3—clerk $2,000, janitor $720; Enrolled Bills—clerk $2,000, janitor $720; Foreign Affairs—clerk $2,500, assistant clerk $1,800, janitor $720; Immigration and Naturalization—clerk $2,000, janitor $720; Indian Affairs—clerk $2,500, assistant clerk $1,800, janitor $720; Industrial Arts and Expositions—clerk $2,000, janitor $720; Insular Affairs—clerk $2,000, janitor $720; Interstate and Foreign Commerce—clerk $2,500, additional clerk $2,000, assistant clerk $1,500, janitor $1,000; Irrigation of Arid Lands—clerk $2,000, janitor $720; Invalid Pensions—clerk $2,500, stenographer $2,100, assistant clerk $2,000, janitor $1,000; Judiciary—clerk $2,500, assistant clerk $1,600, janitor $720; Labor—clerk $2,000, janitor $720; Library—clerk $2,000, janitor $720; Merchant Marine and Fisheries—clerk $2,000, janitor $720; Military Affairs—clerk $2,500, assistant clerk $1,500, janitor $1,000; Naval Affairs—clerk $2,400, assistant clerk $1,500, janitor $1,000; Patents—clerk $2,000, janitor $720; Pensions—clerk $2,500, assistant clerk $1,600, janitor $720; Post Offices and Post Roads—clerk $2,500, assistant clerk $1,400, janitor $1,000; Printing—clerk $2,000, janitor $1,000; Public Buildings and Grounds—clerk $2,500, assistant clerk $1,200, janitor $720; Public Lands—clerk $2,000, assistant clerk $1,200, janitor $720; Revision of the Laws—clerk $2,000, janitor $720; Rivers and Harbors—clerk $2,500, assistant clerk $1,800, janitor $1,000; Roads—clerk $2,000, janitor $720; Rules—clerk $2,000, janitor $720; Territories—clerk $2,000, janitor $720; War Claims—clerk $2,500, clerk to continue Digest of Claims under resolution of March 7, 1888, $2,500, assistant clerk $1,200, janitor $720; Ways and Means—clerk $3,000, assistant clerk and stenographer, $2,000, assistant clerk $1,900, janitors, one $1,000, one $720; in all, $168,750.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the words "two laborers in the bathroom, at $900 each."

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. We passed that long ago.

Mr. BRYAN. It makes no difference, as long as the point of order is not made against it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The amendment has not been reported yet.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment. To what page and line does the gentleman propose it?

Mr. BRYAN. On page 14, line 11, "two laborers in the bathroom, at $900 each."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 14, lines 11 and 12, strike out the words "two laborers in the bathroom, at $900 each."

Mr. FITZGERALD. I make the point of order that that item has been passed.

Mr. BRYAN. I am surprised at a Democrat making a point of order like that.

Mr. CARTER. I thought the Democrats were charged with being the unwashed. I did not know that it was the Progressives. [Laughter.]

Mr. BRYAN. Thank the Lord, the Progressives do not have to wash the things from their records that the Democrats and Republicans have.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am sure that if the gentleman would familiarize himself as to the conditions with reference to these laborers he would not make this motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. When I discussed some of the inequalities in this bill the gentleman in charge of it made the criticism that I was repeating a speech that I had perhaps made on several other occasions on the same subject matter. I want to say to the gentleman that I will make these speeches so long as I am in Congress, and so long as the committee of which he is a member reports bills carrying an injustice to the employees of the House and perpetuating a species of inequality which is unfair to the employees of the House and a reflection upon the membership of a House that will continue such a condition of affairs. The gentleman says the inequalities in the larger salaries have been eliminated. Let me call attention to the section we have just passed over providing for the salaries of clerks. In the Senate with few exceptions every committee clerk has an annual salary of $2,250. Yet on page 16 of this bill that we have just read the salary of nearly every corresponding clerk of the House is $2,000 a year.

Then take up the question of messengers to committees. Any number of insignificant and unimportant committees in the Senate have two messengers, with salaries of $1,440 each. The House messengers are carried under the designation of janitors. The persons filling those offices render identically the same service, but we are paying our janitors and messengers $720 a year, and at the same time reporting and passing a bill which pays the corresponding employees in the Senate twice the salary. Take the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds—mark you, the omnibus public-building bill is practically all completed in the House committee. The assistant clerk of that committee in the Senate is paid $1,440 a year. We pay the assistant clerk of the House committee $1,200, a difference of $240 a year, and the bill is practically written in the House committee. Take the salaries of the messengers. The messenger of the Senate Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds is paid $1,440 a year, and the messenger or janitor of the House committee is paid $720 a year. The Senate employee receives twice the salary.

Take the Senate Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads. It has three assistant clerks, at $1,440 a year each. The House committee has one assistant clerk, at $1,400 a year. The Senate committee has a messenger at $1,440 a year, and the House committee has a janitor at $1,000 a year.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman criticizes the Committee on Appropriations for the salaries paid to these clerks and messengers in the Senate. Of course, the gentleman is aware of the fact that their salaries are fixed by Senate resolution, just as the salaries of the messengers, janitors, and clerks of the House committees are fixed by a resolution of the House. I think the gentleman is scarcely fair in undertaking to criticize the Committee on Appropriations for simply following these resolutions which have been passed by the respective bodies.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to criticize the members of the committee, but because the Senate has passed a resolution fixing the salary of a clerk at $2,250 and the salary of a messenger at $1,440 is no reason for our appropriating that whole amount. You want either to reduce the amount to the men you are appropriating for similar offices in the House or you ought to take steps to equalize the increase in the salary of the House employees.

Mr. COX. I would suggest a remedy, and that is for the gentleman from Tennessee to go down to his State and get elected to the Senate. That we would all rejoice to see accomplished. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of Doorkeeper: Doorkeeper, $5,000; hire of horses and wagons and repairs of same, $1,200, or so much thereof as may be necessary; special employee, $1,500; superintendent of reporters' gallery, $1,400; janitor, $1,500; messengers—16 at $1,180 each; 14 on the soldiers' roll, at $1,200 each; laborers—15 at $720 each, 1 in the water-closet at $720, 1 at $680, 2 known as cloakroom men at $840 each, 8 known as cloakroom men, 2 at $720 each, and 6 at $600 each; female attendant in ladies' retiring room, $800; superintendent of folding room, $2,500; foreman, $1,800; 3 clerks, at $1,600 each; messenger, $1,200; janitor, $720; laborer, $720; 32 folders, at $900 each; 2 drivers, at $840 each; 2 chief pages, at $1,200 each; 2 messengers in charge of telephones (1 for the minority), at $1,200 each; 46 pages, during the session, including 2 riding pages, 4 telephone pages, press-gallery page, and 10 pages for duty at the entrances to the Hall of the House, at $2.50 per day each, $13,225; superintendent of document room, $2,900; assistant superintendent, $2,100; clerk, $1,700; assistant clerk, $1,600; assistants—7 at $1,280 each, 1 at $1,100; janitor, $920; messenger to press room, $1,000; in all, $146,525.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word in order to ask a question of the gentleman in charge of the bill. What language at the bottom of page 17 includes the House barbers? Is it "eight known as cloakroom men"?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. COX. Here is the query I have in mind. Some of the barbers tell me that they get $720 a year and some get $600. I want to know why there is that difference.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. These salaries have been fixed by resolution through the Committee on Accounts, and the Committee on Appropriations has followed the law.

Mr. COX. It is said that some of them are foremen? How many foremen are there?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. There are no foremen. There are four barbers, two of whom get $60 a month and the other two get $50 a month.

Mr. COX. Why the difference?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. It is not a question of being foreman. It is simply a question of injustice.

Mr. COX. I think so, and it ought to be remedied. I have no interest in any barbers.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. This committee can not legislate in order to equalize the compensation of the employees of the House. That is a matter peculiarly within the jurisdiction of the Committee on Accounts, and the gentleman can go to that committee and take the matter up with them.

Mr. COX. I want to get the language accurately.

Mr. HUGHES of West Virginia. Will the gentleman yield for some information?

Mr. COX. Sure; that is what I am trying to get.

Mr. HUGHES of West Virginia. Of the barbers down in the barber shop two do extra work, and that was the reason the Committee on Accounts allowed them extra pay.

Mr. COX. What does the extra work consist of?

Mr. HUGHES of West Virginia. The cleaning up of the Hall and cleaning up around this building.

Mr. COX. What is their pay for doing the extra work?

Mr. HUGHES of West Virginia. They get $720 and the others get $600.

Mr. COX. Do not all of the barbers participate in the cleaning up?

Mr. HUGHES of West Virginia. Some of the barbers do not.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I think the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. COX. I am informed that they all do it.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I think, as a matter of fact, that those barbers all contribute something out of their salary to have the work done; the one who gets $50 contributes the same as the others.

Mr. COX. In proportion to their salary?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. No; the same amount.

Mr. OGLESBY. What is the amount?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Five dollars a month.

Mr. STAFFORD. I want to say that there are four barbers in the House Office Building, and they receive no allowance whatever. They are paid for the services they perform.

Mr. COX. This inequality that I have referred to is an injustice and ought to be corrected in some way.

Mr. OGLESBY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I do that for the purpose of asking the committee why we pay any salary to those barbers, who do not perform any work except the work in the barber shop, and get paid for every shave and haircut and every other duty that is performed. Why should we give them their rent free and everything that they need for the purpose of doing the work, and pay them full price for their services, the same that they would get in any other barber shop in the city, besides paying them a salary? I do not understand it, and I would like to have the committee tell me the reason for it.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, these people are provided for by the Committee on Accounts. It is their duty to clean up this Hall and keep this Capitol Building clean. The matter of looking after the subordinate employees of the House under the Doorkeeper is not something that the Committee on Appropriations can attend to, and we make the appropriations to pay the people on the pay roll the salaries that have been fixed by law.

Mr. OGLESBY. Mr. Chairman, my information is that these eight barbers each contribute $5 a month from their salaries toward the cleaning up around the hall, and that that $5 a month is all that does come out of their salaries for the purpose of having that work done, for which we pay them fifty and sixty dollars. If that is the case, I do not understand why that amount of graft should be paid to these men.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, that practice is expressly prohibited by law. The statute prohibits any such practice as that. There was an investigation in the Fifty-sixth or Fifty-seventh Congress, and as a result of that the so-called Moody Act was passed.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. That act provides that it shall not be lawful to require or permit any person in the employ of the House of Representatives to sublet to any other the discharge of any portion of the duties of the position to which he is appointed.

Mr. OGLESBY. Mr. Chairman, in view of that statement I withdraw my pro forma amendment and move to strike out, on page 17, in lines 23 and 24, the words:

Eight, known as cloakroom men—2 at $720 each and 6 at $600 each.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 17, lines 23 and 24, strike out the words:
Eight, known as cloakroom men—2 at $720 each and 6 at $600 each.

Mr. HUGHES of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I want to say before this amendment is voted on that these barbers are men who work in that employment and have for a great number of years. They get scarcely any pay at all. They have to be around this Capitol when Congress is not in session, and while it is true they get paid for the shaves and hair cuts in that shop, yet, in addition to that, they have a lot of extra work to do, and the compensation that is paid these men of $60 and $50 a month is small. I hope the House will not be so small as to strike it out.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. HUGHES of West Virginia) there were—ayes 11, noes 24.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

To continue employment of the special messenger authorized and named in the resolution adopted April 10, 1911, $1,500.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 19, lines 11 and 12, strike out the words "April 10, 1911" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "April 7, 1913."

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, this simply corrects the date of the law.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of Postmaster: Postmaster, $4,000; assistant postmaster, $2,200; registry and money-order clerk, $1,500; messengers—12 (including 1 to superintend transportation of mails) at $1,200 each, 18 at $100 per month each from December 1, 1914, to March 31, 1915, $5,600; laborer, $720; in all, $30,020.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do this for the purpose of asking the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee why there should be an increase on page 20, in line 4, of from 14 to 18 assistant postmasters.

Mr. FITZGERALD. They are already employed.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. They are already carried in a resolution. The only difference is that we allow for carrying them regularly in the appropriation bill.

Mr. FOWLER. They have been provided for in a House resolution?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For hire of horses and mail wagons for carrying the mails, $2,500, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to know why we have to pay for that? I was under the impression that our mail was furnished us by the Post Office Department.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Oh, no; the Government maintains a post office in the House Office Building for the benefit of the Members of Congress, and some of the Members have the mail delivered at their homes in the morning and again in the afternoon. We pay for these wagons out of that appropriation.

Mr. COX. Then we do not pay anything for hauling the mail from the department up to the House Office Building?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. These same wagons do that.

Mr. COX. The same wagons distribute it to our homes?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. COX. Is that let out by contract?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Yes.

The Clerk read as follows:

Clerk hire, Members and Delegates: To pay each Member, Delegate, and Resident Commissioner, for clerk hire, necessarily employed by him in the discharge of his official and representative duties, $1,500 per annum, in monthly installments, $660,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary; and Representatives and Delegates elect to Congress whose credentials in due form of law have been duly filed with the Clerk of the House of Representatives, in accordance with the provisions of section 31 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, shall be entitled to payment under this appropriation: Provided, That all clerks to Members, Delegates, and Resident Commissioners shall be placed on the roll of employees of the House and be subject to be removed at the will of the Member, Delegate, or Resident Commissioner by whom they are appointed; and any Member, Delegate, or Resident Commissioner may appoint one or more clerks, who shall be placed on the roll as the clerk of such Member, Delegate, or Resident Commissioner making such appointments.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order against the paragraph.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend, by striking out, in line 1, page 21, the figures "$1,500" and inserting in lieu thereof the figures "$1,800."

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman is going to offer that amendment I shall insist upon the point of order reserved by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD]. The law provides that these people shall be paid $1,200, and if the gentleman and all other members of the committee are willing, by unanimous consent, to let this item be increased from $1,200 to $1,500 I shall not insist upon the point of order, but if the proposition is made here to increase it from $1,500 to $1,800, then I shall insist upon the point of order and have it reduced to $1,200.

Mr. BARTLETT. Oh, the gentleman does not make the point of order on this amendment, does he?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman make the point of order against the amendment?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Against the paragraph, Mr. Chairman. If we are to have unanimous consent that the paragraph shall be adopted I will withdraw the point of order; otherwise I shall insist upon it.

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman does not hurt me any more than he hurts himself or hurts anybody else by reducing the clerks from $1,500 to $1,200.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. All right.

Mr. BARTLETT. If this is the kind of spite—cutting off your nose to spite your face——

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. It is not spite work. The gentleman is a member of the committee, and he knows how and when this bill was brought in, and he never reserved the right to make such an amendment, and I am not going to let him do so, either.

Mr. BARTLETT. Well, the gentleman can make the point of order if he wants to. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 21, line 1, strike out the figures "$1,500" and insert in lieu thereof "$1,800."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I understood the point of order has been reserved.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order was reserved by the gentleman from New York to the paragraph.

Mr. STAFFORD. I understand an amendment can not be pending until the point of order is disposed of.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, the Chair does not think the amendment can be offered until the point of order is either made or withdrawn.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, under the circumstances I will withdraw the point of order, but I am very much surprised at the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. BARTLETT. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 25, noes 17.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York makes the point of order there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Evidently there is no quorum present or within hearing distance, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GARNER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 15279, and finding itself without a quorum he had directed the roll to be called, when 251 Members responded to their names, and he reported the names of the absentees to be entered on the Journal and printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union reports that that committee has had under consideration the bill H. R. 15279, and, finding itself without a quorum, under the rule he caused the roll to be called and 251 Members responded to their names, a quorum, and he reports the lists of absentees to be entered on the Journal and for printing in the RECORD. The committee will resume its sitting.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the amendment be reported again.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be again reported. [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection, and the Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 21, line 1, strike out the figures "$1,500" and insert in lieu thereof "$1,800."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no debate in order on this amendment now.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 142, noes 67.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, the adoption of this amendment makes it necessary to amend, in the same paragraph, line 2, page 21, by striking out the figures "$660,000" and inserting "$792,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT].

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, let that amendment be stated by the Clerk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 21, line 2, strike out the figures "$660,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$792,000."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, before the amendment is put I desire to say something on this matter, so that the RECORD will not be entirely void of discussion and for the enlightenment of the public, if not for the influence it may have on the House. This Democratic House, which was elected upon a pledge to economize in the public expenditures and upon sweeping denunciation of the Republican Party because of its extravagance and unnecessary expenditure of public money, has given an exhibition to-day that I am sure will appeal to the country during the fall elections. It denied all attempts to reduce the mileage paid to Members, and it has continued the practice of paying mileage at the rate of 20 cents a mile going and coming from the sessions. I did not take part in that discussion, because the amount which I receive for mileage is so insignificant that I have felt frequently that, perhaps, I might be actuated by that consideration. I realize that Members coming from a distance are in a much different position. But having refused to save over $100,000 in expenditure for mileage, it is now proposed to increase the expenditure for allowance for clerical services to Members of the House by $132,000. This $300 additional to each Member will not secure any additional or more efficient clerical service. If a proposition were made to provide each Member of this House with an additional clerk, it might be debated seriously and upon its merits, but no one will contend that the mere addition of $300 to the allowance of $1,500 will either increase the efficiency or the character of the service obtained.

Much of the criticism, Mr. Chairman, that has been indulged in of the inequality of compensation between the clerical services for Senators and Members of this House can not be justified. I undertake to say that a large portion of the strenuous labor indulged in by Members of this House, and I speak from an experience in it of 15 years, is not because of any compelling public necessity. Rather, it is because of their efforts to continue themselves in their present office. [Applause.] We need not disguise the fact. We do work long and excessive hours; but if it were not because we desired to do many things to commend ourselves personally and particularly to our constituents, in the belief that it will strengthen us for reelection, there would be no necessity for doing so. There is no necessity for much of such labor from the standpoint of the efficient transaction of the public business. I believe that this increase is unjustifiable and can not be defended. For that reason I antagonize this amendment. It makes the allowance for clerical services for Members of this House $792,000 per annum. I believe that if we are to provide for a single clerk to Members of the House, competent clerks can be obtained, and are obtained, for $1,500. The additional sum will not permit the employment of additional clerks. I do not believe the proposed increase is justified, and I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that our constituents will criticize or condemn us for endeavoring to supply sufficient funds to enable the Representatives of the American Congress to perform the work and the services and efficiently discharge the duties which they commissioned us to perform. [Applause.] I am sure that the experience of all the Members of this House is the experience which I have had in it for 19 years; and that is, that the sum now provided for the Members and used by them for clerk hire, although it is suggested at times in newspapers, slanderously, that they do not use it for that purpose, is not sufficient to pay for the services required at the hands of the Members in the discharge of their duties, and that additional expense is incurred by them in obtaining the necessary clerical services.

I know that I am called on, and I am satisfied that nearly every Member of this House is called on, to pay out of his private purse additional sums every year—more than this additional increase of $300—in order to meet the demands of his constituents in the discharge of his duty as a Member of Congress. I do not believe it is exercising proper economy or that it is wise policy or that it is demanded of us by our constituents that in order to discharge our duties—not to further our own political purposes, as is sometimes suggested—we should be taxed out of our private pockets in order to efficiently discharge our duties.

It is well enough for gentlemen who are chairmen of great committees, who have one or two or three clerks and messengers and other employees at their command, who can perform and do perform their clerical work and who aid them in the discharge of their duties, to say that Members of the House who are not fortunate enough to be chairmen of committees having those additional clerks do not need that service. It may be that such gentlemen as are fortunate enough to be chairmen of committees having this clerical assistance provided for them may not be required to go down into their own pockets and pay an extra sum, far more than $300 a year, in order to discharge their duties; but I know that those Members who are not chairmen of those committees having such clerical service at their command, paid for out of the funds of the House and out of this very appropriation, do need extra clerical assistance. I know that every Member who is not a chairman of one of these committees does require more clerical service and ought to have it. [Applause.]

I know, further, that this very bill, which provides for the clerical force of the Senators, carries a clerk for every Senator who is not a chairman of a committee at a salary of not less than $2,200—a stenographer. Those Senators who are chairmen of committees are abundantly supplied with clerical forces, and the very preceding provisions of this bill carry many stenographers and many messengers for Senators who are chairmen of committees, and they have this amount provided for them in this bill without suggestion from the committee that it is too much. Yet we stand here and do for the Senate what we do not dare do for ourselves. [Applause.]

For myself, I believe that the constituency which I represent will not condemn me for voting for this just recognition of the rights and necessities of the immediate Representatives of the people, for doing for our own Representatives what we do for the two Senators from Georgia and for every other Senator of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I have taken this position before, and I have, in fact, on other occasions voted in favor of this act of justice to the Members of the House, and I am willing to assume full responsibility for it and to accept all the consequences which may follow from my support of this amendment. [Applause and cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I want to make a brief statement to the committee. The committee having in charge the preparation of this bill considered the question carefully. We realized that many of the Members of this House need additional clerical help. [Applause.] I think that I can truthfully say that if any Member of this House works hard and has insufficient clerical assistance, I am one of them. What every working Member of Congress ought to have is two clerks [applause], and those who do not work do not deserve any. [Applause.]

Now, you can not get two clerks with $1,800. The result of the adoption of this amendment will be that nine-tenths of the Members will use the additional $300 to pay the same man they now have, and they will not get any additional help. The Members of our committee did not feel justified in bringing into this House a bill that would call at this time for the employment of an additional clerk for each Member of the House. We have absolutely no feeling, gentlemen, about these matters. It is the privilege of the House to adopt the recommendations that we make or to change them. But I want you to understand before you do either that these matters have been carefully considered.

The committee felt that the only way to give the relief that many members of the committee are in need of would be to provide two clerks. Under the circumstances we were not prepared to make that recommendation. We were thoroughly convinced that a mere increase of two or three hundred dollars would not do more than to increase the salary of the secretary that you now have. Now the matter is with the committee.

Mr. BATHRICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from South Carolina yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I do.

Mr. BATHRICK. Is it not a fact that your committee increased the salary of over 100 laborers in the Congressional Library?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Yes; but every person whose salary we increased in the Library of Congress received $900 a year or less. There are men on the pay roll of the Library of Congress who have graduated at the great universities and the best colleges in America who are receiving less than $900 or $1,000 a year.

Mr. BATHRICK. Does the gentleman believe they will do more work than they have been doing heretofore by reason of this increase?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. No; I do not believe that they will do more work; but I do claim that the compensation they are receiving is not adequate. I deny that $1,500 is inadequate for a clerk. [Applause and cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I know that gentlemen who are crying "Vote! Vote!" feel that $300 is virtually coming to them. But, gentlemen, before you make this grab for yourselves let us stop and think one moment. Down in these departments you find hundreds and thousands of people who are getting very much less money than our clerks are getting. They come before the committee, and each department head is asking for an increase in salaries for his clerks. This sort of legislation places us before the country in the light of voting for something for ourselves when we are unwilling to vote it to those people who do not come directly under us and from whom we get no direct benefit.

What position is a Democratic Congress in to carry out its pledge of economy, which has been one of the touchstones of Democracy since the very foundation of the party down to this time, when we begin by adding $300 to ourselves? It is paid to you. This $300 is paid to the Congressman himself. He does not have to use it in clerk hire, though I presume that most of them do use it in clerk hire. My own clerk takes the check after I have indorsed it and gets the money on it. But, as was suggested by the chairman of the subcommittee [Mr. JOHNSON], it means that those of us who do that will, in each case, keep the same clerk that we have, and it puts us in the attitude of raising the salary of our own employees when we decline to raise the salaries of employees elsewhere. I do not believe it will increase in the least the efficiency of the clerical services that is rendered to the Members of this House.

I am unwilling, without my protest, that this Democratic House should, in the first session, when all the branches of the Government are Democratic, begin increasing the compensation of their own employees.

And I am going to tell you another thing. There is no relative of mine on the pay roll nor is my clerk my relative. I have no objection on earth to a man employing his own son or a member of his family as his confidential clerk, but if I were a Member of this House I would not, under any consideration, vote to increase the salary of my clerk who was my own son or some member of my family. [Applause.]

I would not put myself in the attitude of giving to my own family an increased compensation; and the fact that Members of the House are so anxious to get to a vote on a proposition to pay money which comes to them causes me to believe that the old idea that prevailed in the country that made the Democratic Party a party that wanted to conserve what the people earned and leave in their pockets every cent except that which is necessary to pay the expenses of the Government economically administered—that that principle has gone to the four winds of the earth, and we are writing ourselves down in the history of the country as being the most outrageously and the most criminally extravagant Congress that ever sat on the American Continent. Republicans are always extravagant. They are not to be blamed for extravagance. They do not know any better. But Democrats know better. They have had better training. [Applause.] I said this in a speech before, in the last session; and when I made that speech Members of the Democratic House came to me and asked me not to put it in the RECORD, because it would be used by the Republicans in their campaign book. Let them use it. If they do, it will be by way of confession and avoidance. They can get no consolation out of it, except that we know better. You may use that statement now, gentlemen, because when Democrats get to be so violently extravagant that it makes our record look bad as compared to the very wicked record of the Republicans I must apologize to you Republicans for having ever used the words "criminally extravagant" in criticizing the appropriations that you made, for if that expression "criminally extravagant" was proper to apply to you—my God!—the English language has never found an adjective strong enough to apply to Democratic extravagance. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Oh, you Republicans need not applaud, for every one of you will vote for this graft, and you know it. When the Republicans had the House we Democrats voted with the Republicans who had regard for the taxpayers' money and helped the Republicans keep expenses down. But the last one of you vote with the extravagant Democrats and with your aid make the appropriations of a Democratic House large, whereas if you would help the majority of the Democrats on this side we could keep expenses within bounds.

But you Republicans will vote—the last one of you—for this extravagance and little piece of graft while a majority of Democrats will vote against it; but, with your help, a minority of Democrats will put this over, and you then will get on the stump and charge the Democratic Party with extravagance. The vast majority of us Democrats must bear the burden which all of you Republicans and a small bunch of Democrats unload on us. Wait until the roll is called upon this amendment and we will see where you stand. Here in the Committee of the Whole is the place to dodge, but when the roll is called you will see that the majority of the Democrats will vote against this graft, or I hope so.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, three speeches have been made in opposition to this proposition by members of the Committee on Appropriations. Yet those three members voted to report this bill, which provides a private secretary for a United States Senator, at $2,000 a year; a stenographer, at $1,200 a year; and a messenger, at $1,440 a year. After going on record in favor of an appropriation of that kind for a United States Senator, they say that $1,800 is too much, is extravagant to pay for the clerical assistance to a Member of this House.

Mr. BARTLETT. If the gentleman will allow me, the bill contains the provision which he has stated with reference to Senators who are chairmen of committees.

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. But the bill also provides, on page 10, for 30 annual clerks to Senators who are not chairmen of committees, at $2,000 each, and for 23 stenographers to Senators who are not chairmen of committees, and 3 stenographers to the chairmen of the 3 minority committees, at $1,200 each. So it not only provides for those who are chairmen, but for those who are not.

Mr. AUSTIN. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. Both clerks and stenographers; clerks at $2,000 and stenographers at $1,200.

Mr. AUSTIN. Then, in addition to that, these members of our Committee on Appropriations have virtually admitted, by reporting this bill, that the secretary of a Senator is worth $500 more than the secretary to a Member of the House.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman wants to be fair?

Mr. AUSTIN. I do.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman knows that in all parliamentary bodies consisting of two branches it has been the rule that one house shall not determine the policy of the other house with reference to its own employees, because otherwise there would be constant friction.

Mr. AUSTIN. I shall want a little more time if I am to yield further.

Mr. SHERLEY. I shall be glad to help the gentleman get a little more time. The reason the Committee on Appropriations of the House did not change the provision as to clerical assistance for Senators was not because the committee approved of it, but because it is a well-recognized rule, and a rule that rests in reason, that one House shall not interfere with the other in such matters, because otherwise it would lead to that sort of friction between the two bodies that would interfere with proper legislation.

Mr. AUSTIN. There would be no friction if you insisted upon an equalization of salaries by paying our employees the same salaries as the Senate employees. Now, if your party is committed to economy, you want to be consistent. You should insist upon the Democratic Senators reducing the salaries of their secretaries, and putting them upon an equality with the salaries of the secretaries of Representatives in the lower House of Congress.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The Committee on Appropriations have not spent their time in imagining that they are in the same class with the Members of the Senate; they recognize their limitations. [Laughter.]

Mr. AUSTIN. Your committee has reported this bill, which carries a clerk and two messengers for the Committee on Mines and Mining in the Senate and the pay of the messengers, $1,440 a year each. You have reported this bill with a $1,440 messenger for every Senator, and a janitor or messenger for the House committees at $720 a year.

Let us look at another proposition. Our secretaries must come from home, pay railroad expenses both ways for themselves and, in many cases, for their families, so that their case is not similar to that of the permanently located clerk in the city of Washington in the Library of Congress or elsewhere. We ought to be fair and just to the faithful and efficient secretaries, who materially aid in making our records as Congressmen a success. If we are continued in Congress one reason is because we have faithful and efficient secretaries to aid us in the discharge of our public duties. [Applause and laughter.] Oh, that is true.

Mr. BUTLER. Why not elect the secretaries, then?

Mr. AUSTIN. We ought to be just to them. Why not be fair to them? Why unjustly discriminate by giving them $500 per annum less than we are voting to the secretaries of Senators?

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. FITZGERALD) there were 115 ayes and 67 noes.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Contingent expenses: For wrapping paper, pasteboard, paste, twine, newspaper wrappers, and other necessary materials for folding, for use of Members, the Clerk's office, and folding room, not including envelopes, writing paper, and other paper and materials to be printed and furnished by the Public Printer, upon requisitions from the Clerk of the House, under provisions of the act approved January 12, 1895, $10,000.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Here are contingent expenses to the House, $10,000; contingent expenses to the Senate, $18,135; and that same thing runs along the line that I have referred to. I want to call attention to another discrimination in this bill, and that is the provision for the baths for 96 Senators at approximately $4,000 and for 430 Congressmen $1,800. Is that an indication of where the soap is needed? [Laughter.] I believe it is simply a case of extravagance.

I think while the Senate has the right and privilege, it is the duty of this House, the Members of which come from the people, elected by the people as Senators are going to be, to protest against waste of public money. It is all right to economize on the secretaries' pay, but I think we ought to put in an objection to this appropriation of $4,000 for bathrooms for the Senate and $1,800 for the bathrooms of the House when nobody uses them. The Members should and generally do bathe at home.

The Clerk read as follows:

For miscellaneous items and expenses of special and select committees, exclusive of salaries and labor, unless specifically ordered by the House of Representatives, $75,000.

Mr. OGLESBY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 12, at the end of line 7, add the following: "Hereafter it shall be unlawful for the Clerk of the House to pay out any money of the House of Representatives in bills for laundry, furniture, or supplies used in the barber shop of the House Office Building or the House side of the Capitol."

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, to that I reserve a point of order.

Mr. OGLESBY. Mr. Chairman, a few moments ago the House refused to pass an amendment taking the barbers off the pay roll. I hold in my hand the annual report of the Clerk of the House of Representatives as to expenditures from the contingent fund. On page 277 of that report I find under voucher 812, 1 gallon E. R. B. hair tonic, $4; 1 gallon Newbro's hair tonic, $4.50; 1 gallon bay rum, $3; 1 gallon extract of witch-hazel, $1; 1 gallon Hunter's cedar spray, $2.

On page 281 of the same report, under voucher 910, 12 dozen oatmeal soap, $10.20; 12 dozen glycerin transparent soap, $11.52;

12 dozen honey soap, $10.20; 1 dozen Colgate's talcum, $2.65; 1 dozen bottles lilac, imported, $2.75.

On page 309 I find 1 gallon extract witch-hazel, $1; 1 gallon superior bay rum, $3; 1 gallon E. R. B. hair tonic, $4; 1 gallon Herpicide hair tonic, $4.50; one-half dozen black and russet shoe renovator, 60 cents; 10 pounds Colgate's soap, $2.50; 1 dozen No. 3 Evenola cream, $6; 4 gallons extract witch-hazel, $3.20; 4 gallons superior bay rum, $11; 4 gallons E. R. B. hair tonic, $14; 2 gallons Herpicide, $9; 1 dozen russet polish, $1; 3 bottles Tregor's sachet face dressing, $2.25.

On page 322 I find 1 dozen water lilac imperial, $4.66; one-half gross violet talc powder, $13.52; 1 gross dactylis talc powder, $13.52; one-twelfth gross Colgate's cold cream, $2.25; 5 boxes soap, barbers', round, $11.15; one-twelfth gross Cashmere Bouquet, large, $10.26; 1 gross transparent glycerin, $10.26; one-quarter gross soap, pine tar, $2.56.

Mr. NORTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OGLESBY. Yes.

Mr. NORTON. Is it not a fact that Members are required to pay just as much for work by the House barbers as at any other place in town?

Mr. OGLESBY. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman had been here when I made my motion to take these barbers off the pay roll, he would have heard the answer to that question. I have always been charged the regular price and have given the same fee I have given in any other barber shop.

Mr. NORTON. I certainly have, and they expect the same tip as in other places in town.

Mr. OGLESBY. And I think that it is right that I should pay for my barber services, though I seldom am shaved here in the House.

Mr. BRYAN. And the gentleman should also pay for his baths.

Mr. OGLESBY. Yes. I take those in my own house every morning.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. OGLESBY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. OGLESBY. Mr. Chairman, on page 230 of this same report we find under voucher 964 the charge for a gross of transparent glycerin soap, one gross of imperial lilac soap, one gross of almond cream, and one gross of white clematis.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, that soap is not all used in the barber shop.

Mr. OGLESBY. I think that is probably true, as some of it is used in the washrooms.

Mr. FITZGERALD. And in committee rooms and different places where soap is provided.

Mr. OGLESBY. I have not seen any talcum powder or cold cream and all of these different liquids. I want to say that I do not know whether this Committee on Appropriations, which has so much to do, could possibly examine all of these individual items showing what was done with the articles purchased from this contingent fund. I am not criticizing the committee.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I would say that the Committee on Accounts is charged with the duty and is compelled to audit every one of those expenditures and also to authorize them.

Mr. OGLESBY. Then the matter ought to be called to the attention of the Committee on Accounts. There is no specific charge that I can find here for laundry work done for the benefit of the barber shop, but I am informed that it all comes under one head and it is supplied just the same.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For postage stamps for the Postmaster, $250; for the Clerk, $450; for the Sergeant at Arms, $300; and for the Doorkeeper, $150; in all, $1,150.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, it is now past 6 o'clock, and I would like to inquire how much longer the gentleman expects to run?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I was about to make the motion to rise.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the question of the national university.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. Chairman, the world's basis of credit is agriculture and labor. What we need is cheaper money—lower interest rates. In my native State, Kansas, we have 49,249, or 45 per cent of all our farms mortgaged. We hear much talk and read much print about "back to the farm," "the high cost of living," because of people leaving the farm, and all that. To bring out the plain intent of the subject of Government farm loans I shall submit a few pertinent questions and endeavor to answer them. Will you tell me how we can make a farmer farm at a loss, or stay in the country when the financial advantages are so much greater in other places and occupations? How can he be expected to provide the food for the world if he has got to make for the mortgage holder the interest he demands, and then content himself with whatever over and above this he can squeeze out and save? The farmer owns his land; he does all the work—plants, cultivates, reaps, and markets the crops. He then pays the interest on his mortgage, and if he has anything left he gets to keep that. In other words, he makes the other fellow's living before he can look after himself. Is it right that the proceeds of his labor should go to so great a degree to the capitalist; ought it not be more equally divided?

The money loaner is entitled to a reasonable rate of interest, and when the Government itself borrows money at 2 per cent, and these same capitalists furnish it, is it not time that we make a successful effort to have the United States to do this kind of loaning? There are more than enough other opportunities for the investment of capital. Good bonds and stocks are plentiful. If the facilities for procuring the cheapest loans are in the Government, why can not the citizens who compose it use it to supply their needs? We can and will. Personally I am opposed to bonding the Government to raise funds for any purpose when it is possible to realize funds from any other legitimate source. We can make it unnecessary for the Government to borrow money as it does when issuing bonds. To avoid a bond issue, or, in other words, to avoid the necessity of the Government borrowing money to loan again, why not let the borrower execute his first mortgage to the Government and the Government issue the money required to him direct or through the proper intermediaries, and hold the mortgage for security? Is there any better security? I know of none. When any person desires to go to the farm to farm or to make improvements on his farm is there any reason why the interest rates should be so high that he can not, with all his effort and good seasons, make ends meet? And when the harvest comes after the year of toil and waiting should he not have the right to pay off so much of this mortgage as he wants to? And if he can not pay because of crop failure or sickness or other misfortune should he not have such a long time loan that he need not be worried? And should not he be able to pay it off in installments without paying as much altogether as he now has to pay for interest alone? Of course. And this is brought about in House bill 6158, introduced by me in the House June 17, 1913, at the special session, but not considered because of the restricted program of that session, and reintroduced as No. 11755 January 16 of this year. It is what we need. People the country over are interested in Government loans. I have some 6,000 letters and telegrams from every State in the Union but two. I wish I could read you parts of them. The appeals are genuine, full of good reason and truth; some are even pathetic in their sincerity.

The bill provides for the establishment of a bureau of farm loans in the Treasury Department for the purpose of loaning money to bona fide tillers of the soil, taking farm mortgages as security for repayment. It is a home builders' bill and will put a family on every quarter section in the Middle West, and insists that borrowers shall be residents of the farm to obtain the benefits of its provisions. It provides for the appointment of an assistant farm loan commissioner in each State, whose office shall be at the State capital. This is done to make the department easier of access and to expedite business. This commissioner is to pass on the title and see that all applications are made in due form; if he finds everything correct, he recommends the making of the loan to the bureau in Washington, who in turn instructs the preparation of the funds, and the money is sent to the borrower through the proper State commissioner. The loan can not exceed 65 per cent of the taxable value of the land nor more than $6,000 in any event. This limitation is made for safety, and the tax value is taken as the real value to do away with the necessity of a lot of appraisers and the chance for any favoritism. The loan can only be made for the purposes of purchasing land, permanently improving it, or paying off indebtedness for prior incumbrances contracted for the purchase price or improvements. This limitation is to prevent speculation. All loans are made for 50 years at not exceeding 3 per cent interest, payable at any time, and provides that 2 per cent per year may be paid on the principal sum—amortization it is called—thus wiping out the whole debt by paying 5 per cent, which includes interest and principal each year. As the mortgages are paid, just so is the currency issued on them retired and canceled. When the mortgage is all paid, it is canceled and release recorded. And in the concluding section a penalty is provided for false statements and breach of conditions.

These are my views in what I consider an ideal and at the same time practical and businesslike system and are expressed in the bill. It is not class legislation. Anyone who would comply with the conditions could obtain the loan. For years the Government has owned land and buildings; it owns the postal business and has added the parcel post and is soon to acquire the telegraph; it has built the Panama Canal, and is about to construct, own, and operate an Alaskan railway. Loaning money is every bit as legitimate. For weeks the subcommittee of the Banking and Currency Committee have been at work holding hearings and taking testimony on this proposed legislation. They are going into the matter thoroughly, and will not content themselves with accepting the foreign plans of agricultural credit now in operation in Germany and France and other countries. We must look for a new and original system adapted to our needs, whether it be my bill or one similar. The people of the country will not be content with a makeshift nor a compromise. They demand a system that will without any possible doubt provide loans at low rates. This can not be accomplished by private capital, which demands a profit, and must be done by the Government for the people where profit is not the object.

I have not attempted to discuss the other feature of farm credits embraced in President Wilson's message. I refer to collateral loans of shorter time to enable the farmer to obtain credit between seasons and for crop moving. I can best tell what will be accomplished in this line by quoting the President's own words:

> The Treasury of the United States has, by a timely and well-considered distribution of its deposits, facilitated the moving of the crops in the present season and prevented the scarcity of available funds too often experienced at such times. But we must not allow ourselves to depend upon extraordinary expedients. We must add the means by which the farmer may make his credit constantly and easily available and command when he will the capital by which to support and expand his business.

In our admiring recollection of the years long gone by we exult in the achievement of our country and its place at the head of nations. We stand in the clear, clean atmosphere of a nation-wide democracy, rid of sinister influence and special privilege, without bluster or inefficient conservatism, where Woodrow Wilson has made it possible and popular for the man to drive the dollar instead of the dollar drive the man. He has restored the individual to his realm of opportunity and achievement. He has battled successfully with the money giants and routed the brazen hirelings of predatory wealth; capitalism has surrendered its protected strongholds. Government loans at low interest rates upon certain safe security is the next sure step toward financial independence. It is indeed a new freedom.

[Mr. JOHNSON of Washington addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GARNER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 15279, the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. RUPLEY, for 10 days, on account of business.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

By unanimous consent, at the suggestion of the Speaker, reference of the bill (H. R. 15113) to prevent employment of aliens upon public works of the United States or the District of Columbia, was changed from the Committee on the District of Columbia to the Committee on Labor.

Also, at the request of Mr. LLOYD, reference of the bill (H. R. 12578) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to make an examination of certain claims of the State of Missouri was changed from the Committee on Claims to the Committee on War Claims.

ADJOURNMENT.

Then, on motion of Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina (at 6 o'clock and 6 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, April 4, 1914, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, submitting changes in the estimate of appropriation for the service of the Department of the Treasury for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915 (H. Doc. No. 881); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, submitting estimate of appropriation for remodeling old Bureau of Engraving and Printing for occupancy of the various Treasury officers (H. Doc. No. 880); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

SENATE.

SATURDAY, April 4, 1914.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, Thou art God alone. There is none other beside Thee. With clouds and darkness round about Thee, justice and judgment are the habitation of Thy throne. The heavens declare Thy righteousness and all the people see Thy glory. Thy light is the light of the world. We pray that those who love Thee may hate evil, and that they may rejoice at the remembrance of Thy holiness. May the thought of God be the center of the thought of this great Nation and the influences of God's grace and mercy guide and direct us in all the affairs of our personal and national life. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of the last legislative day (Wednesday, April 1), when, on request of Mr. CHAMBERLAIN and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

THE ROCKEFELLER FOUNDATION.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of Agriculture, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 1st instant, information relative to the general education board of the Rockefeller Foundation to the work of the Department of Agriculture, together with a statement giving the names of persons employed in the farmers' cooperative demonstration work, etc., which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

OIL PRODUCTION IN OKLAHOMA.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of Commerce, acknowledging the receipt of the resolution of the Senate of March 28, 1914, directing an investigation and report as to the cause of the recent reduction in the price of crude oil in the Ardmore oil fields, Oklahoma, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

RAILROAD RATES.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I desire to put forward until Monday morning the notice I gave for an address this morning. The notice was originally given for Thursday morning. We have been unable to carry out our notices on the calendar on account of the executive session which has intervened. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], who has also given notice for this morning, told me he is very desirous of proceeding to-day, and I transfer my notice to Monday morning, immediately after the conclusion of the morning business.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator will observe that I have a notice on the calendar for Monday.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am reminded by the Senator from North Dakota that he has a notice on the calendar for Monday. I will then transfer it to Tuesday morning. I had not observed the Senator's notice.

Mr. GRONNA. There is also a notice for Tuesday morning.

Mr. CUMMINS. I had not observed it. I will therefore put it forward still another day, until Wednesday morning. Is there anyone who has preempted Wednesday morning? [After a pause.] I give the notice for Wednesday morning, April 8.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented a petition of the Kauai Chamber of Commerce, of Lihue, Kauai, Hawaii, praying that an appropriation be made for the construction of a breakwater at Nawiliwili Harbor, island of Kauai, Hawaii, which was referred to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I present a preamble and resolution adopted at a mass meeting held in the city of Seattle, Wash., with reference to the pending bill relative to canal tolls. I ask that they may be read.

There being no objection, the preamble and resolution were read and referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals, as follows:

FREE TOLLS PETITION.

SEATTLE, WASH., March 29, 1914.

Whereas all political parties in the United States either expressed their opinion in their platforms as favoring free tolls for our coastwise shipping through the Panama Canal or were silent upon the subject, and no political party expressed an opinion as against free tolls; and

Whereas President Wilson himself on the 15th day of August, 1912, in a public address favored and extolled the legislation for free tolls and upheld the platform of the Democratic Party thereon; and

Whereas the President has recently, by a message to the Congress, reversed his opinion on free tolls and asked for a repeal of the clause granting free tolls to our coastwise shipping without giving sufficient reasons therefor; and

Whereas our Senators and Representatives have requested and are requesting a good and sufficient reason for the repeal and are preparing to uphold the position the Congress and the President have already taken in this matter and which has become and is the law: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Open Forum (assembled in City Hall Park this 29th day of March, 1914), That we hereby petition our Senators and Representatives in the Congress to continue requesting further information and that the President furnish the same, and that we petition and urge them to use all means in their power that the free tolls clause is not repealed and that our coastwise shipping is not subjected to any foreign interference.

Respectfully submitted.

THE OPEN FORUM,
By RICHARD MANSFIELD WHITE, Secretary.

The above preamble and resolution petition was adopted by a vote of 500 for and 1 against after two hours' discussion.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I have received a large number of memorials from citizens of my State, remonstrating against the proposed amendment to the Constitution prohibiting the manufacture, sale, and importation of intoxicating liquors. I ask that the memorials may be received and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and in as much as they are all brief I ask that the body of one of the memorials may be printed in the RECORD, omitting the signatures.

There being no objection, the memorials were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and the body of one of them was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HON. FRANK B. BRANDEGEE,
Senate of the United States:

We the undersigned voters of the State of Connecticut, hereby enter our earnest protest against the following inimical measures: House joint resolution No. 168, by Mr. HOBSON, of Alabama; Senate joint resolution No. 88, by Mr. SHEPPARD, of Texas; and Senate joint resolution No. 50, by Mr. WORKS, of California, and providing for nation-wide prohibition of the manufacture, sale, and importation of alcoholic beverages

We regard these resolutions as designed not only to interfere in the most unwarrantable manner with our liberties and privileges as men and citizens, by depriving us of the right and opportunity to govern our own appetities and determine our own personal customs and habits, but with total disregard of the rights of property and the opportunity to follow our occupation and make a living at our trade and calling. These bills aim to destroy industries in which about 1,600,000 men are employed directly and indirectly, and no consideration or protection is made to either provide other work or compensation during their enforced idleness.

We therefore most earnestly and urgently request you to vote against said resolutions, and ask you personally to present this protest on our behalf to the Senate of the United States.

Mr. BRANDEGEE presented a memorial of Hiram Eddy Camp, No. 3, Division of Connecticut, Sons of Veterans, of Lakeville, Conn., and a memorial of Franklin Bartlett Camp, No. 11, Division of Connecticut, Sons of Veterans, of Bridgeport, Conn., remonstrating against any change being made in the American flag, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented memorials of sundry Catholic societies of Pennsylvania, remonstrating against the adoption of the illiteracy clause in the immigration bill, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. DU PONT presented petitions of sundry societies of Cheswold, Bridgeville, Camden, Harrington, and Wilmington, all in the State of Delaware, praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit the manufacture, sale, and importation of intoxicating beverages, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. KERN presented memorials of sundry citizens of Indianapolis, Ind., remonstrating against the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit the manufacture, sale, and importation of intoxicating beverages, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of New Castle, Portland, Carmel, Elwood, Terre Haute, Vincennes, Butler, and Crete, all in the State of Indiana, praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit the manufacture, sale, and importation of intoxicating beverages, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. COLT presented memorials of sundry citizens of Rhode Island, remonstrating against the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit the manufacture, sale, and importation of intoxicating beverages, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of the State of Rhode Island, praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit the manufacture, sale, and importation of intoxicating beverages, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of Rear Admiral Charles M. Thomas Camp, No. 3, Department of Rhode Island, United Spanish War Veterans, of Newport, R. I., praying for the enactment of legislation granting pensions to certain widows and minor children of soldiers and sailors of the Spanish-American War, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a memorial of General Hancock Branch, American Continental League, of Providence, R. I., and a memorial of Lincoln Branch, American Continental League, of Providence, R. I., remonstrating against an appropriation for the celebration of the so-called "One hundred years of peace among English-speaking peoples," which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of the Town Council of Narragansett, R. I., praying for the enactment of legislation to create the Coast Guard by combining the Life-Saving Service and Revenue-Cutter Service, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of the Quonocontaug Grange, No. 48, Patrons of Husbandry, of Westerly, R. I., praying for the enactment of legislation to establish a system of rural credits, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. JONES presented memorials of sundry citizens of Seattle, Port Angeles, Bellingham, Spokane, Oakville, Montesano, and Elma, all in the State of Washington, remonstrating against the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit the manufacture, sale, and importation of intoxicating beverages, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of North Yakima, Wash., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation compelling the observance of Sunday as a day of rest in the District of Columbia, which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

PANAMA CANAL TOLLS—EMORY R. JOHNSON.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, about a week ago I presented to the Senate—and by the consent of the Senate there was printed in the RECORD—an extract from the report of Prof. Emory R. Johnson with reference to canal tolls, and especially as the subject applies to coastwise vessels. During the colloquy which followed, while the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW] was on the floor, the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] inquired as to whether Prof. Johnson had in any way been connected with the Carnegie Peace Foundation. A day or two later the Washington Post printed an article stating that I admitted during the debate that Prof. Johnson had been connected with it. Of course this was entirely a mistake, for the colloquy was between the Senator from New York and the Senator from Kansas. I made no admission whatever. I knew nothing at all about it.

What I desire to do now, in justice to Prof. Johnson, is to read an extract from his letter with reference to this subject. He says:

From a statement in the daily press it would seem that Senators O'GORMAN and BRISTOW may have confused me with some other man by the name of Johnson. I have made no addresses for the Carnegie Peace Foundation, nor have I ever been in any way connected with that institution. I made no addresses for pay while in the employ of the United States Government; indeed, I have not received pay for any addresses I have given for a number of years.

Very truly, yours,

EMORY R. JOHNSON.

This is from the University of Pennsylvania, Wharton School of Finance and Commerce.

I think it only just to Prof. Johnson, and also just to those of us who feel some confidence in many of his conclusions, and especially in the statistics that he presents in his report to free him from the suggestion that at the time he was doing this work he was in the employment of any organization interested in the subject. I know it must have been that he was confused with some other man by the name of Johnson.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, I do not know whether the Johnson spoken of by the Senator from Georgia is the Johnson I had in mind when I asked the Senator from Kansas some days since if he was the same Johnson who while drawing pay from the United States Treasury was delivering lectures under the auspices of the Carnegie Peace Foundation. It is possible that a man might not be delivering lectures at the request of the Carnegie Peace Foundation and yet be delivering lectures for any number of the subsidiary companies, organizations, and societies that are maintained by the Carnegie Peace Foundation.

I do know that protest was lodged with the Secretary of War eight or nine months ago against a man named Johnson, who was in the pay of the United States Government and who was delivering lectures, either preaching universal peace or international arbitration or conciliation, and I do know that the Secretary of War advised or admonished the Johnson then on the Federal pay roll against conveying his views publicly on the lecture platform with respect to matters that belong appropriately to the Congress of the United States.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I do not understand that there is any subject connected with the duties of the Congress of the United States about which a private citizen may not properly make a speech if he sees fit.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, in this connection, if the Senator will permit me, the particular criticism which was leveled at the Johnson I have in mind is that upon the lecture platform he was criticizing the action of the American Congress regarding the provisions of the Panama Canal act which was passed by Congress in August, 1912. I believe that no Federal employee has the right to criticize the action of Congress with respect to matters that it either has disposed of or which it is now considering when the purpose of the employee, if he be engaged in such work, is to take part in a propaganda that is designed to exercise a coercive influence over the intellectual freedom of the Congress of the United States.

Mr. THOMAS. I should like to make an inquiry. I wish to inquire if this is another case of "too much Johonson."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It may be too much Johnson, but what I want to do is to repeat from this letter the statement from Prof. Johnson that he made no address for the Carnegie Peace Foundation nor has he ever been in any way connected with that institution, and that he made no address for pay while in the employment of the United States Government. He says "indeed, I have not received pay for any addresses I have given for a number of years." The suggestion was made a few days ago that he was in the employment of the Carnegie Peace Foundation. That suggestion seems to be unsustained, and we have his further denial that he had been employed by anyone to make speeches.

Whether he has made any speeches at any time disagreeing with the conclusion of the Congress about allowing coastwise vessels to pass through the canal free I do not know, and I do not know that he occupied any position that made it improper for him to do so. I think he completed his report early in the fall. I think he made it August 10. It bears date in August, the latter part, I think, and it seems to me——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not yield to the Senator from Michigan, who always wants to make a speech and not ask a question when he interrupts a Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I want to give the Senator the correct date.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am much obliged to the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. August 12.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It was during the month of August, 1912, that it was dated. It was printed and furnished to the public some time later. It was not published, I think, until later, as there are notes in connection with it in the published edition that were necessarily made the last of August.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The regular order.

Mr. BRISTOW. I desire to say that I myself have a similar letter from Dr. Johnson, in which he states that he did not lecture for pay and was not employed by the Carnegie Institute. The Carnegie Institute having a large number of lecturers, and as Prof. Johnson lectured, I had the impression that he was one of the Carnegie Institute lecturers. I am very glad to learn that he was not.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, I can not allow this discussion to close without saying a word about Prof. Johnson. Prof. Johnson, if not the foremost, stands easily in the foremost rank among the statisticians of our country. I do not care by whom he is employed or what he does, I do not believe there is any man in this country who can say a word against his moral or his mental integrity or against the integrity of his conclusions when he makes an investigation in the line of his profession. I thought it was only due to this eminent citizen of the State which I represent that I should make this statement.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the bill (S. 5033) to provide for building a lighthouse and keeper's dwelling at Great Salt Pond Light Station, R. I., reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 403) thereon.

Mr. SMOOT, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (S. 4896) granting to the State of Utah title to certain lands in said State for use as a fish hatchery, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 404) thereon.

Mr. SHEPPARD, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the bill (S. 4976) permitting the Wisconsin Central Railway Co. and the Minneapolis, St. Paul & Sault Ste. Marie Railway Co., its lessee, to construct, maintain, and operate a railroad bridge across the Chippewa River at Chippewa Falls, Wis., reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 405) thereon.

Mr. GRONNA, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 587) relating to the disposal of coal and mineral deposits in Indian lands, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 406) thereon.

OREGON & CALIFORNIA RAILROAD CO.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. From the Committee on Public Lands I report back adversely the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 78) for the relief of applicants to purchase and actual bona fide purchasers of land under the terms of the grant to the Oregon & California Railroad Co., and I submit a report (No. 402) thereon. I ask that the joint resolution may be indefinitely postponed; but in view of the importance of the matter discussed, I ask that the report may be printed in the RECORD. It has to do with the forfeiture of the Oregon & California grant, about which many Senators are receiving letters. The report which I ask to have printed explains the whole situation and gives the reasons for the adverse report.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion to indefinitely postpone the joint resolution.

The motion was agreed to.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Senate Report No. 402, Sixty-third Congress, second session.]

OREGON & CALIFORNIA RAILROAD CO.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, from the Committee on Public Lands, submitted the following adverse report, to accompany Senate joint resolution 78.

The Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. J. Res. 78) for the relief of applicants to purchase and actual bona fide purchasers of land under the terms of the grant to the Oregon & California Railroad Co., having had the same under consideration, beg leave to report it back to the Senate with the recommendation that it do not pass.

The bill was referred to the Department of the Interior, and the Secretary of that department furnished the committee with the following adverse report thereon:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, January 17, 1914.

Hon. HENRY L. MYERS,
Chairman Committee on Public Lands,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: In response to your request therefor, I have the honor to submit the following report on Senate joint resolution 78:

The preamble to the resolution sets forth the acts of Congress making grants of lands to aid in the construction of the railroads referred to therein and the act amendatory thereof. It is therefore not thought necessary to give any particular description of them here. The preamble also refers to the joint resolution of April 30, 1908 (35 Stat., 571), and the suit in equity, No 3340, brought against the Oregon & California Railroad Co. et al. in the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Oregon, pursuant thereto, and to the act of August 20, 1912 (37 Stat., 320), which ratified and confirmed all claims of forfeiture theretofore made or thereafter to be asserted by the Attorney General on behalf of the United States.

The first section of the present resolution proposes that every person who in good faith has fully paid for and received a deed from the Oregon & California Railroad Co. for any portion of the land described in the joint resolution of April 30, 1908, shall be given the right to a patent from the United States for the land paid for, by paying to the United States the sum of $2.50 per acre.

While the bill in equity suit 3340 aforesaid declared a forfeiture of all the lands granted by the acts of July 25, 1866 (14 Stat., 239), and May 4, 1870 (16 Stat., 94), not sold by the grantees at the time of its institution, and all lands sold by said grantees in violation of the provisions of the law, only the unsold lands were involved therein, and they were particularly described. Suits for the sold lands were deferred until the data necessary for the preparation of the bills could be obtained. The act of August 20, 1912, supra, provided, among other things, that the Attorney General, who had brought a number of additional suits against the railroad companies and their purchasers for recovery of title to sold lands, might, in his discretion, enter into stipulations with the holders of the titles under purchases from the companies, whereby a decree should be entered declaring the lands involved in the suit forfeited to the United States, and the purchasers were thereafter to receive from the United States a patent for the lands upon making payment to the Treasurer of the United States $2.50 per acre therefor. For information, it may here be stated that 27 of these suits, involving in the aggregate 339,412 acres of land, have been compromised, by stipulation under said act of August 20, 1912, supra, the decrees of forfeiture entered, the moneys paid, and the lands patented to the purchasers. The act, however, provided only for purchases made prior to September 4, 1908, presumably the date of the institution of the suit; and it also provided that no suit for the recovery of title to lands sold by the railroad companies should be brought after the expiration of one year from the date of its approval.

In view of these facts, if suit for recovery has not already been instituted it is barred by the act of August 20, 1912, and the provisions of section 1 in this bill would therefore be inoperative as to all such cases; if suit has been brought there are already full provisions made in the act of 1912 for the acquisition of title from the United States through stipulation with the United States attorney and payment of the same price proposed herein.

The remaining sections of the bill are designed to provide for and authorize the issuance of patents to those persons who have contracted with the Oregon & California Railroad Co. or the Southern Pacific Co. for the purchase of any of the lands involved in the pending suit, and who have made payment of a portion of the purchase moneys due under such contract, as well as to those persons who have presented applications to either of said companies for the purchase of any of the said lands, such persons being required to pay to the United States a sum equal to $2.50 for each acre of land so purchased or sought to be purchased.

I am strongly constrained to urge the inadvisability of such legislation at this time. My information is to the effect that the litigation initiated in the United States Circuit Court for the District of Oregon has now been transferred by appeal to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit, and it seems entirely probable that it will end only with a decision by the Supreme Court of the United States. Several years will probably elapse before the final result of this litigation may be known, and in the meantime it may not be safe to assume that the claimed title of the railroad company will be forfeited and annulled. We may be justified in our confidence concerning the strength of the Government's case, but would not be justified in proceeding to dispose or arranging for the disposition of the lands involved in the litigation.

In order that Congress may not unwittingly give favorable consideration to this resolution, and thus subserve the personal interest of numerous individuals and firms, I deem it proper to call attention to the activities for some time past of certain individuals who have been engaged in an effort to induce settlement upon the lands in question, with the assurance that even though no legal rights are acquired thereby, still Congress would be virtually compelled to give such persons some preference right when it came to open the lands to settlement and disposition. These lands include some of the best timber and some of the best mineral lands in the State of Oregon.

In addition to the efforts to secure people to settle upon these lands, a large number of persons have been engaged in the business of inducing citizens to apply to the railroad company to purchase these lands upon the assurance that such applicants will acquire some interest in the land applied for, or other preferential rights, which might be enforced. The parties engaged in this business are charging exorbitant fees for location services and for giving so-called advance information.

Under certain investigations which are now being conducted jointly by this department, the Department of Justice, and the Post Office Department it is ascertained that between 14,000 and 15,000 applications to purchase some of these lands have been filed with the railroad company, several hundred of which applications were filed since the act of 1912, supra, in which act Congress expressly declared that none of the lands reverting to the United States by virtue of any right of forfeiture shall be or become subject to entry under any of the public-land laws of the United States or to the initiation of any right whatever under any of the public-land laws. Of this number all but a comparatively small percentage were secured by so-called locators, who charged a fee ranging from $50 to as high as $250, the average fee being about $100, making a total secured by such locators of over $1,000,000.

This department is reliably informed that very few, if any, actual settlers are on these lands; that the applications are purely speculative in character, and in a large number of cases the applicants themselves sign a contract to sell the timber on their claims to some timber company as soon as they secure title to the lands. It is represented by these locators that all the applicant has to do is to advance the location fee of from $50 to $250, and the timber company would advance the purchase price of the land, $400, and pay the applicant so much per thousand feet for the timber.

In some cases these locators represent that they are authorized by the Government to secure parties to make application for these lands; others that they were employed as an agent for the railroad company to sell the lands within this grant. They repeatedly represented that by making applications to purchase first right to the land applied for would be secured; that the land would be secured, regardless of the outcome of the suit between the Government and the railroad company; and that the applicants would secure deeds in six months. These locators made gross misrepresentations as to the amount of timber on the claims, and took options for the excessive amount of timber as an incentive to the applicant to file.

To pass this resolution at this time would doubtless encourage the activities of these locators, and Congress would be lending its aid to the consummation of what now appears to be extensive frauds, deserved prosecution for which might thus be checkmated.

In this connection I deem it proper to quote from the Congressional RECORD of July 2, 1913, page 2594, as follows:

"OREGON & CALIFORNIA RAILROAD LANDS.

"Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the country to a matter of interest to us all.

"In 1908 a joint resolution was passed by Congress authorizing the Department of Justice to institute proceedings of forfeiture against the Oregon & California Railroad Co. Those proceedings were instituted, and resulted in a judgment of forfeiture against the company. Subsequently an act was passed by Congress to withdraw the lands forfeited from sale, settlement, or other disposition until subsequent legislation was had by Congress. Notwithstanding that act, there are agents in the field, throughout the West, particularly, selling what purports to be preferred rights to the lands within this grant, although it is not possible for any person to sell preferred rights to them. The result is that, through these representations, many innocent people are being separated from their money.

"Mr. SMOOT. And they are paying from $200 to $500 each.

"Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. They are paying from $200 to $500 for each quarter section. I am constantly in receipt of letters from the Pacific coast, from the Middle West, and some from the East asking me whether or not parties can secure preferred rights to lands within the grant.

"Some time ago, not knowing the present status of the suit, I sent to the district attorney at Portland, Oreg., a letter I had received from a man named B. C. Smith, at Carlton, Oreg., asking the status of the forfeiture proceedings and whether he could acquire preferred rights. In answer to Mr. Smith the district attorney addressed to him a letter explaining the present status of the forfeiture proceedings, and, in addition to writing Mr. Smith, the district attorney sent me a copy of his letter. I ask to have the letter read and inserted in the RECORD in order that, so far as it is possible for Congress to protect these innocent people and prevent others from imposing on them, it may be done.

"The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the reading of the letter? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested.

"The Secretary read as follows:"

JUNE 10, 1913.

Mr. B. C. SMITH, Carlton, Oreg.

DEAR SIR: Senator George E. Chamberlain has referred to me for attention and reply your valued communication of May 29, 1913, in which you make inquiry concerning the present status of the case of the United States v. Oregon & California Railroad Co., and you also ask information as to the manner in which these lands may be acquired by actual settlement thereon.

Replying thereto, you are advised that in the above suit the district court has rendered a decision canceling the patent of the defendant corporation on the ground that the defendant has failed, neglected, and refused to comply with the terms of the grant under which it took and accepted the same. It is understood that the defendant will appeal this case to the circuit court of appeals, and it is contemplated that before the decision shall become final it will be passed upon by the Supreme Court of the United States. It is very difficult for us to hazard an opinion as to when the probable final outcome of this case will be, but, under ordinary circumstances a decision could not reasonably be expected within two years.

In the event that the decision of our district court should be upheld by the Supreme Court, then it will be necessary for Congress to provide by legislation for some manner for the disposal of these lands. It is my opinion that until the case is finally determined and Congress thereafter by legislation provides some method for the disposal of these lands, that it is impossible for any citizen to gain any rights by attempting to acquire them. In this connection I would most urgently advise you not to permit any locator to induce you to pay him any sum of money or any other consideration for locating you upon any of these lands. There are certain people who are now making a business of locating alleged settlers on these lands, charging them a fee therefor, claiming in some instances to have authority for so doing. This office looks with disapproval upon the methods of these men, and it is my opinion that those citizens who pay these alleged locators their fees will simply lose the amount they so pay.

If there is any other information that you desire and that I am in position to furnish you, I assure you that I will be glad to do so upon your request therefor.

Very truly, yours,

CLARENCE L. REAMES,
United States Attorney.

Attention is also called to the following letter, dated July 31, 1913, from the Department of Justice:

JULY 31, 1913.

C. L. REAMES,
United States Attorney, Portland, Oreg.

SIR: I have your letter of July 8 respecting the status of the lands involved in the recent decree of forfeiture entered in the Government's suit against the Oregon & California Railroad Co. et al. By this decree the railroad company's title to some 2,360,000 acres of land granted to the company by the act of 1866 is declared forfeited to the United States, and you say that unless the position of the Government is given the widest possible publicity it is probable that wholesale frauds will be perpetrated upon innocent people, not only in Oregon but particularly in the States of the Middle West, as designing and unscrupulous men are representing to the people that these lands can be procured by settlement thereon, and, by such representations, they obtain location fees for their services; whereas in fact the lands can not be acquired in any manner until the case has been finally decided on appeal, and, in the event of the Government's ultimate success, not until Congress shall enact legislation providing for the disposition of the lands.

You further state that efforts are being made to prosecute those who are thus imposing upon the people, and you urge that in the meantime this department notify the public generally of the true situation.

In reply I have to say that the department thoroughly approves of your views. The question of the prosecution of the parties responsible for the frauds has already been taken up with the other departments interested in the matter. All who have inquired here have been advised to the effect that no one can safely make any contract with the railroad company and that no department of the Government has authority to make any disposition of the lands. By the act of Congress of August 20, 1912 (Public, No. 278, 37 Stat., 320), Congress expressly declared that none of the lands reverting to the United States by virtue of any right of forfeiture shall be or become subject to entry under any of the public-land laws of the United States or to the initiation of any right whatever under any of the public-land laws.

Every effort, therefore, should be made not only to prosecute those guilty of frauds in connection with this matter, but also to fully inform the public, to the end that the practice of such frauds may be rendered as difficult as possible. The department will endeavor to give publicity to these views and you are authorized to furnish the press with a copy of this letter.

Respectfully,

ERNEST KNAEBEL,
Assistant Attorney General.

For the Attorney General.

It may not be inappropriate to suggest that Congress has not declared any forfeiture of the lands granted to the railroad company, nor has it confirmed any claim of forfeiture made by the Attorney General, except in respect of the lands affected by the several suits instituted by the Attorney General pursuant to the joint resolution of April 30, 1908 (35 Stat., 571). By its act of August 20, 1912 (37 Stat., 320), Congress indicated a purpose to waive forfeiture as to all lands not embraced in any suit instituted by the Attorney General within one year next following the date of that act. Furthermore, I think it may be safe to assume that there was no intention to seek a forfeiture of any lands which had been sold in strict accordance with the terms and conditions of the original granting act; that is, to actual settlers, in quantities not exceeding 160 acres to each such settler, and at a price not exceeding $2.50 per acre.

These facts and suggestions strongly combine to argue against the enactment of this proposed legislation, and I must make my recommendation in accordance therewith.

Very respectfully,

A. A. JONES,
First Assistant Secretary.

HYACINTHE VILLENEUVE.

Mr. STERLING. I am directed by the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (S. 4968) for the relief of Hyacinthe Villeneuve, to report it back favorably without amendment, and I submit a report (No. 401) thereon. I call the attention of the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] to the report.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, this is a matter that should receive immediate attention. There are only about 48 acres of land involved. It is the home of the entryman referred to in the bill, and unless this legislation is enacted he will lose his home. I ask that the report in the case may be read, and then I shall ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Do I understand the Senator from North Dakota desires that the full report in this case be read?

Mr. GRONNA. It is a very short report, I will say to the Senator from Utah, and for the information of the Senate I ask that it may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The report (No. 401) submitted this day by Mr. STERLING, from the Committee on Public Lands, follows:

[Senate Report No. 401, Sixty-third Congress, second session.]

HYACINTHE VILLENEUVE.

Mr. STERLING, from the Committee on Public Lands, submitted the following report (to accompany S. 4968):

The Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 4968) for the relief of Hyacinthe Villeneuve, having had the same under consideration, beg leave to report it back to the Senate with the recommendation that it do pass.

The above bill is identical with H. R. 6260, favorably reported to the House on March 7, 1914. The House Report No. 348 contains the following letter from the Interior Department, addressed to the honorable chairman of the Public Lands Committee of the House, wherein the legislation contemplated above for the relief of Hyacinthe Villeneuve is favorably reported:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, July 10, 1913.

Hon. SCOTT FERRIS,
Chairman Committee on the Public Lands,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. FERRIS: In reply to your request of June 27, 1913, for report, with recommendation, upon H. R. 6260, entitled "A bill for the relief of Hyacinthe Villeneuve," I have the honor to advise you that it appears from the records of the General Land Office that Hyacinthe Villeneuve, on December 5, 1908, made homestead entry for the SE. ¼ NW. ¼ sec. 15, T. 126 N., R. 57 W., fifth principal meridian, in the Devils Lake, N. Dak., land district. He submitted final proof on September 7, 1912, and final certificate issued thereon to him on September 16, 1912. It is shown by the proof submitted by the entryman that he resided upon the land with his family continuously from March 10, 1909; that his improvements are worth $2,000, and consist of a dwelling house 18 by 20 feet, a long stable, granary, milk house, chicken house, well, and fencing.

After the issuance of final certificate upon his entry it was discovered in the General Land Office that the land was patented to the Santa Fe Pacific Railroad Co. in 1904, under a selection made on August 25, 1903, under the act of June 4, 1897 (30 Stat., 36). Under these circumstances the Commissioner of the General Land Office held Villeneuve's entry for cancellation.

Villeneuve has filed a petition for relief, stating that the present owner of the land under the outstanding patent is a Mr. Whiteside, of Duluth, Minn., who has expressed himself as being willing to reconvey the tract to the United States, provided he be allowed to select an equal area of public land elsewhere.

In view of the act of March 3, 1905 (33 Stat., 1264), repealing the act of June 4, 1897, supra, this department has grave doubt of its authority to allow a lieu selection should the land patented to the railroad company be reconveyed to the United States. Moreover, there appears to be no law authorizing this department to accept a reconveyance of land regularly and legally patented, in the absence of fraud or mistake.

It is clearly established by the record in the case that Villeneuve had fully complied with the requirements of the homestead law and is entitled to the relief afforded by the bill under consideration. I have, therefore, the honor to recommend that the bill be enacted.

Very truly, yours,

A. A. JONES,
First Assistant Secretary.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It provides that upon the filing in the Department of the Interior of a proper reconveyance to the United States, previously recorded in the county wherein the land lies, of the southeast quarter of the northwest quarter of section 15, township 162 north, range 57 west, fifth principal meridian, in the Devils Lake (N. Dak.) land district, accompanied by a duly certified abstract showing title in the United States, free of liens and encumbrances, the party or parties making such reconveyance shall be entitled to select, in lieu of said tract, 40 acres of unreserved, vacant, surveyed, nonmineral, and unoccupied public lands. But the selection made under such exchange shall be made within two years after the approval of this act. Section 2 provides that upon the acceptance by the Secretary of the Interior of such reconveyance of the land above described the patent issued therefor to the Santa Fe Pacific Railroad Co. shall be canceled and the homestead entry made for said land on December 5, 1908, by Hyacinthe Villeneuve passed to patent.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE MONROE DOCTRINE AND THE CANNING MYTH.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered yesterday in Philadelphia before the American Academy of Political and Social Science, on "The Monroe doctrine and the Canning myth." I may state——

Mr. WILLIAMS rose.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The Senator from Mississippi is going to interrupt me, and I will state my reason for making this request in just a moment, if the Senator will permit me.

There was published in the New York Herald of yesterday a telegram from Buenos Aires, dated April 2, which says:

BUENOS AIRES, April 2.

The first volume of the writings of President Dr. R. Saenz Pena, which has just been published, is devoted largely to a discussion of the Monroe doctrine, to which he is strongly opposed.

He says, among other things, that the famous State paper is absurd and capricious. It is not merely an interesting anachronism, like the Martello towers of England (which were built along the shores of England in consequence of an incident of the French revolutionary wars), but American Presidents, Dr. Saenz Pena says, have made President Monroe's message so elastic that it might be called the guttapercha message.

Dr. Saenz Pena declares that the United States did absolutely nothing when Canning, the English statesman, confronted all Europe and recognized the independence of the revolted Spanish South American colonies in 1823. He says that if the United States should abandon the Monroe doctrine it would lose nothing of its own nor anything of value.

The Monroe doctrine, President Saenz Pena declares, is one cause of the Latin hostility to the United States.

I ask to have the address to which I have referred printed, for the reason that it dissolves the so-called Canning myth; it shows that the American people did recognize the independence of the South American Republics, and that it was not Canning's proposition at all. The address is an impassionate discussion of the Monroe doctrine.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, all of this is familiar history. As to how far this particular document accurately recites history I do not know, because I have not read it; but I do not see any use in publishing at the expense of the Government everything of a historical character which may happen, in the opinion of a Senator to deal with one side or another of a pertinent inquiry. I object.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I shall proceed to follow the example of the distinguished Senator from Mississippi, and, with the permission of the Senate, I will read the address.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN proceeded to read the address, and was interrupted by—

Mr. WILLIAMS. May I inquire what is the regular order?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The regular order is the introduction of bills and joint resolutions.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I call for the regular order.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I think I have the floor, and I think the rule of the Senate has been to permit a Senator to continue reading an article he desired inserted in the RECORD. I know it was done in the case of the Senator from Mississippi only a day or two ago, when he took advantage of a rule of the Senate and proceeded to have something read into the RECORD. It is all right when it is on his side, Mr. President.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator from Mississippi was taken off his feet by this very motion the other day.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The Senator had the communication read into the RECORD.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The motion was made by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN].

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will say, to refresh the Senator's memory, that he had read into the RECORD a communication from the warden of the State penitentiary of Indiana.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That, however, is always by unanimous consent. If a Senator calls for the regular order, the duty of the Chair is to enforce the rule.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I shall get the article in a little later, Mr. President, thanks to the courtesy of the Senator.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13765) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 18, 19, 21, and 31.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered, 2, 3, 4, 4½, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 20, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 32, 33, and 34, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$380,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 35, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed in line 3 of said amendment insert "$600"; and the Senate agree to the same.

GEORGE E. CHAMBERLAIN,
G. M. HITCHCOCK,
F. E. WARREN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

JAMES HAY,
K. D. MCKELLAR,
D. R. ANTHONY, Jr.,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I move that the conference report be adopted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. On that motion I desire to submit a few observations. I desire to say, in the first instance, that there were practically no changes made in the bill as it passed the Senate. Possibly it was reduced just a little in conference.

In that connection, Mr. President, I desire to read into the RECORD the address to which I called the attention of the Senate a while ago as having particular reference to unsettled conditions and the necessity for the proper maintenance of the Military Academy and of the Army of the United States. This address was delivered by Mr. Charles H. Sherrill——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I desire to ask unanimous consent that the address may be printed as a public document. I think we would all like to read it. That is a better way of handling it than to have it read into the RECORD.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I objected to the reading, and I made the objection upon my responsibility as a Senator. I see no use in publishing at the expense of the Government every little bit of history.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I may say there are some of us who are not so thoroughly informed as is the distinguished Senator from Mississippi. The article contains a bit of information that I have never known before, so I think the Senator ought to make allowance for the weakness of some of us and the lack of information of many of us.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. WILLIAMS. If that article contains any new information about the growth of the Monroe doctrine, it is false information. The old information is correct, and everybody knows about it. I do not know what the document contains and I do not care, nor have I any objection to the Senator bringing it in later, after the morning hour, but I want to get to the calendar, if we can, to consider the bills upon the calendar.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I insist that I have the floor, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oregon has the floor.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, this address was delivered—and it bears broadly on questions before the Senate, as I have stated—by Mr. Charles H. Sherrill, of New York.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I call for the regular order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oregon is in order.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am discussing a motion. I read from the address.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN resumed the reading of the address, and was interrupted by—

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I desire to object to the further consideration of this conference report. It is up only by unanimous consent, and, under the rules of the Senate, an objection can be made at any time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. A conference report is always a privileged matter when brought up by the Senator in charge of it. The Senator from Oregon is in order.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is always in order to call up a conference report, but it is subject to the action of the Senate as to whether or not it shall be considered; and when called up, its consideration proceeds by unanimous consent or by direction of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Its consideration is proceeding; the report has been read, and a motion is before the Senate with regard to it.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I insist that I have the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oregon is entitled to the floor.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I accept the ruling of the Chair, of course.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN resumed the reading of the address, and was interrupted by—

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order. I am trying to hear the Senator from Oregon, but I find it impossible because of the disorder in the Chamber.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I thank the Senator. At least some of the Senators are so well informed about this matter that, I presume, it is not necessary to enlighten them. I request that the Secretary be permitted to read the remainder of the article.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection?

Mr. WILLIAMS. That requires unanimous consent, I believe. I am anxious to get to the calendar and have the bills thereon considered. I shall object to any request which requires unanimous consent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the document be read by the Secretary? [Putting the question.] The ayes have it; and the Secretary will read as requested.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think that requires unanimous consent.

Mr. GALLINGER. No; it does not.

The Secretary read the entire address, as follows:

THE MONROE DOCTRINE AND THE CANNING MYTH.

[Address delivered before the American Academy of Political and Social Science, at the session of Friday afternoon, April 3, by Charles H. Sherrill.]

On the 12th of December, 1826, George Canning, then Prime Minister of England, made the proud statement in the House of Commons: "I called the New World into existence to redress the balance of the Old." This striking sentence, pronounced as it was by one of the greatest figures which the English parliamentary system ever produced, has received wide credence ever since, even our own writers admitting that his suggestions had much to do with the wording and promulgation of the Monroe doctrine. In South America their belief in his controlling part in the acquisition and preservation of their liberty has caused the erection of more than a few monuments to his memory. It is to the credit of those warm-hearted peoples that these testimonials to him were not affected by the frank admission of his boast that he was actuated not by a love for liberty, but by his need for something new to support his foreign policy in European affairs.

The credit for the calling into existence of the New World belongs not to Canning but to the splendid patriotism of those colonists who, by means of many a pitched battle and arduous campaign, drove out the Spanish and even defeated an English army by the River Plate. Theirs is the glory of having alone and unaided gained for themselves the great boon of political independence. All hail, then, to San Martin, to Bolivar, to Sucre, to all their glorious and victorious brothers in arms! We shall see that Canning was equally unentitled to the credit of guaranteeing their hard-won independence against the land hunger of Europe, which has made of Africa a congerie of European dependencies. No; this credit belongs to the people of the United States, who, by means of President Monroe's message, that first clarion call of Pan Americanism, cried out to all the world, "Hands off! These are our sister Republics of this, the hemisphere of freedom."

It is our purpose to-day to show from documents, some long forgotten, some recently published, that Canning himself knew that his boast was an empty one; that his remarks to Rush (American minister in London) had nothing to do with framing the Monroe doctrine; that it was Rush who, entirely without authority, suggested the cooperation of England with America (just as he had suggested it five years before to Castlereagh); that he, Canning, was surprised by the terms of Monroe's message, was opposed to its guaranty of South American liberty as against Spain, and also to its forbidding Europe to plant colonies in this hemisphere.

The chief reason for the credence generally accorded on this side of the ocean to Canning's claim is Rush's expressed belief that Canning's suggestions were largely responsible for the Monroe doctrine. It was but natural that Rush should have come to believe this. He had two sisters married in England, which gave him such an intimate appreciation of the English point of view as to lend perhaps too great a value to their cooperation with his own country. Furthermore, it was only human for him to attach undue importance to certain remarks of Canning's of which he would figure in history as the medium of communication to his own Government. He realized and reported the deep impression made in Europe by the policy announced by President Monroe, but we shall see how far Canning's private views coincided with Rush's beliefs.

Rush tells us that toward the end of August, 1823 (the Monroe doctrine was not announced until December 2 of that year) after he had broached the subject to Canning of England's following our lead in recognizing the independence of the Spanish American colonies (which we had already done in 1822), Canning sounded him as to whether there could be effected some public expression "intimating the joint disapprobation of Great Britain and the United States of any projects which might be cherished by any European power of a forcible enterprise for reducing the (Spanish) colonies to a subjugation on the behalf or in the name of Spain, or the acquisition of any part of them to itself by cession or conquest." A similar proposition was made by Canning to France October 9, 1823. It seems to have been entirely overlooked or forgotten that Canning, when interrogated in Parliament "whether the King of Spain would be allowed by this country to seek to recover his trans-Atlantic colonies," contented himself with stating "that the mother country had the right to attempt to recover her colonies, but that no foreign power had the right to make that attempt in her behalf." How quickly this was forgotten appears from the fact that shortly thereafter, Canning, himself forgetting it, made his famous boast. The struggling colonies heard only of his boast and not of his willingness to return them to Spain, against whom they had just won their independence. Also there has been generally overlooked Rush's report that on November 24, 1823, Canning expressed his belief that a monarchy would be the best form of government for the Spanish colonies—a true friend of struggling Republics indeed!

In many writers there may be noted a certain restlessness—a note of protest that so inspiring a triumph for liberty in our hemisphere as was the continued freedom of the Spanish Colonies should have to acknowledge a source no higher up the stream of international ethics than the scheming of a politician who openly avowed that he had created South American liberty to use it as a pawn in his game of European politics. Must we admit that the Monroe doctrine had its rise in the whirlpool of European chicane and only later joined the majestic stream of liberty whose fountain head was the Declaration of Independence. I have long felt how glaringly incongruous it was that a cause so far removed from international altruism should have produced so glorious a result, but it seemed impossible to find anything from an English source to disprove Canning's words, although many indications were available to show clearly that President Monroe was but announcing a widely cherished policy of the American people and not launching a doctrine either invented by himself or suggested to him by any one European or American statesman. All of these indications antedate Canning's suggestion to Rush. The diary of John Quincy Adams, then Secretary of State, shows that on May 13, 1818, President Monroe propounded the following question at a Cabinet meeting: "Whether the ministers of the United States in Europe shall be instructed that the United States will not join in any project of interposition between Spain and the South Americans which should not be to promote the complete independence of those provinces, and whether measures shall be taken to ascertain if this be the policy of the British Government; and if so, to establish a concert with them for the support of this policy." When, as a result of Rush having introduced the subject, Castlereagh sounded him July 31, 1818, as to a cooperation with the United States in respect to a mediation between Spain and her colonies Rush was already authorized to answer that we would not take part "except on the basis of the independence of the colonies," * * * "a determination to which his Government had come on much deliberation." Note this "on much deliberation," and also that this was a full five years before he heard the suggestion from Canning upon which the latter and his admirers based so much. Jefferson, in a letter of August 4, 1820, to William Short, says: "The day is not far distant when we may formally require a meridian of partition through the ocean which separates the two hemispheres, on the hither side of which no European gun shall ever be heard." No; there should never have been any misunderstanding, at least on this side of the water, as to how generally accepted was this policy of our people to maintain ours as a hemisphere of liberty, nor any ignorance of the fact that Monroe but enunciated an established policy instead of launching a new doctrine. It was but the natural outgrowth and development of Washington's famous declaration against entangling foreign alliances.

Notwithstanding how easy it has always been for any student of American history to show that Canning did not suggest the terms of the Monroe doctrine, it was not until very recently that anything appeared by way of new evidence which could conclusively prove that Canning knew when he made his boast that it was not a true one. The discovery to the world of this new evidence adds another chapter to the romance of historical "finds," the unearthing of which is so delightful to the student seeking the reasons for great events. Let us accompany him into the erudite atmosphere of his library, where lie piled the dusty tomes and unpublished letters that smugly keep their own counsel and their writers' secrets. By such assiduous delving into ancient records did Funck-Brentano learn from the Archives de la Bastille the real identity of the mysterious wearer of the iron mask, about whom Alexandre Dumas wove so delightful a web of fiction. John Fiske tells us in his "American Revolution" that it was a similar quest among the old books in the library of the Strachey family at Sutton Court, in the County of Somerset, England, that brought to light the letter of Gen. Charles Lee, written while in a British prison during the Revolutionary War, which, some 80 years after the event took place, proved him to have been a traitor. How rightly Washington relieved him from his command after his then inexplicable behavior, which so nearly lost us the battle of Monmouth. Imposing is the array of ghosts which have thus accusingly arisen from ancient documents to correct the history of events long misunderstood or incorrectly reported. And from whose forgotten writings shall we obtain unanswerable proof that Canning was not responsible for the Monroe doctrine and did not seek to guarantee the freedom of Spanish America? What source could be more convincing than his own letters to Bagot, English minister to Russia, recently published by a member of the Bagot family? At length we can discard the dramatic statement of a politician made at a strategic moment to support his political purposes and read the facts as privately written by him at the time to an intimate friend.

In an official letter dated at the foreign office, January 9, 1824, just after receiving news of Monroe's famous message, he says to Bagot: "How far that part of the speech of the President which relates to Spanish America may * * * have been prompted by a knowledge of the sentiments of His Majesty's Government upon that subject it is impossible to say." Speaking of the differences between those sentiments and this speech, he goes on to say: "The first and most essential difference is that the Government of the United States have actually acknowledged the independence of the late Spanish colonies, while His Majesty's Government continue * * * still to withhold such recognition. * * * If the message of the President is to be considered as objecting to an attempt to recover her dominions on the part of Spain herself, there is again as important a difference between his view of the subject and ours as perhaps it is possible to conceive." The "New World" which he later claimed to have created could have again become a subject of Spain, if only he be first allowed to use it in "redressing the balance of the Old." Continuing, he says: "It is hardly necessary for me to add * * * that the principle (if principle it may be called) which is brought forward in the President's speech, prohibiting all further colonization on the continent of America, is as new to this Government as to that of France." A frank and full statement that Canning would not oppose our sister Republics losing their liberty to Spain, nor wished them closed in the future to European colonization—could anything be further from the Monroe doctrine? Their temporary liberty was only to suit his political policy, and then, so far as he cared, they could be turned back to Spain or colonized, as have been India or Egypt or Algiers or Tripoli. At last the cat is out of the (letter) bag. As to the long-believed theory that he and Rush (he as the originator and Rush as the transmitter) had contributed greatly to the preparing of the famous doctrine, hear this excerpt from the same letter of Canning: "I lost no time in applying amicably to Mr. Rush for an explanation of that part of the President's speech. Mr. Rush professed to be wholly unprovided with instructions on the subject. He says that he has not heard from his Government since the opening of Congress, nor even received officially a copy of the President's speech." This was privately written in January, 1824, and in December, 1826, Canning had the effrontery to make the public statement in the House of Commons: "I called the New World into existence to redress the balance of the Old." He outdid little Jack Horner in that he not only shouted "What a big boy am I," but also claimed the credit both for pulling out the plum and for baking the pudding. Why not carve on the base of his statues in South America, "He approved the return of Spanish rule. He preferred monarchies instead of Republics in South America."

His lack of interest for the continued freedom of the South Americans, either from a renewed Spanish rule or from their colonization by some other European power, makes it but natural that his first minister accredited to those newly born Republics, Lord Ponsonby, should entertain such an attitude of mind toward them as to write home in 1826: "No eye ever saw so odious a country as this Buenos Aires. I will not trust myself to speak of it"; and on October 17 of the same year to write even more disparagingly of the Brazilians in a letter which tells of "Mr. Canning's approbation of my conduct." It is uplifting to be able to turn from such a viewpoint of the South Americans to the following: "We behold there the glorious spectacle of eighteen millions of people struggling to burst their chains and be free." So spake Henry Clay, the man who had more to do with the recognition of the independence of those colonies, both in baking the pudding and in pulling out the plum, than did ever the boastful Canning. From 1816 on, both in Congress and outside, Henry Clay had never ceased his efforts. In the winter of 1821, long before Canning's suggestion to Rush, Clay secured the passage in Washington of the resolution that "the House of Representatives participate with the people of the United States in the deep interest which they feel for the Spanish Provinces of South America, which are struggling to establish their liberty and independence, and that it will give its constitutional support to the President of the United States whenever he may deem it expedient to recognize the sovereignty and independence of any of the said Provinces." In 1822 President Monroe published the formal recognition, which was the crown on Clay's long struggle. The modern South Americans have forgotten the persistent and intelligently strenuous friendship of Henry Clay, so deceived have they been by constant reiterations of the Canning myth. Their forefathers loved him so well that more than once was there read aloud at the head of their revolutionary armies portions of the speeches he was making in Congress from 1816 to 1820, urging the recognition of their independence. His altruistic efforts in their behalf and interest in their war for freedom finds an echoing note in the touching friendship of Lafayette for our own people under similar circumstances. Henry Clay was actuated by no other motive than admiration for the struggles of a gallant people and a passionate yearning that their independence be once and for all time recognized by his own beloved land, which had by so short a time preceded them in entering the family of nations. Henry Clay was tainted with no wish to use their liberty as a pawn in the game of politics, nor was he willing to give them back to Spain, nor to allow European colonization later on to rob them of their hard-earned sovereignty.

Now that the dusty tomes of old correspondence have given up their secrets, we may at last cast away the belief that there was due to the play of intrigue in European courts that great boon to South America of freedom forever from their intermeddling. No longer need the boast of a sharp-witted politician continue to enjoy the confidence of credulous peoples who knew only of what he publicly said, and not of what he privately wrote. Away with the long-credited myth that put the Monroe doctrine out of step with the majestic onward march of republican free government! The tree of American liberty becomes all the more symmetrical, since we learn that the Monroe doctrine is one of its own branches and not an alien growth grafted upon it. Let the policy announced in Monroe's message fit into its proper place in the orderly sequence of benefits won for political liberty in this hemisphere by that immortal document, the Declaration of Independence, which in express terms acknowledged as its inspiration a Power immeasurably higher than politicians, for whom political liberty is but a tool to use, and, when used, to discard.

One of the most patriotic of all national traits is the respect which the Chinese pay to their ancestors. As among them, so among us, may there always be those who, in Isaiah's phrase, will "show us former things," so that we may jealously guard for our forefathers the glory which they won for our Nation in building the splendid temple of liberty, a pattern for all the peoples of the world to follow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

OMNIBUS CLAIMS BILL.

Mr. GALLINGER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the omnibus claims bill, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

IRRIGATION IN TEXAS.

Mr. SHEPPARD submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 4934) providing for an investigation of the feasibility of irrigation by the reservoir system or plan in Texas in connection with a similar investigation heretofore proposed for Nebraska, Kansas, Oklahoma, New Mexico, and Colorado, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed.

WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION REPORT.

Mr. BRADY submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 326), which was read and referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That 5,000 additional copies of Senate Document No. 419, entitled "Workmen's Compensation Report upon Operation of State Laws, Investigation by Commission of the American Federation of Labor and the National Civic Federation," together with the appendix accompanying said report, be reprinted for the use of the Senate.

AMENDMENTS OF THE RULES.

Mr. OVERMAN. I desire to give notice of a proposed amendment to the rules, relating to conduct in debate in the Senate, and I ask unanimous consent to submit a resolution to be referred to the Committee on Rules.

The resolution (S. Res. 328) was read and referred to the Committee on Rules, as follows:

Resolved, That section 2 of Rule IX of the Senate be amended so as to read as follows:

"No Senator in debate shall, directly or indirectly, by any form of words, impute to another Senator or to other Senators any conduct or motive unworthy or unbecoming a Senator or in any manner refer disrespectfully or offensively to the President of the United States or the Vice President."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I desire to give notice of a proposed amendment to the rules, and I ask unanimous consent to submit a resolution to be referred to the Committee on Rules.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 329), as follows:

Resolved, That Rule XIX be amended by adding, after the first paragraph, the following:

"When a measure is pending before the Senate, debate shall be limited to the discussion of the pending measure. A Senator called to order upon the ground that he is violating this rule shall not be permitted to proceed further unless he states that in good faith he is endeavoring to discuss the measure before the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I suggest that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Rules.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That action will be taken.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Now, Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. LODGE. May I ask the Senator——

PROPOSED RULE RELATIVE TO EXECUTIVE SESSIONS.

Mr. KENYON. I offer a resolution.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have the floor, I believe, but I will yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. LODGE. I ask the Senator if he will be kind enough to yield to me merely to give notice.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is one matter before the Senate. The Senator from Iowa offers a resolution, which will be read.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Has the Senator from Georgia assumed the rôle of indicating what morning business shall be attended to and what shall not? Must we ask his consent to introduce a resolution?

The VICE PRESIDENT. If that inquiry is put to the Chair, the Chair has no means of knowing what the mental attitude of the Senator from Georgia may be. The Chair recognized the Senator from Georgia, and he had the floor for any legitimate purpose, and he yielded it temporarily.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I make a point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Washington makes a point of order, which he will state.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I make the point of order that the regular order can not be set aside without unanimous consent.

Mr. LODGE. A motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business is in order at any time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. A motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business is always in order.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask that the resolution sent to the desk be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution submitted by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 327) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That it is the judgment of the Senate that all executive sessions shall hereafter be open to the public, except when treaties are considered or when the Senate, by unanimous consent, orders otherwise; and the Committee on Rules is directed to prepare such amendments to the present rules, or to prepare new rules, or both, as may be necessary to carry out the terms of this resolution, and present the same to the Senate for action thereon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will lie over.

PANAMA CANAL TOLLS.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will withhold the motion for a moment, I merely desire to give notice that on Thursday next, April 9, immediately after the conclusion of the morning business, I shall ask permission to address the Senate on the question of canal tolls.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do.

Mr. THOMAS. I have given notice that I would occupy the attention of the Senate this morning upon a bill relating to the same subject, and was not informed until after the session began that there was a unanimous consent yesterday which makes that impossible.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. Therefore I give notice that on Friday, the 10th instant, at the close of the routine business, I shall address the Senate on Senate bill 5101.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS—SARAH A. WALRER.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes, sir.

Mr. BRISTOW. I desire to inquire if there was unanimous consent given yesterday? I did not understand that there was any unanimous consent as to an executive session. I thought that was refused.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There was no unanimous consent.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will say to the Senator that I consider myself bound to press a motion to go into executive session at the earliest possible moment this morning after the presentation of formal resolutions and motions.

Mr. TILLMAN. After the morning business is over?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; the routine morning business. I think it would be my duty to press it before any subject should be taken up that would involve discussion or take up any considerable length of time. I am simply in good faith seeking to comply with what I understand is my obligation to the Senate.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield to the Senator from Kansas first.

Mr. BRISTOW. I desire to submit an order and ask for its immediate consideration. It will not involve any discussion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The order will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Ordered, That papers in the case of Mrs. Sarah A. Walker, filed with the Committee on Pensions in connection with a special pension bill (S. 171) be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, no adverse report having been made thereon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the order will be agreed to.

SURVEY OF ALASKAN WATERS.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield for routine morning business.

Mr. TILLMAN. It will not take a minute. I desire to have some matter printed in the RECORD.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If it will only take the time the Senator suggests, I yield.

Mr. TILLMAN. I wish to have printed in the RECORD the letters I send to the desk and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Without being read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without being read.

There being no objection, the letters were referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COMMITTEE ON RIVERS AND HARBORS,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., April 4, 1914.

Hon. BENJAMIN R. TILLMAN,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Inclosed find letter I have received signed by several steamship companies operating between Seattle and Alaska. It tells a startling story of the loss of human life and shows a great impediment to commerce due to uncharted rocks in Alaskan waters.

This question becomes of greater importance in view of the determination of the Government to construct a railroad in Alaska. The traffic in Alaskan waters must greatly increase in the immediate future. May I ask you to give this letter your personal attention, and that you file it for future reference.

Sincerely, yours,

W. E. HUMPHREY.

PACIFIC COAST STEAMSHIP CO.,
Seattle, February 12, 1914.

Hon. W. E. HUMPHREY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

SIR: The striking of an uncharted rock at Gambier Bay in southeastern Alaska by the steamship State of California on August 17, 1913, resulting in the loss of the vessel and of 32 lives, following the striking of an uncharted rock by the steamship Mariposa in Sumner Straits on August 13, 1912, and by the steamship Ohio in Tongass Narrows on July 14, 1909, emphasizes the need of a resurvey of the main ship channels of the inside passage of southeastern Alaska. The charts published by the United States Coast and Geodetic Survey show a depth of 12½ fathoms (75 feet) where the steamship State of California struck, a depth of 111 fathoms (666 feet) where the steamship Mariposa struck, and a depth of 30 fathoms (180 feet) where the steamship Ohio struck.

Tongass Narrows and Sumner Straits are stretches of water which have been used by vessels since the inception of trade to Alaska. Gambier Bay has been used for the past two years, since a cannery industry was established therein. The steamship State of California had made 16 trips in and out of this bay during that time, and there have been several other vessels employed in the trade.

These rocks are what are known as pinnacle formations, which are peculiar to the waters of southeastern Alaska, and their character is such that they frequently escape the sounding lead where the usual method of survey is followed.

The officials of the Coast Survey express the opinion that the only way in which the presence of pinnacle rocks in the main ship channels can be ascertained is by wire dragging, and in this opinion seafaring men concur. To undertake this work for the entire distance between the boundary line and the northern limits of the Inside Passage will require additional equipment and larger appropriations. We submit that the number of passengers traveling on vessels navigating these waters and the large increase in the number of vessels employed in the trade justify the Government in incurring whatever expense may be necessary to locate these hidden pinnacles.

If a bill for the building of railroads in Alaska passes Congress, there will be a large increase in the movement of merchandise and construction material and in the number of people traveling, and the vessels handling the increased business resulting from the opening up of Alaska will use the Inside Passage.

While the value of the merchandise carried by vessels plying the waters referred to and the value of the vessels themselves is large we feel that the protection of human life to the greatest possible extent is of paramount importance, and should influence the granting of sufficient appropriations to enable the Department of Commerce to institute immediately the work of wire dragging the main ship channels and to prosecute it with the utmost dispatch.

There have been and are to-day various measures under consideration for the better protection of life at sea. We submit that there is no measure of greater importance in this respect to the public of the Northwest than the resurvey of the Inside Passage of southeastern Alaska.

The department will require an increased appropriation for this work and, we understand, has submitted or will submit to Congress its estimate of what is considered necessary for proper equipment and for field expenses, and we respectfully urge you to do everything in your power to secure this appropriation.

Respectfully, yours,

PANAMA CANAL TOLLS.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will yield to the Senator to make a motion.

Mr. POINDEXTER. To make a request?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes; to make a request. I yield to anything that does not violate what I understand to be my obligation to the Senate made yesterday.

Mr. POINDEXTER. In view of the motion which the Senator from Georgia is about to make, I ask that Senate resolution 323, which comes over to-day under the rule, may go over without prejudice.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It does go over. The Chair announces that as a matter of law it does go over.

Mr. POINDEXTER. From day to day?

The VICE PRESIDENT. From day to day, until reached in the regular order of morning business.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It retains the same place?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It retains the same place. We have not yet reached resolutions coming over from a preceding day.

MINING ON THE PUBLIC DOMAIN.

Mr. MYERS. Will the Senator from Georgia yield to me for a moment?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. MYERS. I have pending a motion which evidently will not be reached if the motion the Senator from Georgia is about to make should prevail. It is a motion to take Senate bill 4898 from the Committee on Mines and Mining and refer it to the Committee on Public Lands. It has dragged along for some time and has been postponed for one reason or another. Apparently it will not be reached to-day, but I wish to give notice now, and I hope all interested will take notice, that on Monday, if I get a chance to call it up, I shall press for action and ask for a vote. I think it has been pending long enough. I will try to get it to a vote on Monday.

Mr. WALSH. Will the Senator from Georgia yield to me for a moment?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. I shall probably not be able to be here on Monday. I do not wish to delay this measure any further. Accordingly, as far as I am concerned, the order requested by the Senator from Montana, my colleague, on behalf of the Committee on Public Lands, may be entered. I feel certain that it is a wrong disposition to make of the bill, but I want to divest the question of any personal consideration.

I may say, Mr. President, that with it, however, another bill was offered by me, Senate bill 4983. If the bill referred to goes to the Committee on Public Lands, Senate bill 4983 should go likewise to that committee.

Mr. MYERS. I should like to say in this connection that, of course, if my colleague sees fit to resist the motion he is perfectly privileged to do so, and I would not under any circumstances press for a vote on Monday or any other day in his absence. But in view of his statement I will let the motion take the usual course and come up on Monday.

Mr. WALSH. I do not resist the application now. I wanted to have the bill go to the Committee on Mines and Mining in the first place simply that it might be expedited. I do not want to stand in the way of its speedy consideration by any committee.

If the Senator from Georgia will pardon me just a moment further, I desire to say it was intended by these two bills to put in operation with respect to coal lands both the sales system and the leasing system.

This bill provides for the sales system; the other for a leasing system; and they should be considered together.

If the Senator from Georgia will further pardon me, I have repeatedly asked the consideration of the Senate to Senate bill 4405, a bill in relation to the disposition of lands containing radium-bearing ores, a measure of the most extreme urgency. Indeed, if the bill does not receive consideration from the Senate speedily, it never will be of any use at all. I am accordingly going to ask unanimous consent that the consideration of that bill be made the special order for Tuesday at 2 o'clock.

Mr. GALLINGER. The roll would have to be called.

Mr. SMOOT. The roll would have to be called at this time.

Mr. WALSH. Then I move that the bill be made a special order for 2 o'clock on Tuesday.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do not understand what is the motion of the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH. It is that the bill commonly known as the radium bill be made the special order for 2 o'clock on Tuesday.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Does the Senator make a motion to that effect?

Mr. WALSH. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wish to say to the Senator the difficulty about that motion is that it is a motion which is subject to debate.

Mr. WALSH. If there is going to be any debate——

Mr. McCUMBER. There will be debate.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I wish to state that the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] is not here this morning.

Mr. THOMAS. I shall be compelled to object.

Mr. WALSH. I desire to say that I have conferred with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] on the matter, and it is entirely agreeable to him, and he desires that such a motion shall be made.

Mr. THOMAS. My colleague [Mr. SHAFROTH] is to-day unavoidably absent, and he requested me if this matter came up to object to its consideration. Because of his absence, I shall therefore be compelled to object to its consideration.

Mr. WALSH. Let me say to the Senator from Colorado that his colleague has repeatedly stated to me that he would be glad to have the bill come up at any time, and I suppose he had in contemplation that it might come up for consideration to-day.

Mr. THOMAS. My understanding of his message to me this morning is that if the matter was pressed for consideration in any form he would like to have me object to it. I have no objection personally.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I feel that I should not yield to that motion, because I am sure it will take up the time that we are undertaking to give to something else.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to ask a question of the Senator from Montana?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. Was the motion of the Senator from Montana to make the bill a special order?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. Upon what day?

Mr. WALSH. Tuesday at 2 o'clock.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, the difficulty about that is that we have a matter of unfinished business that we are to take up on Monday, which we may not finish by 2 o'clock on Tuesday; and undoubtedly the friends of that measure would wish to debate the proposition of assigning some other measure for 2 o'clock on Tuesday.

Mr. WALSH. If the Senator from Georgia will pardon me, under the rules the unfinished business has the precedence, and it would go on continuously. This would simply follow the unfinished business.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The proposition for a special order, I am sure, would lead to debate.

Mr. WALSH. Of course, I am making the motion by the courtesy of the Senator, and I shall not press it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the Senate were ready to pass upon it without debate——

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senate will not pass on it without debate, and a long debate, because we have another bill, which has had justly the right of way, and I shall not consent to lay aside that bill without debate and without good reasons being given for such action.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I desire to state to the Senator from North Dakota that I trust he does not understand that I am endeavoring to displace his bill.

Mr. McCUMBER. The effect would be to displace it.

Mr. WALSH. Not at all. Under the rules his bill, being the unfinished business, has precedence over any special order.

Mr. McCUMBER. According to the present rule it is not the unfinished business.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not think I should yield longer.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 3 hours and 38 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, April 6, 1914, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, April 4, 1914.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal and ever-living God, our heavenly Father, from whom no secrets are hid, we freely confess our weakness and our sins, and most fervently pray for Thy forgiveness. Thou knowest that the spirit is willing but the flesh is weak. Bear with us, O we beseech Thee, and create within us clean hearts, and renew a right spirit within, that we may take up life anew from this moment and press forward to larger achievements and greater victories under Thy guidance, sustained by Thy strength; in the spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 15279, the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 15279, the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, with Mr. GARNER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

LIBRARY OF CONGRESS.

General administration: Librarian, $6,500; chief assistant librarian, $4,000; chief clerk, $2,500; librarian's secretary, $1,800; clerks—1 at $1,200, 2 at $1,000 each; stenographers and typewriters—1, $1,200, 1, $780; messenger, $840; messenger to chief assistant librarian, $540; junior messenger, $420; operator of photographic copying machine, $600; in all, $22,380.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, I was one of the Members of the House who voted against the present currency bill, and I did it very largely upon the ground that it contained provisions which would make it largely political and which would bring our banking system into politics. Gentlemen from that side of the House held up their hands in horror when the suggestion was made that anyone would ever play politics with the business of this country. Well, Mr. Chairman, the first step has been taken. These reserve banks have been designated. The board to designate them consisted of three men, and each one of those three men was a Democrat, and it is a fact worthy of note that each city that furnished one of the members of this committee has been designated as one of the reserve cities. I do not believe there is one man out of one hundred unprejudiced who would say that Richmond, Va., ought to have been designated as one of those cities. Think of the absurdity of Baltimore, a great business, financial center like that city, doing business through Richmond, to say nothing of the city of Washington.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Does the gentleman think it would have been wise to have designated Baltimore as a reserve city, inasmuch as Philadelphia, so near by, was designated, and New York, just beyond Philadelphia?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I do not know what cities it would have been wise to designate, but certainly it was not wise to designate Richmond, a city comparatively small in population and in business. So far as I have been able to see, there is one reason for the designation of Richmond, and that is Mr. John Skelton Williams. Then we have in Missouri—and far be it from me to say anything derogatory of the great State of Missouri—two out of the twelve reserve cities in that State, and there is a reason for that—Francis David Houston. Five of those cities that are designated are in the portion of the country that does less than one-fifth of the business of the entire country. There are two apparent reasons for this—Francis David Houston and John Skelton Williams.

Mr. HAMLIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. No; not just now. I am not inclined to criticize these gentlemen. I think they acted according to what they thought was wise and fair in the matter; but this simply shows where you go when you appoint a partisan board. These gentlemen took with them their partisanship in politics and their prejudice of location; so we have the result that five of these cities are located in that portion of the country that does one-fifth of the business—perhaps less. We have one on the Pacific coast, and the others are in that portion which does three-fourths of the business——

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Certainly.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. What cities would the gentleman suggest?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I do not make any suggestion. I am simply calling attention to the fact that you have started playing politics at the very beginning in the administration of this law, and, I suppose, this is only the beginning. I wanted to call attention to the fact, because so many gentlemen on that side were so indignant when the suggestion was made when we were considering the legislation in the House.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, the mere statement of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] that the board has been actuated by politics in what it has done, of course, is not conclusive. If the gentleman had any facts upon which to base his statement, and showed the resources of the various districts—the capital and surplus of the banks located in them, and the financial necessities of the various sections of the country—the statement might be given some attention by Members here as well as those charged with the duty of designating the cities and making the districts. It is somewhat peculiar to find a gentleman from that section of the country which has been continuously clamoring because capital naturally gravitated to the great financial metropolis of the country, the city of New York, complaining about the arrangement of these districts, whereby there is cut off from the city of New York a large territory that many persons actually believe should be given to it, and complaining that the reserve banks are placed in sections of the country in which it was asserted that it was desirable to place them, and thus prevent such concentration of bank capital and the financial resources of the country, which, it has been asserted, had been interfering with proper progress and development of other sections. Mr. Chairman, any legitimate criticism of the action of public officials is not only proper, but desirable; but a mere rehash on the floor of this House of all irresponsible statements printed in the public press of the country—without any foundation in fact—constitutes a mere gratuitous assault upon the motives actuating public officials, and, I am quite certain, will have no effect here or elsewhere. It may be or it may not be that some selections could be improved on; that the arrangement within certain districts could more properly have been made in another way than the way in which they have been made.

But in order to justify such criticisms the gentleman should come prepared with the facts that would enable Members of the House as well as the country, which is interested, to form an intelligent opinion. I might say that nobody familiar with the "impartial" and "nonpartisan" character of the remarks usually indulged in by the gentleman from Washington when criticizing Democratic officials will be persuaded that his complaint is just unless it is fortified by such an overwhelming array of facts as to be conclusive beyond any question.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Just a moment in reply to the remarks made by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY]. He charges that members of the board to select the reserve cities played politics in making their selection. I do not know of anyone who stands in the class with the gentleman from Washington when it comes to playing politics. I have served in the House with him here for a number of years, and I think he stands in a class by himself. He can not talk even about timber, shingles, or anything else without giving a political flavor to his discussion.

It is not fair to the great Secretary of Agriculture, who is a member of this board, to insinuate or intimate that because he happens to be upon this board which selected these reserve cities two were selected in Missouri—St. Louis and Kansas City. It is only fair to the House and the country to say that Mr. Secretary Houston has not resided in the State of Missouri over two years of his life. As I understand it, he was born in North Carolina and lived in Missouri only two years; but if he had lived there all his life, that would not have influenced him one iota, and to intimate or insinuate that he was influenced by his short residence in Missouri in selecting two Missouri cities as reserve cities is very, very unfair and unworthy of the gentleman from Washington. I am sure, when he comes to think about it, he will withdraw that insinuation. St. Louis and Kansas City were doubtless selected because of the fact that these two cities are the business centers of a great territory covering six or seven of the greatest and most productive States of the Union. They were not selected simply because Mr. Houston happened to have lived in Missouri for the short period of a couple of years. Such a thing as residence, of course, never entered the mind, I am quite confident, of any member of that board, and the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] does not do himself any credit when he makes such an insinuation.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the motion of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN].

Mr. Chairman, as a native-born Missourian, I am, of course, always happy when any honors come to my native State, but as a resident, a citizen, and a Representative of the great and glorious Commonwealth of Wyoming I have sincere regrets that the good fortune of Missouri is not, in the case at hand, the good fortune of Wyoming.

The law providing for the location of regional banks provided—I do not recall the exact language—that these banks should be located with a view to accommodating the business of the country, and that the regional districts should be so adjusted as to follow the usual lines of business, or something of that sort. Now, out in our mountain State we had hoped and expected that either Denver or Omaha would be selected as the site of a regional bank, and either place would have been fairly satisfactory to our people—Omaha perhaps the more satisfactory. We finally heard that neither Omaha nor Denver was to be thus honored, and then we expected, of course, in that event, we would be included in the region whose regional bank would be in the city of Chicago, which is to us an available banking center. But lo and behold, my native State, and the State which is honored by the residence of one of the gentlemen serving on the organization board, it appears, is to have two regional reserve banks. And while we all appreciate the banking power and the political influence of the city down on the "Big Muddy," it so happens that but a trifling part of our business goes to Kansas City, and, in my opinion, it will completely disorganize the banking business of Wyoming to have the State included in the Kansas City banking district.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. The proviso to which I referred in the bill is as follows:

Provided, That districts shall be apportioned with due regard to the convenience and customary course of business of the community.

And so forth.

Now, I will guarantee there is not of record anywhere utterances on the part of responsible citizens of the State of Wyoming to the effect that it is to the convenience of business of that State to do its Federal banking business at Kansas City.

Mr. HELVERING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. In just a moment. I will venture the opinion that there has not been, in writing or verbally, suggestions made by citizens of our State in favor of being included in the Kansas City regional bank district. But, on the contrary, the evidence before the board must have been to the effect that in the ordinary and customary course of business our State should be in a regional district of a bank located either at Denver, Omaha, or Chicago.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Order and accession: Chief of division, $2,500; assistants—1, $1,500, 1, $1,200, 3, at $960 each, 2, at $780 each, 2, at $600 each, 1, $580; 2 junior messengers, at $420 each; in all, $12,260.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I have understood from the explanatory speech of the chairman of the committee that it was the intention to increase all the subordinate employees connected with the Library of Congress having a salary of $900 and under, $60 per annum. I notice in the paragraph under consideration and also in another paragraph following that there are two employees at $600 each in each of these respective paragraphs whose salaries have not been proportionately increased by the stated $60. Will the chairman inform the committtee why they made the exception in the instances stated?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, as the report states, the salaries of 135 people in the Library of Congress were increased $60 each. All the people whose salaries were increased $60 were estimated for by the librarian. I did not intend to convey the impression that every person in the library who received less than $900 had had an increase in his salary. There are twenty-odd persons whose salaries are less than $900 and have not been increased. The places are not permanently filled. The people who hold those places are employed temporarily, for a month or two at a time. They are doing very menial service, and the librarian thinks it is ample compensation for the work which they do. The librarian did not ask any increase.

Mr. STAFFORD. I assume these 30 or more that have not received this increase are not in the classified service the same as the others who have received the increase?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. No; none of these are in the classified service, but they would not rank as skilled laborers. They are just common laborers around the building, such as those who keep the grass in order and things of that kind.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman takes his seat will he yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. Are any of the employees in the Library of Congress at the present time in the classified service?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. They are not.

Mr. MURDOCK. How are they appointed?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. By the librarian.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman will remember that within the last two years there has been a movement to put them in the classified service?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I think perhaps there may have been, but it has never been done.

Mr. MURDOCK. Is it contemplated to put them in the classified service eventually? Does the gentleman know?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. The Library of Congress is a part of this body, I may say to the gentleman.

Mr. MURDOCK. And the appointments are made upon the recommendation of Members in this body?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I think they are not.

Mr. MURDOCK. I have always been in doubt about how those appointments are made. I would like to know.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I think they are made, to all intents and purposes, as though they were in the classified service. I never hear of any changes.

Mr. TALCOTT of New York. Is it not true that regular examinations are held for the purpose of determining the qualifications of candidates for appointment?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. No, sir. I do not think they have regular examinations, but all persons who desire to be employed in the Library of Congress are furnished with a blank which they must fill out. That blank requires a full account of their educational qualifications, where they attended school, how long they attended, what schools they are the graduates of, and what business experience they have had, and particularly what library experience they have had. Now, I do not know whether any other influence amounts to anything or not. Speaking for myself, I can say I have never had anything to do with patronage there.

Mr. MURDOCK. Has there been any material change in the personnel over there?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. So far as I know, there have been no changes whatever.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. FOWLER. I would like to ask the gentleman from South Carolina under whose auspices are these examinations held?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I have not said that they have examinations. I say that that application, when filled out, is in itself a pretty good examination.

Mr. FOWLER. That is the same character of examination as the Civil Service Commission is holding with reference to employees for railroad, telegraph, and telephone valuation. Now, under whose auspices are those appointments made?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Let me say to the gentleman that if the gentleman has a constituent who desires to be employed in the Library of Congress, if he will furnish the name to the Librarian, that person will be furnished with one of the blanks to fill out, and that application will be filed, along with from three to five thousand other applications, and probably out of that great number during the course of a year half a dozen appointees will be selected.

Mr. FOWLER. Does the gentleman mean to say that the Librarian has the control of all of these examinations?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I mean to say that he furnishes the blank upon which the applicant shows his qualification; yes.

Mr. FOWLER. Now, by what authority does he get the right to hold these examinations in the way in which the gentleman has indicated? Did Congress confer that right upon him?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. By reason of his authority as the Librarian of Congress. The entire force in that building is under his control.

Mr. FOWLER. By what authority?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Wait a minute. He is responsible for the management of that Library. He has a right to employ men or women with or without examinations. He adopted this method to satisfy himself as to the efficiency of the applicant, as the gentleman or any other person wishing to secure the services of anyone may inquire into that person's capacity.

Mr. FOWLER. Where did he get that authority?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. It is inherent in the position that he holds.

Mr. FOWLER. Does the law providing for the Librarian confer upon him the authority to make all of the appointments in that mighty institution?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I think it does.

Mr. FOWLER. And does it confer upon him the sole right to make the selection of all the subordinates in that institution?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I think it does.

Mr. MURDOCK. He would not make them if it did not.

Mr. THACHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. FOWLER. Yes.

Mr. THACHER. I wish to say to the gentleman from Illinois that our distinguished chairman of the Committee on the Library is at home ill to-day, but as a member of that committee I wish to say that the authority comes from the act of Congress of 1897. In December of the year 1896 there was a lengthy discussion in the House on this subject, and the act was passed in the early part of 1897——

Mr. FOWLER. I yielded to the gentleman only for a question.

Mr. THACHER. This is a very important matter, Mr. Chairman, and I would like to have the opportunity to explain. An act was passed by Congress which provides that the appointees shall be selected by the Librarian of Congress, and upon the application blanks the law is printed, which is as follows:

> The law provides that the employees in the Library service shall "be selected by the Librarian of Congress, by reason of special aptitude for the work of the Library, including the copyright work"; and, further, "that all persons employed in * * * said Library of Congress under the Librarian * * * shall be appointed solely with reference to their fitness for their particular duties."

That is a part of the law, and that is printed at the head of the application for appointment in the Library service.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired. The Clerk will read.

Mr. THACHER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for an extension of my time for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FOWLER. Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. THACHER], who is a member of the Committee on the Library, has the blank in his hand from which he reads what somebody else has said is the law. While I have not gone into this question myself, yet I do feel that there ought to be some certainty about these appointments, and that they are of such a high character that if civil service is good for one class of our Federal employees it ought to be good for the persons who hold positions in that important institution.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota rose.

Mr. FOWLER. Now, Mr. Chairman, I will yield to the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman. I want to state for the information of the gentlemen of the House that I think the distinguished gentleman in charge of the bill [Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina] made a statement that is misleading when he stated that appointments in the Congressional Library are made upon recommendation of Members of the House. I have served in this House for some years; I was a member of the Committee on the Library for some years; and I can say that there never has been an appointment made upon my recommendation, and I have never heard any Member say that he was able to get an appointment in the Library.

Mr. FOWLER. Has the gentleman ever made any recommendations?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I have called upon the Librarian, as I presume other Members have, with a view to ascertaining if it were possible to secure the appointment of a person in the Library, and was informed that there are as many as 8,000 applications pending. The chances of appointment are very remote, at best, and the appointments are made by the Librarian, in accordance with the suggestion of the gentleman from Massachusetts, with regard to experience, qualification, and fitness for the position, and they are not made upon the recommendation of Members of this House or Senators.

Mr. FOWLER. That is my experience.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I want to state that the gentleman who was chairman of the Committee on the Library for many years, Mr. McCall, who came from the State from which the Librarian comes, the State of Massachusetts, told me that he never had an appointment in the Library during his service as chairman of the committee.

Mr. FOWLER. Does the gentleman know of any Member of Congress who ever did get an appointment on his recommendation?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I never have heard of one.

Mr. FOWLER. This being only my second term, I have made some efforts to get a man into that Library, a man who has read more books than any man in the State of Illinois, and I believe more than any man in the United States; but I did not receive any encouragement in my effort to secure his appointment.

Mr. RUCKER. I want to say to the gentleman that I had an experience worse than his.

Mr. FOWLER. Was your man worse treated than my man?

Mr. RUCKER. He had read more books than anybody in Missouri; and, of course, that was far more than anybody in Illinois. [Laughter.]

Mr. FOWLER. Did that disqualify him?

Mr. RUCKER. No; but there were 10,000 applicants ahead of him.

Mr. FOWLER. I thought the appointments were made upon efficiency.

Mr. RUCKER. I presume they are. I have no reason to question that.

Mr. FOWLER. Do you know of any incompetent men?

Mr. RUCKER. I presume the trouble with your man was the same as with mine. I presume it required technical knowledge that my man did not have, and I presume yours did not have.

Mr. PAYNE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOWLER. I yield to the distinguished gentleman from New York.

Mr. PAYNE. I understand the gentleman has been making an application and trying to get some one appointed there and has not been successful. That would show, at least, that the appointments are entirely outside of what is called the spoils system, and that no political influence has anything to do with it, because with the great influence that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] has in his party if political influence had had anything to do with it the Librarian would have appointed his man a long time ago.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I want to say a word. The gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE] is entirely correct in his statement that political considerations have nothing to do with appointments in the Library. The appointments in the Library are not made upon the recommendation of either Senators or Representatives, but solely with the question in view of whether or not the person appointed is fitted by education, experience, and natural ability to fill the place to which he or she is appointed, and it is for that reason that the Librarian prepares the statement which has been referred to by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSON], and also, I think, by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. THACHER]. It is for the purpose of obtaining this information before making an appointment.

Mr. SMITH of New York. Does the gentleman know this of his own personal knowledge, or is that statement made as a result of information he has from some other source?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I get this information from the Librarian; not only personally but also from the hearings which were had by the subcommittee; and I know further that notwithstanding the fact that I have had the privilege of making one or two recommendations and urging the Librarian to make one or two appointments, I have never been able to succeed, and the Librarian always assured me that while he would take the applicant under consideration, of course he had to consider the question of getting the person best fitted to perform the work. The Librarian had something to say on this subject in the hearings, and among other things he said this, which I think should go into the RECORD:

It would be quite absurd not to get the benefit, Mr. Chairman, of anything that a Senator or Representative can tell us about any applicant, and I am always glad to get it; but the controlling basis of the appointment is the qualifications of the people appointed, and it would be exhibited, for instance, in this [indicating], which is just such a statement, showing every person now in the service and the education, training, and previous experience of everyone appointed since 1899, when I took office. While that is too extensive for the record, the fact that such a statement is always available is, I think, worth knowing. I do not think that anyone who knows about the service of the Library would for a moment consider that appointments have been subject to political considerations in the sense in which that word is used. As a matter of fact, ninety-nine one-hundredths of the communications we receive from Members of Congress—I do not know that you care to have this go into the record—but 99 per cent of the communications received in behalf of people who desire appointment in the Library are in behalf of persons who could not be of the slightest political benefit to the writers.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I wish to add my voice to what the gentleman has just said and read. The present Librarian is a native of the great State of Minnesota, which stands to-day in educational matters as high as any State in the Union. He was a personal friend of mine before he was appointed Librarian, and has continued so ever since. For 11 years on various occasions I have attempted, through my personal friendship and otherwise, to get an appointee in the Library. The Librarian has emphatically refused, because, he says, "Mr. DAVIS, I do not believe the applicants you have brought to me are equal to some now on the waiting list for the position." Politics has nothing to do with it; friendship has nothing to do with it; but it is purely a question of efficiency, and in 11 years I have never been able to get an appointment in that Library. I simply say this to add to what the gentleman has read and to testify to the high qualifications of the present Librarian, Mr. Putnam.

Mr. THACHER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield the floor, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. THACHER. Mr. Chairman, a question was raised a moment ago as to the authenticity of the regulations for the appointment of employees in the Library. I wish to read the law passed in the Fifty-fourth Congress, United States Statutes at Large, Fifty-fourth Congress, second session, chapter 265, 1897:

LIBRARY OF CONGRESS.

For the following, to be selected by the Librarian of Congress by reason of special aptitude for the work of the Library, including the copyright work.

And then, on page 545:

Provided, That all persons employed in and about said Library of Congress under the Librarian or the Superintendent of the Library Building and Grounds shall be appointed solely with reference to their fitness for their particular duties.

Mr. Chairman, I ask permission to insert a little data in regard to the appointments, with reference to the geographical areas for which the appointments are made. I am glad that this discussion has arisen, because I think it is only fair to Members and to the Library, and to the Librarian himself, who takes great pride in the Library, that I take this opportunity to state certain facts. The Librarian tries as far as possible to make the appointments so that every part of the United States may be represented. Gentlemen know that that method is attempted to be followed in all the departments in Washington. I will put in the RECORD data showing that the appointments at the Library represent, in as great a degree as the classified service itself, an apportionment by geographical area, even though the law does not itself require apportionment, as it does in the classified service.

Mr. COX. Can the gentleman tell us how many are in the Library now from the District of Columbia?

Mr. THACHER. It will all appear in the RECORD, but I can give it to the gentleman now. There are 66 from the District of Columbia. I will say that there are a few more people from Virginia, Maryland, and the District of Columbia than their quota would perhaps call for, because men and women living here are at less expense living at home, and it does not entail a long trip as it would if they came from Dakota, Massachusetts, or some other State. The whole method is eminently fair, worthy of Congress and worthy of the Librarian.

Let me further say that the appointment of the 384 employees of the Library by the Librarian under the act of Congress of 1897 is absolutely free from any political or personal influence. These appointments are made solely for merit and fitness. Furthermore, I hold in my hand a printed list of the employees of the Library with their qualifications, which list is open for inspection at the Library to Members of Congress and others. I will put in the RECORD a statement of Mr. Herbert Putnam, the Librarian, to this effect.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The data is as follows:

STATEMENT OF MR. HERBERT PUTNAM, LIBRARIAN OF CONGRESS, MADE JANUARY 14, 1914, AT A HEARING BEFORE SUBCOMMITTEE OF HOUSE COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. GOOD. Do you keep in your office a list of every person employed, showing the positions they previously filled as well as the names of the persons recommending them?

Mr. PUTNAM. Yes, sir.

Mr. GOOD. And that is open to any person?

Mr. PUTNAM. Absolutely open. The form of application itself tabulates very fully the previous experience and education of the person, and that, of course, is the initial document. But every letter and all these facts are open to anyone.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to add one word and to put in the RECORD a statement made by the Librarian which I think is illuminative of the subject. He says:

As a matter of fact, ninety-nine one-hundredths of the communications we receive from Members of Congress—I do not know that you care to have this go into the record—but 99 per cent of the communications received in behalf of people who desire appointment in the Library are in behalf of persons who could not be of the slightest political benefit to the writers.

They are very apt to be women suddenly thrown on their own resources and for whom, because of some reason or other, a Senator or Representative feels a sympathy. Perhaps a husband may have been a constituent, and it is natural that the Senator or Representative shall help the widow if possible.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I think there can be no question in the mind of any Member of this House that it would be very much better for the service if such recommendations can not even be considered. If it shall be known and if Representatives can say that it will be useless for them to make recommendations for positions with the Librarian, it will be a defense to them and save them embarrassment and trouble. That it will be a great benefit to the service if the librarian can have an absolutely free hand in these matters does not need to be argued.

Mr. SMITH of New York. Why would it not be better to put all the appointees under the civil service?

Mr. TOWNER. For the reason that in the library, more than in any other business or work that I know of, it is important and almost necessary that the librarian shall have a free hand in the selection of the employees. That is one thing upon which all of the library experts and men who have been responsible for the wonderful development of library efficiency in the last few years agree. It is everywhere admitted that so far as possible each library should be built up with reference to the particular character of library that is under consideration. As the gentleman from New York well knows, the Library of Congress has an individuality of itself that is different from any other library in the United States, and to a remarkable degree that is true of every other library. In other words, the library must be adjusted to its particular community, to the people who are to be served by it, and that adjustment must be made by the librarian. Upon him should be placed the responsibility for such adjustment, and the entire administration should be directed to that end. It is needless to say that he should have a free hand in the selection of his assistants.

Mr. TALCOTT of New York. Does the gentleman believe that if appointments made by any other method were followed the present efficiency of the Library would be maintained for a month?

Mr. TOWNER. No; it would be within a short time a national disgrace instead of a national honor.

Mr. COX. Why not put them under civil service, and give to the educators of the country the power to frame up what the course of examination shall be in order to secure an appointment?

Mr. TOWNER. For the reason that I have just stated. Each library must stand on a plane of its own, and in order to secure efficiency, in order to adjust the library to the particular community which it is to serve, in order that the library may develop along that line, the librarian must have a free hand. No examination on general lines could determine the efficiency of candidates for particular conditions. Only the librarian who is charged with the responsibility of the entire administration, and who must study the particular problems to be met, can know who best can aid him in his work.

The Clerk read as follows:

Reading rooms (including evening service) and special collections: Superintendent, $3,000; assistants—2 at $1,800 each, 5 at $1,200 each (including 1 in room for the blind), 2 at charging desk at $1,080 each, 3 at $900 each, 10 at $780 each, 2 at $600 each; stenographer and typewriter, $960; attendant, Senate reading room, $900; attendants, Representatives' reading room—1, $960; 1, $780; attendants—2 in cloakroom at $720 each, 1 in Toner Library $900, 1 in Washingtonian Library $900, 2 for gallery and alcoves at $540 each; telephone operator, $660; 4 junior messengers, at $420 each; 2 watchmen, at $720 each; evening service, assistants—5 at $900 each, 15 at $780 each, 2 at $600 each; in all, $55,560.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking why the watchmen in this paragraph have not been treated like other low employees, with a salary increase of $60 a year.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. They were not estimated for. There are many watchmen in the service, and the committee felt that if we made an increase there it would necessitate an increase in all the other like positions in the city. Then there is a general statute fixing the compensation at $60 a month for watchmen, and it would be subject to a point of order.

Mr. FOWLER. Is that any reason why the committee should stop, because the statute fixes the salary at $720 a year?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. The committee is not authorized to increase it.

Mr. FOWLER. But the statute provides $5,000 a year for the Librarian, and the bill carries an appropriation for $6,500.

Mr. THACHER. That statute was passed 17 years ago.

Mr. FOWLER. That is the statute of to-day, as I understand. I do not see any reason why the permanent law should be a check on any committee in this House. It never has been since I have been here, and I presume it never will be a check because the committees disregard the plain provision of the permanent law, the same as one goose disregards the rights of another goose in their contest for the same grain of corn. [Laughter.] There is no regard for the plain provisions of the statute. It is a dead letter.

The Clerk read as follows:

Law library: Librarian, $3,000; assistants—2, at $1,400 each; 1, $960; 1, $540; 1 for evening service, $1,500; junior messenger, $420; in all, $9,220.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to ask the chairman of the committee about these law libraries. Where is the law library referred to?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. It is in this Capitol Building.

Mr. MURDOCK. What is this library up here behind the clock?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. That is the House library.

Mr. MURDOCK. And what is this one over to the east side of the Hall?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. That is a branch, for the convenience of Members of the House.

Mr. MURDOCK. The law library mentioned here is in the old Supreme Court space?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Yes.

The Clerk read as follows:

Increase of Library of Congress: For purchase of books for the Library, including payment in advance for subscription books and society publications, and for freight, commissions, and traveling expenses incidental to the acquisition of books by purchase, gift, or exchange, to continue available during the fiscal year 1916, $90,000, together with the unexpended balance of the sum appropriated for this object for the fiscal year 1914.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Why is this amount continued until 1916?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, the policy for a number of years has been to appropriate from $90,000 to $100,000 annually for increase of the Library. The Librarian said that as the year was about to expire he is placed in the necessity of buying books immediately, or the money will lapse into the Treasury. If he is permitted to carry over a balance from year to year, and persons and institutions who have valuable collections for sale do not know how much money he has at his disposal and are not in the possession of the information that he must close his trade within a certain time, then he will be able to deal to better advantage.

Mr. COX. Then this is in the nature of a contingent appropriation?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Yes. If he does not find a good place to make a purchase, he lets it go into another year and may be able to make a very advantageous purchase.

Mr. BRYAN. Do I understand that this money will be held by him in some way so that the public can not find out how much money he has?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Oh, no. We can find out, but some institution or persons with books for sale would not have access to his books and would not know how much money he had or that he must close a trade within a certain time.

Mr. BRYAN. So we appropriate $90,000 and keep alive any money that he has not spent from a former appropriation?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. That is correct.

Mr. BRYAN. That makes an exception in this case that does not prevail in any other department?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. For the reason that I have tried to explain to the committee.

Mr. BRYAN. I understand the explanation, but it seems to me quite odd that we should not give him a fixed amount, with the surplus to be turned over at the end of the year. It seems very strange and unusual that it should not revert to the Treasury. Of course I do not like to put my judgment against the suggestion of the committee, but it seems to me that when a department fails to spend all of the money appropriated for that department within the year it is good policy to let it be automatically covered into the Treasury.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Ordinarily, I think the gentleman is correct, but I believe the reasons that actuated the Librarian to make this request and the committee to grant it were good.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman explain who audits the accounts of the Librarian?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. The Auditor for the State and Other Departments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Library building and grounds: Superintendent, $5,000; chief clerk, $2,000; clerks—1, $1,600; 1, $1,400; 1, $1,000; messenger; assistant messenger; telephone switchboard operator; assistant telephone switchboard operator; captain of watch, $1,400; lieutenant of watch, $1,000; 16 watchmen, at $720 each; carpenter, painter, and foreman of laborers, at $900 each; 14 laborers, at $540 each; 2 attendants in ladies' room, at $480 each; 4 check boys, at $360 each; mistress of charwomen, $425; assistant mistress of charwomen, $300; 52 charwomen; chief engineer, $1,500; assistant engineers—1, $1,200; 3 at $900 each; electrician, $1,500; machinists—1, $1,000; 1, $900; 2 wiremen, at $900 each; plumber, $900; 3 elevator conductors, and 10 skilled laborers, at $720 each; in all, $74,525.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word in order to make an inquiry. Are these employees mentioned in the section just read under the civil service, or are they under the same Library rules?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Nobody at the Library is under civil service.

Mr. BRYAN. Does it not occur to the chairman of the committee that the mistress of charwomen, assistant engineers, machinists, plumbers, and so forth, and employees of that kind ought to be just as much subjected to the civil service as any other employees in the Government anywhere?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. But Congress has never seen fit to put its own employees under the civil service and that is a part of Congress.

Mr. BRYAN. I am going to trespass on the gentleman's time with another question, and that is whether he does not think Congress ought to pass a law putting these ordinary Library employees under the civil service?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I think we are doing very well.

Mr. BRYAN. I think we ought to put them under the civil service.

The Clerk read as follows:

For furniture, including partitions, screens, shelving, and electrical work pertaining thereto, $10,000.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. How much is appropriated for the maintenance and administration of the Library?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. The total amount is $623,785, and the bill provides for 472 salaries.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. There is some revenue produced by the Library over there.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Oh, yes; the Copyright Office is more than self-sustaining, and also the card-index section.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Can the gentleman state what the total receipts from the Library amount to, or what the total revenue is, if I may use that expression?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I could give the gentleman the exact figures if I had the report; but, speaking in round numbers, the revenues are about $160,000 from the Copyright Office and the card-index section.

Mr. THACHER. Mr. Chairman, I think $160,000, of which $47,000 is from the card index. That is the revenue received from the Library.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. And the total expenditure here is some $623,000?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I would like in the time of the gentleman from Mississippi to be permitted to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts a question. The gentleman is a connoisseur of books and also an authority on library practices.

Mr. THACHER. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman give the committee the expense of maintaining the Boston public library or any other large public library in the country?

Mr. THACHER. I am sorry to say that I can not give the gentleman the figures.

Mr. STAFFORD. I assume the expense is not nearly so great as that of the Library of Congress, even though the library at Boston approaches in magnitude the Library of Congress.

Mr. THACHER. Possibly not. Our Library of Congress is the largest library in the world, next to the British Museum. There are some 3,000,000 manuscripts and books over there.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman not believe that the library in Boston compares in its immensity with the Library of Congress?

Mr. THACHER. Mr. Chairman, I am a man from Massachusetts, but I must say that the Library of Congress is ahead of all the libraries in the world except the British Museum.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman give any information as to the cost of operation of the British Museum?

Mr. THACHER. I am sorry to say that I can not.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, may I interrupt the gentleman to answer this question? I want to say that the report from the Boston library states that in that library there are something like 2,000,000 volumes of printed books and unpublished manuscripts, and this library here is by far the superior of any library in this country.

The Clerk read as follows:

For procuring manure, soil, tools, fuel, purchasing trees, shrubs, plants, and seeds, and for services, materials, and miscellaneous supplies, and contingent expenses in connection with repairs and improvements to Botanic Gardens, under direction of the Joint Library Committee of Congress, $6,500.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee a question. Some years ago we had a ferocious contest here over the construction of a monument at the foot of this hill, in the Botanical Grounds, and the discussion raged over the proposition of tearing down the fence. Now, the fence is still standing, the monument seems to be uncompleted, and I thought probably on this item the gentleman could give me some reason for the cessation of that work. What has happened?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. The monument will be completed and unveiled in October of the present year. I presume the fence and other obstructions will be removed.

Mr. MURDOCK. So its conclusion is in sight?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of the President: Secretary, $7,500; executive clerk, $5,000; chief clerk, $4,000; appointment clerk, $3,500; record clerk, $2,500; 2 expert stenographers, at $2,500 each; accountant, $2,500; 2 correspondents, at $2,500 each; disbursing clerk, $2,000; clerks—3 at $2,000 each, 6 of class 4, 3 of class 3, 4 of class 2, 3 of class 1; messengers—2 at $900 each, 2 at $840 each; 3 laborers, at $720 each; in all, $73,440: Provided, That employees of the executive departments and other establishments of the executive branch of the Government may be detailed from time to time to the office of the President of the United States for such temporary assistance as may be necessary.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order. I would like to know why the committee did not carry in this bill $15,000 as salary for the Vice President?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Because the law provides $12,000.

Mr. FOWLER. Why does the bill carry $7,500 to the Secretary to the President?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Because the law provides that sum.

Mr. FOWLER. The bill of last session carried $6,000.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. No; the bill of last session carried $7,500.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will yield——

Mr. FOWLER. My recollection is it carried $6,000, and a provision was made thereafter which carried $7,500.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Let me tell the gentleman the facts. After the appropriation bill was made up carrying the salary at $6,000 for the Secretary to the President, after it passed the Congress, the compensation to the Secretary to the President was changed, and the other $1,500 was thereafter provided for in the deficiency bill, and we are now appropriating the amount that the law requires. This act was passed March 4, 1913.

Mr. FOWLER. Well, the bill for the last session carried the amount originally for $6,000.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Well, I explained that. The bill was brought in the first week of the Congress and passed, and on the 4th day of March, just before Mr. Taft went out, he signed the bill increasing the salary to $7,500.

Mr. FOWLER. That was a separate bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. It was in the deficiency bill; not this bill.

Mr. FOWLER. That is what I stated in my first statement, that your bill last session carried $6,000, and it was by special act that the increase was made.

Mr. BARTLETT. By amendment on the deficiency bill.

Mr. FOWLER. Why did not the committee make an appropriation of $10,000 for him? That is a very important position which he holds.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Would the gentleman vote for it?

Mr. FOWLER. It certainly is one of the most responsible positions in the Government.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. FOWLER. In a moment.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Will the gentleman vote for that proposition?

Mr. FOWLER. I am asking now about——

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. The gentleman is always talking about such things. Will he vote for such a proposition?

Mr. FOWLER. I am asking why you did not make an appropriation of $10,000 for this important position. It is certainly a great one. The gentleman is carrying in this bill an appropriation increasing other salaries above the permanent law, much more inferior than the office to which I refer. It stands as the second position in the executive office, and certainly is worthy of deep consideration.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOWLER. For a question.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman is the only one I have heard suggest this salary ought to be raised from $7,500 to $10,000. Certainly no request was given or made to the committee that it ought to be raised to that amount, and I want to ask the gentleman the question that was asked by the gentleman from South Carolina, if he is really serious in his statement that this salary ought to be increased, and if he is of course the gentleman can offer an amendment on the floor.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I am simply emphasizing the point that this House ought to be governed by permanent law in appropriations, and where there is permanent law a disregard of the law, in my opinion, is but little short of criminality.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is exactly what the committee has done in reference to this case.

Mr. FOWLER. That is true in this case, but I call attention to the fact that you have not been so charitable with the permanent law in obeying it in other instances in this bill.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. FOWLER. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. Did not the gentleman vote with me when the House voted to increase the salary from $6,000 to $7,500, and did not the gentleman on two occasions on a roll call vote against it?

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, my recollection is I have repeatedly voted against increases of a similar kind in the public services when you refuse to increase low-salaried men in the public service.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I ask the gentleman in this particular instance if he did not vote against the provision to increase the salary of this secretary to the President from $6,000 to $7,500?

Mr. FOWLER. In all probability I did; it is in keeping with my views on such subjects.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, in order to ask the chairman a question. I notice the compensation of the President is $75,000 and the appropriation for the office of the President is $73,440. Then there is $25,000 for contingent expenses, amounting to about $173,440. That would be the sum total of the appropriation for the President and his office. The question I wanted to ask is, Do you have any information as to the amount of money paid to the heads of other Governments, like the President of France, for instance?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I have read in the newspapers about the very large salaries that are paid in other countries as compared with our own, but I do not carry in my head the figures.

Mr. FESS. What I was after, purely for information, was whether our country would be regarded as expensive or extravagant in comparison with other countries.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Speaking in dollars and cents, the amount paid in this country is very small when compared with the amount paid in countries like France.

Mr. FESS. You mean, they are very small?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman has left the impression that the three items he has cited—$75,000, $73,000, and $25,000—were the totals granted to the President. He understands, of course, there are other amounts?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I mean in connection with the office.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I continue the point of order. I believe it has not been withdrawn.

Mr. FOWLER. No.

Mr. STAFFORD. I notice in the paragraph you have increased the salary of two correspondents from $2,250 to $2,500. I would like to be informed as to what the work of these correspondents is. Are they the representatives of any of the press associations attached to the White House offices?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. They have charge of the correspondence in the Executive offices.

Mr. STAFFORD. They perform secretarial duties?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Yes, sir.

Mr. STAFFORD. And are not attached to the regular press associations?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Oh, no. There are press men there, but they are paid by the newspapers they represent.

Mr. MURDOCK. Now, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] has brought up the subject of the total expense of the maintenance of the Executive offices and the White House. Can the gentleman give us, in a summary, what the grand total is and classify them in a brief statement? The other day the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. LAFFERTY] criticized and charged that the President was given $25,000 for living expenses. I noticed then, in the following paragraph, that there was no phraseology that justified any such bald construction as that placed upon it by the gentleman from Oregon. Do we, or is it the intention of the committee to, provide for the table and household expenses of the President? I have never so understood it; but the gentleman's charge here the other day that we did I thought was worthy of inquiry and some reply from the chairman of the committee.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. The normal amount carried in the sundry civil bill, the Clerk tells me, in addition to the items carried in this bill, is $80,000 or $90,000. That is for the upkeep of the White House—furniture, greenhouses and grounds, and various other things.

Mr. MURDOCK. Does that include traveling expenses, too?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. There is $25,000 provided for traveling expenses.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is there included there any provision for the maintenance of the President's table?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Oh, no.

Mr. STAFFORD. You will recall that the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. LAFFERTY], in his attack on the mileage proposition, stated that we provide $25,000 for the living expenses of the President. There is nothing in this paragraph to justify anything like that.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. The gentleman had no foundation for that statement. The appropriations for the White House are for furniture and the upkeep of the building, but the President, just like any other citizen of the Republic, purchases out of his own funds supplies for his table and his family.

Mr. FESS. The $90,000 would not be regarded as going to the benefit of the occupant of the White House?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. No. That is money which is expended for the public—the upkeep of the mansion and the grounds and the furniture, and not for the Executive.

Mr. MURDOCK. That is, for these receptions which are given in the first part of every year the President bears the expense?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Oh, certainly.

Mr. MURDOCK. And the upkeep of his table and entertainment of his guests?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. I so understood.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the reservation of the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the reservation of the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] withdraws the reservation of the point of order, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION.

For commissioner, acting as president of the commission, $4,500; 2 commissioners, at $4,000 each; chief examiner, $3,000; secretary, $2,500; assistant chief examiner, $2,250; chiefs of division—3, at $2,000 each; examiners—1, $2,400; 3, at $2,000 each; 4, at $1,800 each; clerks—6 of class 4, 26 of class 3, 34 of class 2, 44 of class 1, 34 at $1,000 each, 22 at $900 each; messenger; assistant messenger; skilled laborer, $720; 4 messenger boys, at $360 each. Custodian force: Engineer, $840; general mechanic, $840; telephone-switchboard operator; 2 firemen; 2 watchmen; 2 elevator conductors, at $720 each; 3 laborers; 4 charwomen; in all, $261,830.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I see that the salary of these commissioners of the Civil Service Commission is $4,000 each, except for the acting president of the commission, which is $4,500. Mr. Chairman, I suppose there is no question that the civil-service law is now the accepted policy of all political parties in the United States. It has lately been extended to cover about 50,000 fourth-class postmasters and also to the vast number of employees that will be necessary in order to carry out the law for the physical valuation of the railroads. I do not understand why these commissioners are paid less than the chiefs of bureaus in the departments. I can not conceive of anything more important than the duties of the Civil Service Commissioner at this time. It seems to me that throughout the country—at least, it has been my experience—that the people have an idea that the civil-service law is not intended to be enforced and that it is in fact not enforced.

Now, we have had examinations in my district and all over the State of Tennessee recently of applicants for appointment as fourth-class postmasters, where the salary is from nothing up to $999 per annum. The appointments are to be made from the three highest on the eligible list, certified by the commission to the Post Office Department. I think I have received from half a dozen to 50 letters from every point where an appointment is to be made in my district. They seem to have the idea that Members of Congress actually determine who of the three highest is to be appointed, although they may all be of one political party. I have always thought and believed that the civil-service law was intended to be carried out in letter and spirit. Now, if there are six on the eligible list, you may just as well let the department select from the six as from three if you are going to disregard the object and purpose of the examination. I understand this examination is made for the purpose of ascertaining those who of the applicants are best fitted for the discharge of the duties to be performed.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield, and to whom?

Mr. SIMS. To the gentleman who first rose. I think perhaps the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. The gentleman has just outlined the process of the certification of the three eligibles to the Post Office Department and the appointment by the Civil Service Commission of fourth-class postmasters. Who, in the gentleman's judgment, should determine as between these three that are certified? Why should three be certified if the one best qualified or the one who makes the highest rating is to be appointed?

Mr. SIMS. I have always understood, Mr. Chairman, that it was to give the appointing power some opportunity to determine the fitness of the applicant from administrative and departmental reasons as well as for educational qualifications, and therefore the appointing power was permitted to appoint one other than the highest as indicated by this test. But I have never understood that administrative or departmental reasons were to be determined by a Member of Congress or by a Senator.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I understand, as the gentleman does; but in the gentleman's observation, not in the examination and supplying of the eligible list for fourth-class postmasters but in the selection from the eligible list of clerks in the departments in Washington, is the same practice followed under the law to certify the three highest names from the list?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Has the gentleman had a case under his observation where all three of those names were returned and a new certification called for?

Mr. SIMS. I have not had that experience myself, but I have heard of such cases.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WILLIS. I understood the gentleman to say that his understanding of the Civil Service Commission rules was that appointments were to be made in accordance with efficiency as indicated by the examination. Is that the gentleman's idea?

Mr. SIMS. I understand that is the purpose of the examination.

Mr. WILLIS. Is it the practice, especially in the Postal Service, to which the gentleman has alluded, that the appointment goes, after examination is had, to the man who receives the highest grade? Does the gentleman mean to convey that idea?

Mr. SIMS. I mean to convey the idea that when we read statements given out by the Post Office Department to the effect that that will be done in every case, unless for administrative or departmental reasons, which I understand are reasons that inhere in the service to be performed, one other than the highest is appointed.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SIMS. Certainly the Post Office Department is qualified to determine for itself administrative and departmental reasons; neither the gentleman from Ohio nor myself are experts as to departmental or service reasons, and therefore we are not consulted.

Mr. WILLIS. I wish the gentleman from Tennessee would define those "administrative and departmental reasons," and state his experience under the practice, whether mere political influence would be construed to be "administrative and departmental reasons"?

Mr. SIMS. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, the question should answer itself. A man's politics should not be regarded as constituting administrative or departmental reasons for his appointment as postmaster any more than they should constitute qualifications of a pilot for a steamboat.

Mr. WILLIS. I think the gentleman is right about that, but I do not think that is the practice of the department.

Mr. SIMS. I think and hope the gentleman is mistaken about that. Mr. Chairman, in my district even when the three highest are all Democrats the friends of those three Democrats seem to believe that the one to be appointed is selected by myself, and I am to be held responsible for the appointment. Now, if we are to be held responsible, why go through the farce of examination at all?

I want to say this, Mr. Chairman, in all seriousness: If the civil-service law is going to remain on the statute books and be perfected and lived up to, why give a salary to the commissioners themselves which is suggestive of the unimportance of the service to be performed? Why give the chief of a bureau five or six thousand dollars a year and then give to the Civil Service Commissioners only $4,000?

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. In a moment. Of course, an amendment to increase these salaries would be subject to a point of order, if offered on the floor of the House, and I am not going to offer it. But I do think, as the importance of that commission increases year in and year out and its duties are multiplied, there ought not to be a salary provided for the commissioners which of itself minimizes the importance of the service to be performed by them.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does the gentleman think that the great dignity of this position must be taken into account?

Mr. SIMS. Well, I think the dignity of the commission is certainly as great as that of the Commissioner of Pensions, and certainly as great as that of many other commissions with much larger salaries.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is greater.

Mr. SIMS. Certainly it is greater than that of a lot of chiefs of bureaus, who get larger compensation. If civil service is to be the permanent policy of this country, let us carry out that policy in decency and effectually or else abandon it.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. FESS. I agree entirely with what the gentleman says, and I realize, too, that the latitude of giving the commission the opportunity of choosing some one less than the highest of the three subjects both the commission and everybody else concerned in the transaction to severe criticism and to the charge that it is done on political grounds. Does the gentleman think it would be a little better not to permit that latitude here?

Mr. SIMS. I am not practical; I am not an expert. The Civil Service Commission determines the qualifications, so far as it has jurisdiction, but there might be serious reasons in the public interest why all three of them should be rejected and somebody else appointed. But I want to make this point, that service reasons—reasons that inhere in the duties to be performed—should not be sought for in the mind of a political member of the Government who would suggest a political or perhaps a personal friend if he had one among the three certified by the commission.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired. The Clerk will read.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] moves to strike out the last two words.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, unquestionably no rule can be established for the appointment of persons to office and of persons to enforce any of the provisions of our law that is absolutely perfect. The Civil Service Commission does certify the names of three persons when it comes to the appointment of postmasters, and there is some reason for that—possibly a very poor reason. But I think that reason is abused. Obviously the personal element always enters into the desirability of the appointment of any person to office. A person might pass a very good examination, and yet, by reason of some objections, personally would be offensive to serve in the community where he seeks an appointment.

The difficulty is that the party in power—and it has always been so—abuses that privilege. The fault is not in the law, but in the abuses of the law. But, Mr. Chairman, it is not a question of whether or not the rules under which appointments are made are perfect, but the real question is whether or not appointments made in any other way would not be far worse than appointments made from lists certified by the Civil Service Commission, even though the law is abused.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. GOOD. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. FESS. Does not the abuse, which seems to be quite apparent, very largely nullify the value of the civil-service plan?

Mr. GOOD. Not at all. To-day we have 301,000 people who hold office by virtue of civil-service examinations or who have been covered into the service under Executive orders.

Most of them have been appointed as a result of a civil-service examination, and were it not for the fact that the law limits the amount which these commissioners shall receive I would here move to increase the salaries of these officials. Think of it! We are paying the chairman of the Civil Service Commission $4,500 a year. We are paying the executive clerk in the executive office $5,000 a year; and you may go down through this bill and find clerks—many of them—receiving $5,000 a year—and these commissioners receiving $4,000 a year. Why? The reason is that the men appointed as the result of civil-service examinations can not control these commissioners. If they could control them, it would be very easy at times to get increases of their salaries. There is no other department in our Government where we are so niggardly in the payment of salaries as we are in regard to the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Does not the gentleman think that the lack of appreciation indicated by the salaries here is an evidence again that we are only half-heartedly supporting the civil service system, because we have objections to it.

Mr. GOOD. No; I do not. I think it is because there is no political pull with the Civil Service Commissioners, and that is the reason why their salaries have not been increased.

Mr. SIMS. I want to call attention to the fact that the secretaries of some other commissions get $5,000.

Mr. GOOD. Yes; and yet the secretary of this commission gets $2,500, and he is a very efficient man.

Mr. MURDOCK. And a hard-worked one, too.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, the appointment of these 301,000 people whose appointments rest on civil-service examinations is a matter of sufficient importance so that the men in charge of this great work ought to be paid salaries commensurate in some degree with the duties performed. Yesterday reference was made to the great expense of the Government when Theodore Roosevelt was President. Now, I do not hold any brief for Col. Roosevelt, but I have here the estimates submitted to Congress year after year for these various departments. I want to say that they have grown tremendously since Mr. Roosevelt left the Executive office. There is absolutely no merit in the statement that the expense of the Government was excessive under his administration. Why, the highest appropriation for the Chief Executive office was $69,000 during Mr. Roosevelt's administration, and last year it grew to almost $75,000.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words. I have for many years been interested in the civil-service or merit system. Almost every time a Member has spoken here in favor of it there has been evidence coming from both sides of the House that the civil-service system is not carried out according to the spirit of the law. At different times men have hurled it into our teeth that we are under the civil-service régime, but that it is being entirely ignored, and that only certain classes or certain parties are represented in the appointments. I have wondered just how much truth there was in the statement. I have not been able to investigate it, and therefore have not denied the statement. In this statement I do not wish to reflect upon the Civil Service Commission, either in its personnel or its administration. I am raising the question simply as to its effect in the way of criticism lodged against the merit system because of the latitude allowed in the matter of appointments.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. For a question only?

Mr. MURDOCK. I will make it in the form of a question before I get through. I want to say that there is reason for that statement. Recently over in Virginia a granddaughter of President Tyler was removed from the post office and an examination was held for her successor. A young woman from Iowa passed the best examination. A man by the name of Williams passed the examination, and his standing was not so good, but he was appointed. Why should not the young woman from Iowa have been appointed? It is such things as that which cast a reflection on the merit system. Does not the gentleman think there is some ground for suspicion of the civil-service system?

Mr. FESS. I think so. That is the reason I have raised this question. I have asked the question two or three times whether our latitude in the observance of the letter of the law does not subject us to the charge that we are in spirit violating it. I believe that the lack of appreciation shown in the salaries paid here is the strongest evidence that we do not have the faith we ought to have in the merit system. The lack of faith in the system shows itself in the way we treat the commission. On the other hand, if we could have a law that we could hold to, that would not be subject to abuse through partisan influences, and if we could punish the violators of it when it is violated, I think we would raise the general appreciation of the merit system, which has come to stay. There are two fields for us to observe. So far as the policy determining function of the Government is concerned, it ought to be political; but when it comes to administrative functions, I should like to know what difference it should make to me whether this person is a Democrat or a Republican. We want the best service out of them. We want it on the efficiency basis, and we want it upon the basis of economy; and as long as we give this latitude so that the person best fitted is passed by and some one else appointed, it will subject us to the charge that we pay no attention to the spirit of the law and that we are doing it on the basis of political favor. I think we ought not to subject ourselves to that sort of criticism. That is why I am asking the question, to indicate that we do not sincerely support the merit system in a full-hearted way.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I will oppose the amendment offered by the gentleman to strike out the last three words. I think much of the criticism that is aimed at the civil service is not justly aimed at the Civil Service Commission and is caused by the conduct and administration of affairs after the employees pass through the civil-service examination and are admitted into the departments.

Mr. BARTON. The gentleman is right.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. The trouble is not so much with the examination and certification originally that first puts the employee on the roll; but after he gets on the roll in the departments and beyond the jurisdiction and control of the Civil Service Commission the grossest kind of favoritism is manifested in promotions, I think, in all departments. Employees are promoted over other employees who are just as efficient, and frequently more efficient, for considerations that ought not to enter into it at all. Whether that is true to-day I do not know. This administration has not been in very long, but I have no idea that there will be very much improvement in that respect. Employees do, in some way or other, through favoritism of the chief immediately over them or through some other influence entirely aside from the efficiency of the employee, manage some way to be promoted over the heads of others who are equally efficient, and frequently more efficient. Of course that is not chargeable in any way to the Civil Service Commission, but to the administration of the several departments after the employees are admitted to the pay roll.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Certainly.

Mr. FESS. I am under this impression, that, where three candidates are liable to be taken, somebody writes and asks me to recommend the appointment of so and so. I have the impression that that is not my business; that if I did it there would be recommended a candidate who belongs to the same party that I do. Am I justified in that feeling?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I can not say as to that; but I think the criticism and objection as to the civil service is very largely due to the conditions that arise and obtain after the employee gets on the pay roll.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 30, line 12, strike out the figures "$4,500" and "$4,000," respectively, and insert in lieu thereof "$6,000" and "$5,500" for each commissioner, respectively.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. To that, Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I submit this amendment to test the judgment of the House as to the merit of increasing the salaries of these acknowledged underpaid officials. When I went over the bill a night or so ago I was amazed to find that the president of the Civil Service Commission received the meager sum of $4,500, and the other commissioners $4,000. Throughout the bill we find instances where a mere chief clerk of a department, with no responsibility commensurate with the great responsibility of these commissioners, receives $5,000. There are instances of assistants receiving $6,000. Are we to have it go out to the country that we are underpaying these men who have the direct supervision of the employment of over 300,000 of our civil employees?

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. No; I can not yield. Do we want the impression to go throughout the country that we are minimizing this great service? Their salaries should be increased. Years and years ago, I recall, there was great opposition to the civil service, and there was no chance to get any increase allowed them.

Mr. SWITZER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. No; I have said that I can not yield. I hope that the Chair will protect me from the importunities to yield until I have finished my statement. But, through the effect of time, those objectors have been removed, I am sorry to say, from this Chamber, and they are not here now to raise the point of order. I hope when the question is presented fairly that the chairman of the committee will not press the point of order. There are many instances in the bill where a point of order will lie to increases; but I do not intend to make the point of order, because they are manifestly meritorious. But I will say to the chairman of the committee and gentlemen on the other side that there is no instance in this bill that is more meritorious than this for an increase. This increase is going to members of the commission appointed by your President, who deserve the increase so that they can live properly and fill the office efficiently. Now I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. McKENZIE].

Mr. MURDOCK. Who has forgotten his question. [Laughter.]

Mr. McKENZIE. The first question I want to ask is whether the gentleman thinks that an increase of salary procures better men to fill these offices?

Mr. STAFFORD. There is no question about that. You can not get men with the stamina and the mental and moral force to withstand the pressure that comes from Senators and Representatives, for these men do their work courageously.

Mr. McKENZIE. The gentleman has answered that part of the question sufficiently.

Mr. STAFFORD. Take the present Secretary to the President. Only a few years back there was a tremendous howl against increasing the salary of the Secretary above $6,000, but since the Democratic administration came into power and control they have increased it to $7,500. I have no objection to that. Now, be generous and give these meritorious officials this little increase.

Mr. McKENZIE. Does not the gentleman think that some of the chief clerks in the bureaus of the departments of this Government are required to have greater knowledge and perhaps greater skill and be better equipped than the men who occupy the office of commissioner of the civil service?

Mr. STAFFORD. No. I have in mind the chief clerk of the Post Office Department, who gets $5,000. The responsibility of his position is nothing compared with the responsibilty of this important executive official—the chairman of the Civil Service Commission.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from South Carolina withdraw his point of order?

Mr. FOWLER. If he does, Mr. Chairman, I want to renew it.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to discuss the merits of the amendment. I am constrained to vote against the amendment, although I am in favor of the increase it proposes. Running all through the legislative bill are many inequalities in salaries, many that should be remedied. That arises out of two general causes; first, salaries that were fixed many years ago were considerably lower than the salaries that have been fixed for offices more recently created; and, second, some of these positions have been filled by men of such modesty and so little political pull that they either have not endeavored to secure increase of salary or have not been able to successfully press their claims on the committee. There should be a general revision of salaries. There are many salaries in this bill too low, salaries fixed years ago for positions of great responsibility that have not been increased, while salaries for newly created positions have been fixed at a higher figure.

But it is very clear that we can not adjust these matters on the floor. If we were to increase these particular salaries, which we ought to do at the proper time, in my opinion, it would be necessary to go through the bill and increase the Commissioner and Assistant Commissioner of the General Land Office by $1,000 or $1,500, both officials having to do with matters of great importance and yet receiving smaller salaries than officials in newly created places of very much less responsibility. We can not adjust these inequalities on the floor, but I do hope that the committee when it next takes up this bill will not feel so constrained by motives of economy, not to say of parsimony, as to incline the committee to refuse to consider a general revision of many of the salaries carried in this bill. There are many that in all good conscience, considering the responsibilities of the positions and the character of those required to fill them properly and satisfactorily, should be increased. But we can not do it on the floor of the House in an equitable or satisfactory way.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, I think I shall not want all of the five minutes to which I am entitled. I simply want to express my humble opinion as to the merits of this proposition and as to the merits of the idea suggested here by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS]. So far as any criticism may be properly aimed at the civil-service system, it can not, in my judgment, be properly directed against the Civil Service Commission. From the little experience I have had with that distinguished body, I am of opinion that the work of the Civil Service Commission is carried on absolutely on the square. [Applause.] I do not think that anyone has any political pull or political influence with the Civil Service Commission. I think that when papers go in after examinations have been held they are graded absolutely on the square; but the trouble about the whole thing comes after the eligible register is established.

The trouble arises from the fact that the department heads and Members of Congress are seeking to hide behind the Civil Service Commission and give the impression that appointments are made under the civil-service rules, when, as a matter of fact, they are not so made. I have an illustration in mind, and I am not complaining because Democratic brethren are getting the post offices. They have fought long and valiantly for them, and no doubt they are entitled to them now, because they are probably not going to have them very long. I am not complaining at all about their eagerness for office, but what I do complain about is the suggestion that is sought to be conveyed that these appointments are made under the civil-service rules, when, as a matter of fact, everybody knows that they are not. Those suggestions are not made by any gentlemen who are here present now, but by other gentlemen and heads of departments. Here is the illustration to which I refer. An examination was held and the eligible register was established. There were three men on it, and the man who was lowest on it was appointed. I took occasion to make some investigation at the department, and the department, I want to say, was perfectly frank about it. It gave me, I think, the only reason that had ever been given to it by the Member of Congress from the district, and I am not criticizing him or complaining about his action, for if I were distributing patronage I might be tempted to do the same thing. He recommended the lowest man on the list, and the only reason that was given by him to the department—the only reason I could ascertain—was a political reason. I do complain about making appointments, however, really for political reasons and then alleging that the whole thing is under the civil service. That is the thing that is bringing the civil-service system into disrepute. It is not because of any misfeasance or malfeasance of the Civil Service Commission. I believe, as I said in the first place, that their work is carried on absolutely on the square, and if heads of departments and Members of the House and the Senate who are called upon to make recommendations will be courageous and tell their constituents the truth a good deal of the criticism of the civil-service system will come to an end.

Mr. COOPER rose.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto close in 10 minutes. We have been 20 or 30 minutes on it now.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto close in 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COOPER. Some of the things which gentlemen have said here to-day about the civil-service law and the way it is administered reminded me of a debate in the House in January, 1904, on the same subject. I have just procured a volume of the RECORD containing a report of that debate. During my remarks on January 13 I made a quotation from the seventeenth annual report of the Civil Service Commission, which I think it is pertinent to read at this point, following what the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] has said about the honesty and the fairness of the Civil Service Commission itself and the failure of certain other people properly to observe the civil-service law. The commission in that report said:

"The commission does not wish it understood by anything that has been said under this topic that there is an absence of irregularities and violation of the civil-service law and rules, or that the system is yet working with entire satisfaction, for such is far from being the case; but the foregoing is set out to indicate the steady and gratifying improvement in this direction."

Right here, Mr. Chairman, I digress a moment to call attention to the fact that some Member of the House or some employee is mutilating its records by cutting out parts of leaves in bound volumes in the library adjoining this Chamber. The officer in charge just informed me of this abuse, and urged that something be at once done to stop it. My own judgment is that a Member of the House who uses a knife to mutilate an official record ought to be expelled, and that any employee of the House who does it should go to jail. [Applause.]

During that speech on January 13 I quoted also what Gen. Garfield said as to the abuses under the spoils system. That quotation is one of those cut out of this volume. However, I was able to find an unmutilated volume of the RECORD containing the quotation, and I ask attention to what Gen. Garfield declared as to the evils of the old spoils system:

"One-third of the working hours of Senators and Representatives is hardly sufficient to meet the demands made upon them in reference to appointments in office. * * *

"The present system * * * impairs the efficiency of the legislators; * * * it degrades the civil service; * * * it repels from the service those high and manly qualities which are so necessary to a pure and efficient administration, and, finally, it debauches the public mind by holding up public office as a reward of mere party zeal.

"To reform this service is one of the highest and most imperative duties of statesmanship."

I also quoted Senator Vest, a Democrat, and Gen. Grant, both of whom said that the evils of the spoils system were intolerable.

I called attention to a report made by a committee of which John C. Calhoun and Daniel Webster were members, declaring that the spoils system, if not done away with, would ultimately lead to the downfall of republican institutions. I read the vigorous language of Senator Bayard, a famous Democrat:

"No man obtained an office except he was a violent partisan, and the office was given to him as a reward for party services; and so things went on until the offices generally were filled under that system, which was false and dangerous in the extreme—a system which, as my friend from Ohio said, is absolutely fatal to the integrity of republican institutions, I care not what party or under what name it may be organized and carried on."

Mr. Chairman, the fact that, as gentlemen allege, there are abuses in the administration of the present law does not go to the merits of the law itself. These abuses show only that certain men are not willing to obey a just law; that is all. Because larceny and other crimes continue to be committed despite our laws against them, we do not therefore repeal the criminal code. Nor because spoilsmen are guilty of abuses ought we to repeal the law which has done so much to remedy the evils formerly existing in the civil service of the country. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I concur heartily in the statement that the Civil Service Commission is not responsible for the abuses in the civil-service law. I believe that whatever abuses exist grow out of the administration of the law. I have been disposed to be liberal to the Civil Service Commission. I have been willing to provide for that commission all the force that is needed to do the work at its disposal. We are not inclined to increase the salaries for two reasons. One is that this commitee has not the time nor the jurisdiction to go into the question of the thousands of salaries of employees of the Government and to adjust them. In this bill we have refrained almost in every case from increasing the salaries except in a few cases where the salaries were very low and the circumstances were very urgent. There has been another reason why this committee would have hesitated to propose an increase of these salaries and that is that for many years the administration has been Republican and the men who held the offices managed to get along on the salaries. Recently the administration became Democratic. These appointees are new men and we are not inclined before the men have been well inducted into their offices to increase their salaries. Mr. Chairman, in view of these facts we insist upon the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Field force: District secretaries—2 at $2,400 each, 1, $2,200, 4 at $2,000 each, 5 at $1,800 each; clerks—1 of class 4, 1 of class 3, 1 of class 1, 7 at $1,000 each, 6 at $900 each, 5 at $840 each; messenger boy, $480; in all, $45,680.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I intended to say something on the other amendment, which has just gone out on the point of order, and give my views of the value of the Civil Service Commission. During my brief tenure of office I have come into contact with the members of the commission on several occasions. I wish to bear testimony to their fidelity and ability. I think there is nothing better Congress could do to put the cause of civil-service reform prominently before the country and develop the system nationally than to recognize by substantial increase of salary the service which the commission has rendered to the country. [Applause.] Not only that, Mr. Chairman, but I believe that one of the crying needs in the administration of the Government is a full and complete investigation of the department forces that we have here in Washington. I believe that the Committee on Appropriations should not be obliged to go into every department to investigate the conditions of employment there and the salaries paid, but I do believe that during the interim of Congress there should be a commission appointed, composed of able and intelligent men, who should investigate every department of the Government and thoroughly and systematically study the conditions existing there. I think there are thousands of people working for the Government in this city and throughout the country who are poorly paid.

I know of one instance, Mr. Chairman, that appeals to every particle of sympathy I have in me. I am acquainted with a woman who has been employed by this Government for over 40 years, living in the city of Georgetown, obliged to take a street car before 7 o'clock in the morning and ride to her place of employment, the widow of a Union soldier, who had three brothers in the Union Army and one in the Confederate; who is supporting a sister who is completely paralyzed and another aged sister dependent upon her; and living on a wage of $2.50 per day. She has worked for this Government for over a quarter of a century and has given the very best service possible. It seems to me that service of this character is entitled to some consideration. I believe there should be a readjustment and a reclassification of Government salaries. Not only that, but we recognize the fact that there are others, numerous in number, who should be retired from the Government service, who can not give the Government the value which their salary requires. These people should be retired to make way for those more efficient. We should provide by legislation for a retirement measure that will take out of the service those who are inefficient and supply their places in the public service with those who are strong, vigorous, and mentally competent.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. Mr. Chairman, I would like unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. I desire to say something in regard to the civil-service examinations which have been conducted to supply positions in the rank of fourth-class postmasters. The gentleman from Kansas made some reference to the matter of the selection of a man in a Virginia office to take the place of a woman, the granddaughter, I believe, of President Tyler. I think the statement was made that he was appointed, though he stood third on the list, owing to the fact that this lady refused to take the examination. Now, Mr. Chairman, if we are to compel the Post Office Department to appoint the persons standing highest in the list we will not give the department any latitude of discretion in its selection of individuals who are properly competent to discharge the duties of the office. I can bear testimony to the fact that the Post Office Department will not disqualify the highest eligible for political reasons; that if the eligible is to be disqualified it must be for reasons other than political.

Now, there are a great many other reasons that can be urged against the selection of the highest eligible. The people to be served in an administrative way may have decided objections to a person possessing objectionable traits of character. Such persons may be objectionable to the community——

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. Yes, sir; I will yield.

Mr. FESS. I think what I said a while ago is being misunderstood as attacking the civil service. That is not, I hope, true.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. I am not attacking the gentleman's statement, but I am endeavoring to point out some matters in connection with the civil service as applied by the Post Office Department.

Mr. FESS. There are other reasons than political that favor this person more than the other. How many people will believe that the other reasons were respected rather than the political one. And I wonder whether the gentleman from Colorado believes the statement made by the gentleman from Indiana when we were discussing this question that 95 per cent of the appointments under Republican administrations had been made in the interest of the Republicans as against the Democrats?

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. The gentleman knows that there were no appointments made under the civil-service rules by the Republican administration as far as fourth-class postmasters were concerned.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman is mistaken. For years and years they have been made.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. Not prior to the order of President Taft that covered into the civil service the fourth-class post offices.

Mr. MURDOCK. President Roosevelt made an order covering those north of the Ohio River and east of the Mississippi River.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. I am referring to the order made by President Taft in October, 1912. I am not familiar with what took place before that time.

Mr. FESS. There were several other officers outside of the fourth-class post offices that were referred to here.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. Let me say to the gentleman that I do not recall from my personal experience and observations in my State that any examination was ever held to select the incumbent of a fourth-class post office during any Republican administration.

Mr. FESS. I do not mean to indorse what was stated here, because I have not investigated it, and I am wondering if that is not the experience of the gentleman that the same charge will not be made against your administration that was made against the Republicans?

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. I believe that is true. Members of Congress are being beset behind and before. Our political friends do not understand why a Democratic administration can not turn all the "rascals" out, but we realize the limitations under which we operate and under which we are endeavoring to the best of our ability to apply the civil-service rules, as far as these appointments are concerned.

Mr. FESS. I do not think the gentleman means "turn the rascals out."

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. That is a figure of speech from American history, which the gentleman should understand.

Mr. FESS. This is a serious matter with me. I am a friend of the civil-service movement, and I dislike to hear people referred to by the gentleman as "rascals."

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. I am not referring to all of them as rascals. I am referring to certain of them as political rascals.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I agree with the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] that abuses which have grown up and which exist relative to the appointment of persons from the certified list of the Civil Service Commission are not chargeable to the Civil Service Commission. More than that, they are not chargeable to the civil-service system. It is absolutely essential, it seems to me, that in certifying eligibles to the departments for the commission to certify a number of persons. It does not always follow by any manner of means that the person at the head of the list is the one who is most entitled to an appointment or the one who would render the best service. And so long as the executive departments in the selection of persons from the list of three do it with an eye single to the good of the public service, then the public is served and the civil-service law is carried out as it should be.

The trouble is, Mr. Chairman, with regard to this proposition of appointing fourth-class postmasters under alleged civil service, that it is a fraud on the face of it. People in local communities are informed that there will be at a given time an examination for those who desire to present themselves as candidates for appointment as postmaster. Residents of the district, ambitious in that direction, take the examination; and in my State every case I have examined—and I have examined many of them with great care—no consideration, little consideration, has been given, so far as I am informed, to the qualifications of those appointed. There have been numerous cases in my State where two well-qualified and worthy persons were at the head of the list, and the third, having less qualification for the position, as indicated by the examination, and known of the community, has been appointed, and appointed simply and solely because that third person was a Democrat.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MONDELL. I can not yield. There has not been a single Republican appointed in my State, so far as I know, under this fraud of alleged civil service. There have been many cases where the highest, somewhere the two highest, on the list were Republicans and where the third on the list was a Democrat, and a Democrat notoriously not so well qualified or fitted for the place, and in most instances much less acceptable to the patrons of the office than either of the two higher parties would have been, but in all cases, so far as I know, the Democrat had been appointed. The Civil Service Commission is not responsible for it. The civil-service system is not responsible for it. It is the partisan administration of the Post Office Department that is responsible for it.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi). The time of the gentleman has expired. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

No detail of clerks or other employees from the executive departments or other Government establishments in Washington, D. C., to the Civil Service Commission, for the performance of duty in the District of Columbia, shall be made for or during the fiscal year 1915. The Civil Service Commission shall, however, have power in case of emergency to transfer or detail any of its employees herein provided for to or from its office force, field force, or rural carrier examining board.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

For the benefit of those newcomers to political life who are not acquainted with the method of appointment of fourth-class postmasters during prior administrations, I rise at this time to give them a little information of what the prior administrations did, so far as the appointment of fourth-class postmasters is concerned. This thought is suggested by the obvious ignorance displayed by one of the prior speakers in thinking that we have never had civil-service examinations at all extended to fourth-class postmasters. Away back in President McKinley's days, and not in President Roosevelt's, an Executive order placing fourth-class postmasters substantially under civil service was issued and not allowing them to be removed except for cause. Later, I believe in February, 1909, President Taft extended by Executive order and took away from Members of Congress——

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Not at the present time; not until I have completed my statement—the right of recommendation when vacancies occurred in these offices in certain States east of the Mississippi River and north of the Ohio River.

Under that Executive order some of the smaller fourth-class postmasters were appointed upon the ipse dixit of the inspector, and the larger fourth-class postmasters were appointed upon examinations held under the supervision of the inspector. There was no occasion, in my opinion, to remove from the civil service all these high-grade fourth-class postmasters that have been subjected to removal under the recent Executive order of this administration, for the reason that those men were compelled by reason of their service to meet the requirements of the office. Not only did the Taft administration extend the civil service to fourth-class postmasters, but it extended it virtually to the third-class and second-class and first-class postmasters, and exacted an efficiency test which they had to meet or be subject to removal.

What is the effect of this removal order under so-called civil-service examinations of fourth-class postmasters? It will result in efficient employees, who could be removed by the Postmaster General for incompetency, being subjected to an arbitrary test which does not determine their real qualifications for the work.

First, second, and third class postmasters during the Taft régime were required to attend to their duties or they would not be reappointed when their terms expired.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. FESS. What suggestion would the gentleman make that would make this impossible?

Mr. STAFFORD. You can not control the actions of Presidents through presidential orders. Under past administrations the Executive had the full power to make regulations that the postmasters should conform to, and President Taft was the first President—because he was a firm believer in the civil service—to exact the rule, that high-grade postmasters should give attention to their work or else they would not be reappointed.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from Colorado?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield to the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. In order that the information may be complete that the gentleman is giving to the committee, will he state how many fourth-class postmasters were put under civil service by examination for efficiency by Presidents Roosevelt and McKinley and Taft?

Mr. STAFFORD. I am referring to President Taft, who is the one that is entitled to the credit of this great movement for retaining in the service the tried and true employees of the civil service, and wherever a vacancy occurred in fourth-class post offices in those certain States east of the Mississippi and north of the Ohio examinations were held; and so far as the third and second and first class postmasters are concerned, if efficiency tests did not show that they had given entire attention to their public duties and were not qualified for the performance of those duties, they were removed.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I am somewhat interested in the remarks of the gentleman from Wisconsin on the matter of the civil service. It will be remembered that President Roosevelt covered into the civil service all fourth-class postmasters east of the Mississippi and north of the Ohio River without an examination.

Now, what was the result? All those were covered into the civil service without examination, but if a vacancy occurred an examination was held, and the person received his appointment through that examination. In the order made by President Wilson, when he modified the order of President Roosevelt, he provided that where a postmaster had not received his appointment through civil-service examination he must take that examination.

It did not disturb a single, solitary postmaster who had received his appointment through the civil-service examination, but it applies only to those where no examinations had been held. There was nothing wrong about that, and no hardship was done to any man, and the talk about efficient men who had been placed in the service is all nonsense. They were, many of them, efficient, but they did not receive their appointments through civil service, but only held their places by the order of the Executive.

Now, it is but fair and right that the President should have modified the order. I do not know the condition that exists elsewhere throughout the country, but I do not know that in the country in which I live—and I am not saying a word against those postmasters, because many of them are efficient and good men, possibly most of them—I do not know of a single, solitary one, unless it was some little postmaster receiving less than $180 a year, that was a Democrat.

There is no use for you gentlemen on that side of the House now to begin to talk about such nonpartisanship in the appointment of these postmasters. I do not know how you manipulated it if you did not do it through some influence that was political and that enabled you to get all the postmasters of that particular party. I am not complaining of you for it, because it was a Republican administration, and people understood that you had a right to those offices. Now we have a Democratic administration, and if Democrats pass the best examinations I am sure they are going to get these offices this time, and in many cases men who may stand the highest on the list, as you all know, are not really the best men to hold the offices. I believe the department should have that discretion, when they find men who are not properly qualified in other ways and men whom the people do not want, to select one of those who might be lower on the list.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to his colleague?

Mr. FOSTER. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. FOWLER. I desire to ask my colleague from Illinois if it is not a fact that there was a large number of fourth-class postmasters that never were subjected to a competitive civil-service examination under the Republican régime?

Mr. FOSTER. They were all filled by Republicans, not merely a large class of them but all of them, and then they were covered into the civil service by Executive order.

Mr. FOWLER. And when they did that is it not a fact that all postmasters receiving a salary of less than $500 never were compelled to pass a civil-service examination?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; and those men who received less than $500 a year and on down to $180 a year now must stand an examination. The inspector is now permitted to go into a neighborhood where he is scarcely acquainted at all and make the recommendation for appointment. Do you mean to tell me that a Member of Congress, who is acquainted with practically all of the people in the district and knows the situation, is not as well qualified to select a postmaster who draws a salary of less than $500 a year as some post-office inspector who goes into the neighborhood and selects him? I would be ashamed of myself as a Member of Congress if I did not believe I had as much sense and ability to select a fourth-class postmaster, drawing $500 a year, as any postal inspector who goes into the country and knows very little about it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have five minutes more.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not want it.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, we have been spending 30 minutes on this paragraph. Let us read some of the bill, and then gentlemen can talk later.

The Clerk read as follows:

Expert examiners: For the employment of expert examiners not in the Federal service to prepare questions and rate papers in examinations on special subjects for which examiners within the service are not available, $2,000.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, a few moments ago the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] made a statement that President Roosevelt covered certain fourth-class postmasters into the civil service, and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD], desirous of giving information, as he said, to some of these newcomers not acquainted with the political game, stated that President Roosevelt did not issue that order, but the order was issued by President McKinley.

As one of the newcomers, and somewhat verdant, I am glad to have the information, but the gentleman from Wisconsin is in error. The order was issued by President Roosevelt November 30, 1908, and then he promulgated rules in reference to the matter in January, 1909, involving the States north of the Ohio and east of the Mississippi, just as the gentleman from Kansas stated. I have just called up the Civil Service Commission, and they have ransacked the records and say never at any time prior to the order of President Roosevelt, either by the order of President McKinley or any other President, has there ever been issued any order taking the fourth-class postmasters out of the patronage system of appointment.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRYAN. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I wanted to ask the gentleman from Washington if in both the case of McKinley and Taft they did not issue orders covering into the civil service men who had not submitted to a civil-service examination?

Mr. BRYAN. Oh, yes, Mr. Chairman; this matter has been discussed pro and con all through the debate. They were supposed to become acquainted with the work and be well qualified. I would like to see them all put out, so far as the politics of the situation is concerned, and Progressives substituted.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRYAN. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. I do not think the gentleman's statement goes far enough in correcting the accuracy of the gentleman from Wisconsin without the further information to the House that of all of the Presidents mentioned the one upon whom the gentleman from Wisconsin pronounced the eulogy, Mr. Taft, was the one President that when a vacancy occurred penalized the Republican Members of Congress who were not in accord with the administration by refusing their recommendations.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. How did the gentleman find that out?

Mr. MURDOCK. That is a fact.

Mr. BRYAN. That has been thoroughly established. If there ever was a President who went back on the principles of fairness in the matter of distributing patronage or recognizing fairness in making appointments, it was Mr. Taft. He attempted to coerce and drive into line men in this House and men in the Senate who would not obey his rules or follow his ideas about certain matters. I found that out before I came here; I found it out at home.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRYAN. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. Is it not a fact that on the 15th of October, 1912, 18 days before election, Mr. Taft covered all the remaining fourth-class post offices by Executive order into the civil service, postmasters who had not stood any examination and who had been his chief supporters in certain sections of the country and to whom he was obligated in 1912?

Mr. BRYAN. I hardly think the gentleman ought to complain of the only civil-service act of President Taft. He was very slow about it, but it finally did come, and gentlemen ought not to complain about the only thing he ever did to reconcile himself with the civil service.

Mr. BARTLETT. But that was not civil service.

Mr. BRYAN. Well, it looked more like civil service than any other order President Taft ever made.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. EAGLE. Mr. Chairman, having served in this House almost every day for the year past, and not having once addressed the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House nor the Speaker of the House, it would perhaps be better if I continued that modest policy and kept silent; but it irritates me greatly for gentlemen on the Republican side, under the pretense of accurate speaking and fine morality, to misrepresent this civil-service matter to the country. I do not believe there are 10 men in this House who do not deliberately know that the so-called civil service is a subterfuge and a fraud from the beginning to the end and would abolish it if they had the courage to do it. [Laughter.]

And when I hear Republican gentlemen whose nominees are the chief beneficiaries of the order entered by ex-President Taft on the 15th of October, 1912, covering 36,000 Republican appointees into the civil service only two weeks before the presidential election, and when he knew that he and his party were dead and doomed in this country in the campaign then coming to a close, thus putting them under the civil service for the only reason that thereby Republican partisans might be perpetuated in office, now prating about the virtues of civil service, I know that they are not sincere. [Laughter.]

I know that in the State of Texas, with 4,000,000 people, whose civilization ought to be the pride of the whole world, the only qualification of many of the Republican postmasters for 16 long years has been that they were disreputable enough to confess themselves Republicans in solidly Democratic communities, and that the people were not consulted in a single instance as to whom they wanted. In practically every precinct in my district the patrons have to go up to the box and ask somebody for their mail whom they do not want and did not want as postmasters and whose appointment not 5 per cent of the patrons desired. It was procured by some little Republican boss from the State of Texas coming up here to Washington and requesting it at the hands of the Republican organization, without consulting the patrons and without examination, although gentlemen here to-day pretend they were appointed under civil-service orders of Presidents Taft and Roosevelt.

Now, when the time comes, under the usage for 100 years, in a Republican State where they could get the Republican they wanted for a postmaster, or in Democratic Texas where we could otherwise get in each instance the Democrat whom each community desires for postmaster, the principle of local self-government is denied by this exalted civil service perpetuating in office partisans thus secured and thus intrenched.

And it is practically impossible to remove these incompetent partisans from the fourth-class post offices, under these civil-service rules and regulations, and the patrons must continue to have such distasteful officials to rule over them.

Gen. Burleson and his Post Office Department are not to be condemned by any man on the Republican side of the aisle, if he will be honest about it, on the ground of partisanship; because, knowing the pleasant relations I bear to him and he to me, coming from my own State, if anybody on earth could get them out, I could, and yet I can not get them out and the choice of the patrons in. I say, therefore, that if gentlemen like the civil service, under which for partisan reasons the Republicans covered 36,000 into the civil service only two weeks before they knew their doom was sealed, then gentlemen have it in all its blessed working at the present time.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EAGLE. Certainly.

Mr. PAYNE. I understood the gentleman to say that he could not get these people out who were under the civil service. Is that correct?

Mr. EAGLE. I think I said that.

Mr. PAYNE. Although he has endeavored to get them out, he could not do it?

Mr. EAGLE. That is true.

Mr. PAYNE. Then the civil service is not so much of a humbug as gentlemen would seem to indicate.

Mr. EAGLE. It is even a worse humbug than indicated, because those are in whom the people they serve do not want and those are out whom the patrons desire as postmasters. [Laughter.]

Mr. PAYNE. Then the civil-service law is strong enough to keep men in who are under the civil service.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, this annual discussion of the civil-service question is exceedingly amusing. Much of it is for home consumption. I listened with some surprise to the statement of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] and the statement of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN] as to the attitude of former President Taft in the matter of appointments. It was claimed by many Republicans that one of Mr. Taft's political mistakes was the keeping of Democrats and Progressives in their positions, who, while they held their jobs under his administration, were politically undermining him before the people of this country. [Applause.] They were doing politics directly against him, and yet he never touched them. He allowed them to continue in their places.

Personally, I am happy to say that I come from a district where there is no Federal patronage for the Congressman. It is a mighty comfortable and pleasant situation to be in. The Senators take all of the Federal patronage in the State of California, and there is no fourth-class postmaster in my district. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. EAGLE] criticizes the administrations of Mr. Taft and Mr. Roosevelt in regard to their covering into the civil service a large number of Federal employees. Let me inform the gentleman they learned their lesson from the action of President Cleveland. It was President Cleveland who first issued an Executive order covering a large number of Federal employees into the civil service of this country, and that was done just before he retired from office. Some of those Cleveland Democrats are still occupying lucrative positions under the Federal Government all over the country. There has been no effort made by Republicans to remove them from their places. They were doing good work, and notwithstanding they were Democrats they had been placed under the civil service; and as the Republican Presidents respected the orders of President Cleveland, they were allowed to continue in their positions.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. That was in reference to railway mail clerks, was it not?

Mr. KAHN. Oh, it was not alone with reference to railway mail clerks, as the gentleman suggests—although they, too, were put under the civil service by an Executive order issued by President Cleveland just prior to his retirement—but it was with reference to the employees in the mints, in the custom-houses, the Internal-Revenue Service, and in nearly all of the various branches of the Federal Government.

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. And the Immigration Service.

Mr. KAHN. Yes; I thank my colleague for reminding me.

Mr. BARTLETT. Is it not a fact that when Mr. McKinley came into office he revoked that order?

Mr. KAHN. He did; because under the Democratic administration they had just put in a lot of new men; and as the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] stated on this floor only a few weeks ago, the moment the new Republican administration came in they found these railway mail clerks were unable to do the work. The gentleman from New York stated that the railway mail in his section of the country was all balled up. That is the way he put it. Letters and newspapers were a week or more behind in their delivery on account of the incompetency of the new clerks. In order to enable the mails to be properly delivered the President issued an Executive order removing those clerks from the civil service and allowed the old clerks, who had been displaced for political reasons, to be returned to their places, in order that the work of distributing the mail could be properly performed.

The civil service has certainly been of great benefit to the people of this country. It has enabled the public business to be performed in a capable and businesslike manner. Let me tell you what it has done for the Members of Congress. It has been said that prior to the time the civil-service laws and regulations went into effect the average life of a Congressman, so far as his continuance in Congress was concerned, was two terms. The fight for patronage was so great, was so relentless, that by the time he was finishing his second term he had antagonized so many men for whom he could not get political jobs that they were out for him with an ax, and generally defeated him. Since the enactment of the civil-service laws the tenure of the Members of this House has increased materially.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the establishment and maintenance of system of efficiency ratings, $15,000. The Civil Service Commission shall investigate and report to the President, with its recommendations, as to the administrative needs of the service relating to personnel in the several executive departments and independent establishments in the District of Columbia, and report to Congress details of expenditure and of progress of work hereunder at the beginning of each regular session: Provided, That no person shall be employed hereunder at a compensation in excess of $4,000 per annum.

Mr. PAYNE rose.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman begins, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I have had more or less experience with the civil service for quite a length of time. The law was passed during my first term in Congress and we have had it ever since. Of course, it did not apply to all of the officials then, and I was besieged to try to get some appointments. It was under the Arthur administration. I did succeed in getting a few, and it came pretty near putting an end to my usefulness for all times, because there was always a large crowd who did not get any offices, and those who did get them, even if they were zealous in my behalf, always had the stigma attached to them that they were simply returning to me a little personal service for the good I had done them. And as I note from time to time the operation of the civil-service law, I am mighty glad that I voted for the original civil-service bill. I remember when it was passed through the House the Hon. Samuel S. Cox, more or less noted, opposed the bill and predicted that that Congress would repeal it before it came to an end. But it is on the statute books yet, and it has been growing in usefulness ever since. Of course, it was never applied for a great many years to fourth-class postmasters. There were some 300 offices in my district the first part of my term, not quite so many now. I was thankful when they began to weed them out——

Mr. ADAIR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PAYNE. Because they were under what is called the spoils system—yes; I will yield to the gentleman, but I am afraid my time will hardly permit.

Mr. ADAIR. I desire to ask the gentleman if this was not true: That if 12 persons wanted an office and you secured it for 1, 11 of them were mad? On the other hand, when 12 persons wanted an office and you could not secure it for 1, the 12 are mad?

Mr. PAYNE. When so many wanted it and only one got the position, the people who did not get it had no further use for the Member of Congress from that district and wanted a change.

Mr. ADAIR. Is it not also true that the 12 have no further use for the Member of Congress if none got it?

Mr. PAYNE. Oh, no; if they know the Member can not get it, that is the end of it. All you have to do is to show the law.

Mr. ADAIR. And that is the end of him, too.

Mr. PAYNE. Oh, not at all. The man who thinks a man is going to perpetuate himself in office by reason of appointees is vastly mistaken. The people are not interested in that kind of a Congressman at all, and he does not live long; that has been my experience here—he does not live long after that, politically. But I started to say there were some 300 post offices in my district when I was called upon to look after them. We had a fashion then of letting a man serve out four years at a fourth-class post office unless a lot of people wanted it, and if there were a lot of people who wanted it it did not make any difference whether he served four years or four days, if the Congressman did not get out the present incumbent and get some new man in they were all mad about that.

If he did get out the incumbent and get a new man in, all the other people were mad about that and he had the whole army right on his back all the time. I was very glad when they said at least they should serve out the four years as fourth-class postmasters. Generally there are two little general stores, each one wanting the office, not for the $50 or $100 emolument, but in order to bring customers into their stores and induce trade, and they would exert all the influence they had in the community; and it became a very grave question, more important to them than any question of politics or statesmanship that ever came up, as to who should be postmaster of the opposite store on the main street of the village. And when the thing was decided not only the fellow who was disappointed was angry about it, but all his retainers were angry about it, and the man who carried that town afterwards was a mighty smart politician, and I lost some towns that I could not get after any such thing occurred. But gradually it grew into the position that a fourth-class postmaster was retained during good behavior, and for the last 15 or 20 years no fourth-class postmaster has been removed in my district except by the hand of death or possibly by sometimes getting his hand in Uncle Sam's till and being caught at it and——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PAYNE. Has my five minutes expired already?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. PAYNE. About three minutes more.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I have no objection to the gentleman having three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request that the gentleman from New York have three minutes more? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. PAYNE. After a while came along this order putting these fourth-class postmasters under the civil service, and that was a godsend for every Congressman who had any experience with it, if they had gotten good people in; and a good Congressman ought to have good people, not a man who can carry a town or ward, and who can not discharge the duties of the office, because by the presence of a good man there the feeling would be that it was all right; when you put a man in perpetually and did not change at the end of four years, and nobody had a right to look for a change, gradually they did not want a change. Nobody in the town wanted a change. Now, we have these experienced postmasters who have served for a period of 15 or 20 years in my district. Now, they must come in and take an examination along with a high-school graduate or a college graduate, or something of that kind, in order to hold their places, and examinations are ordered all over my district. I hope they will have a good time at it, but I am sorry that these people who are competent to do the business will have to go out. Some of them are old soldiers, and they will have to go. Some have grown up in the offices in which they are now discharging the duties, but they have not a high-school education, and they will have to go and somebody else will have to be appointed in their places.

But you are going to have a peck of trouble over that order of the Postmaster General which some of you are complaining is not drastic enough. The more drastic it is the more you will complain about it. I suppose they will get in some young fellow who will be zealous for my opponent. The latter is perfectly welcome to all the help he can get out of that class of people. I will stand for the civil-service law and I will beat all comers under that.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. Does not the gentleman know that there are some enterprising firms in the city of Washington that are sending out circulars offering to furnish prospective fourth-class postmasters with all the necessary knowledge?

Mr. PAYNE. Well, I never knew that sort of thing to do any good, except to get a few dollars from an unsuspecting people. It is a good deal better for a man to have a little schooling at the high school than to have all the cramming from these people who are sending out these circular letters from now until kingdom come.

You had best leave the civil-service law alone. It is your best friend. It is no better friend to anybody in the world than it is to a Member of Congress, if he wants to stay in Congress and serve here. If he wants to serve his country, he can also serve it and his party, and serve himself best, by standing for the civil-service law against assailants from every quarter. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For necessary traveling expenses, including those of examiners acting under the direction of the commission, and for expenses of examinations and investigations held elsewhere than at Washington, and including not exceeding $1,000 for expenses of attendance at meetings of public officials when specifically directed by the commission, $12,000.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Texas——

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, one minute. I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph close in five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. EAGLE], who has just taken his seat, and who indicates his entire lack of prejudice by referring to certain people as "those so disreputable as to be Republicans," complains he is unable to secure the appointment of any Democratic postmasters in his district. I would respectfully refer him to the Post Office Department's referee for the State of Wyoming. I think he is in this city, and I am sure he can give him some pointers in regard to getting Democrats appointed to fourth-class post offices.

Mr. EAGLE. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the moral lecture of the gentleman from Wyoming. At the same time he has no right to misrepresent the thing I said unintentionally, as he did. I did not say that Republicans were disreputable, but I said that those people in most of the precincts of my district who were selected to be postmasters in that particular district were disreputable enough to call themselves Republicans.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman modifies it, as I understand it, by saying it is possible that there are people who are Republicans that are not disreputable, but anyone in Texas who is Republican is necessarily disreputable. I accept the gentleman's explanation and apology.

Mr. EAGLE. I think that is very largely true.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I have been appointing fourth-class postmasters for 16 years. There are about 350 of them in my State. I think a quarter of those I have appointed were Democrats. In fact, except in the case of an important office, have I seldom asked the question as to the political views or affiliations of the applicant who seemed to have the support of the community. The opportunity to make political appointments is not helpful to a Member of Congress, and yet I am of the opinion that the average Member of Congress would recommend and nominate quite as efficient and satisfactory fourth-class postmasters as can be secured under any merit system. But it is certainly a great relief to a Member to be relieved from the responsibility. The difficulty in regard to the present system, Mr. Chairman, is that it is a fraud; that the people of these rural communities are led to believe that there is a fair chance for anyone who is ambitious for appointment, who presents himself for examination, to secure an appointment if he secures an eligible rating.

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wyoming yield to the gentleman from North Carolina?

Mr. MONDELL. I do.

Mr. POU. Does the gentleman think that the present system is as great a fraud as that system which covered under the civil service all appointments made, as the gentleman suggested he had made himself and these other gentlemen had made, and made in almost every instance, in my judgment, for political reasons? Is not that a greater fraud on the civil service?

Mr. MONDELL. O, Mr. Chairman, that was not a fraud. That was a high-minded and patriotic service to protect the people from the rapacity of the incoming Democratic administration. [Laughter.]

Mr. POU. I am glad the gentleman is so candid in stating the facts.

Mr. MONDELL. I have no objections to the appointment of Democratic postmasters in my State—none whatever. As a matter of fact, I rather feel as though I should like to have the Democratic referee from my State enjoy the responsibility that I enjoyed for years for the appointment of postmasters, and I am sure I would wish him great success and no greater amount of trouble than I had in those appointments. The difficulty is that the people are led to believe there is a free and open opportunity for appointment under this system at this time. There is no such opportunity for Republicans whatever, unless the three eligibles submitted by the Civil Service are all Republicans. Then there is some hope that the one highest on the list or the one most satisfactory to the patrons of the office will be appointed. Otherwise, if there is a Democrat on the list, the Democrat will be appointed, whether he be first, second, or third, and often against the protests of the majority of the patrons of the office.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. GARNER). The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The operation of the Executive order of March 20, 1912, for the annual submission to the Civil Service Commission of an outline of organization of the Government of the United States is suspended until otherwise provided by law.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] reserves a point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, in looking over the hearings and the report on the bill I could not find any reference to this new paragraph that the committee has incorporated in the bill, and I would therefore like to inquire of the chairman of the subcommittee what is the purport of this Executive order of March 20, 1912, which the committee seeks to repeal?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, the Cleveland Economy Commission recommended that there should be published twice a year two volumes about the size of the one I hold in my hand, containing a list of all the positions in the Government service. It was simply a table of positions, consisting of thousands of pages, chiefly blank. It has been found that it would cost $50,000 a year to publish those tables, and in the judgment of everybody who ever examined one of these volumes they are absolutely worthless when published.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman inform me whether the present President has examined those books?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I can not say. I am sorry I have not one of them on the table before me.

Mr. STAFFORD. Why has he not repealed this Executive order, then?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. The Civil Service Commission has taken up the matter and considered it thoroughly and reached the conclusion that the books are worthless when published, and the commission has appealed to the President to suspend their publication. The last Executive order is the one noted in the bill. Now, in order not to have to go to the President twice a year to get an order suspending that publication, we insert the item in the bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. It requires, then, something more than an Executive order to repeal an Executive order, namely, some substantive legislation, as embodied in this paragraph. From the explanation of the chairman, I have no desire to reserve the point of order further.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is withdrawn.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] reserves the point of order.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, are these lists that are contained in the volumes of which the gentleman speaks the only lists of the names of the employees of the Government?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. These are lists of positions or places. We have the Bluebook, or the Register, as it is called.

Mr. COOPER. What was the object, then, of publishing these lists if we already have a volume containing them? What was the object in printing these names at all?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I am not able to tell the gentleman what operated in the minds of the Cleveland Economy Commission, but I am satisfied, and so is every man who has examined the published volumes, that they are worthless.

Mr. COOPER. How often is the Bluebook published?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Once a year, as I understand.

A MEMBER. Once in two years.

Mr. COOPER. How often was that volume published?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Twice a year.

Mr. COOPER. Once in six months—the one the gentleman has there?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Yes; twice a year; once every six months.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, is that a list of the officials similar to the list in the Bluebook?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. No. I have sent for a copy of the book, so that Members may see it if they desire.

Mr. PAYNE. Is this simply a republication of the Blue Book? Is it a list of the officials?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. It differs somewhat from the Blue Book.

Mr. PAYNE. But it is a list of the officials?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. It is a list of places.

Mr. PAYNE. I would say that if there is a way to cut off that publication, I would be glad of it, because I have a great many Democratic constituents who want this book and the information contained in it; because they want to know, I suppose, about what employments and appointments can be gotten, and all that sort of thing. [Laughter.] If this publication is cut off, I may be able to say to my Democratic constituents that the Government is not any longer publishing this information, and that will probably relieve me of that difficulty I am having with my Democratic constituents. [Laughter.]

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ascertain from the committee if there is any difference between the lists of names in the Blue Book and the lists in this volume?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. The names are not here. I would call the gentleman's attention to a specimen page, for example:

1. Office of Secretary of War—continued.

And so forth. It is just a table of that kind.

Mr. COOPER. I can conceive that a table of that kind, in the absence of anything else containing that information, might be of exceeding value. It seems to me that the data contained in this volume should be available. Otherwise what is there in the way of available information concerning these things?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. There is nothing, in my judgment, in that book that they do not already know. Now, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. COOPER. I have just taken this up at random, and my colleague [Mr. STAFFORD] has called my attention to page 217, where I read:

Department of Agriculture: 9. Bureau of Biological Survey. 2. Game-preservation division. 1. Washington force. 2. Field force. 1. Key West, Fla. 2. Pineland, Fla. 3. Sebastian, Fla.

It is a list of names of places where the Government is interested. That is information that ought to be easily accessible; and the same with respect to the Department of Commerce and Labor. For example, I read:

Department of Commerce and Labor: 4. Steamboat-Inspection Service. 3. Inspection service. 8. Eighth supervising inspection district, Detroit, Mich. 1. Supervising inspector in charge. 1. Detroit, Mich. 1. Board of local inspectors. 2. Assistant inspectors of hulls and boilers. 3. Office force.

That is the Detroit office. Then—

2. Chicago, Ill. 1. Board of local inspectors. 2. Assistant inspectors of hulls and boilers. 3. Office force. 3. Duluth, Minn.

And so forth.

There ought to be a compilation of that kind of information accessible to the Members of both Houses of Congress.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Does the gentleman think it ought to be published twice a year?

Mr. COOPER. I do not know. The changes are quite frequent sometimes, when they can be made by Executive order or in the discretion of department officials.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will say to the gentleman that the committee inquired diligently of officials if any one of them had ever consulted this work and if they had use for that data, and we were unable to locate a single official who had ever made use of that data or had consulted the volumes.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. This is the first time that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] or any Member of this House outside of the Committee on Appropriations knew there was any such publication.

Mr. COOPER. I presume that the gentleman from South Carolina has sometimes wanted to ascertain a fact—a fact which, in 30 years, he may not have wished to inquire about, but which suddenly has become necessary for him to know—and has been compelled to consult an encyclopedia or some other book to inform himself.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. This is a publication that would not be consulted once in 30 years, and if the people in the Government service do not know of the existence of a publication it is not worth $50,000 per year to keep it up.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. If the gentleman will pardon me, in addition to what I said a while ago, I want to say that every department of the Government complains bitterly because of the time it requires of employees to get out the data and furnish it for the publication of this book. It takes the time of the employees from other duties to furnish the data for this publication which, as I said, can be of no value to anybody.

Mr. COOPER. The data have already been prepared. I do not see why they should complain if called upon only once in six months to make a list of the changes. A short list of the changes in either of the particular offices to which I have called attention would not take three minutes to prepare. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, it is not subject to a point of order. We have made profert of this publication, and a provision suspending its further publication is in order under the rule, because it reduces expenditures.

Mr. CARTER. What information is given in this publication that is not in the Bluebook?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I regard the book as of no value whatever, certainly not worth $50,000, which it costs. It costs $10,000 to print it alone.

Mr. PLATT. Does the gentleman say that the Bluebook is published every year?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I so stated, but I am in error. It is published only once in two years.

The CHAIRMAN. There is nothing on the face of this provision that indicates a reduction of expenditure.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, on the very face of it it stops the doing of something authorized by law, and certainly it must cost money to do it.

Mr GOOD. The publication has been submitted here, and it consists of two volumes, which, under this order, must be published twice a year. Obviously that can not be done without considerable expense. While it is true it does not appear on the face of the provision in the bill that it costs $50,000, it is obvious that it will cost considerable money to publish the two volumes twice a year. It seems to me it will reduce expenditure and is absolutely of no benefit.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from South Carolina furnish the Chair with the Executive order?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I will; and I ask unanimous consent to pass the paragraph without prejudice.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent to pass the paragraph temporarily. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE.

For Secretary of State, $12,000; Assistant Secretary, $5,000; Second and Third Assistant Secretaries, at $4,500 each; Director of the Consular Service, $4,500; Counselor for the Department of State, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, $7,500; officers to aid in important drafting work—4 at $4,500 each, 4 at $3,000 each, to be appointed by the Secretary of State, any one of whom may be employed as Chief of Division of Far Eastern, Latin American, Near Eastern, or European Affairs, or upon other work in connection with foreign relations; 3 assistant solicitors of the Department of State, to be appointed by the Secretary of State, at $3,000 each; chief clerk, who shall sign such official papers and documents as the Secretary of State may direct, $3,000; law clerk, $2,500; law clerk and assistant, to be selected and appointed by the Secretary of State, to edit the laws of Congress and perform such other duties as may be required of them, at $2,500 and $1,500, respectively; chiefs of bureaus—2 at $2,250 each, 5 at $2,100 each; 2 translators, at $2,100 each; additional to Chief of Bureau of Accounts as disbursing clerk, $200; private secretary to the Secretary, $2,500; clerk to the Secretary, $1,800; clerks—17 of class 4, 19 of class 3, 25 of class 2, 43 of class 1, 3 of whom shall be telegraph operators, 18 at $1,000 each, 18 at $900 each; chief messenger, $1,000; 5 messengers; 25 assistant messengers; messenger boy, $420; packer, $720; 4 laborers, at $600 each; telephone switchboard operator; assistant telephone switchboard operator, in all, $320,060.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I want to offer an amendment.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr Chairman, I discovered that this paragraph carries an appropriation for the three Assistant Secretaries of State—one at $5,000, the other two at $4,500. The statute provides for a uniform salary of $3,500. I desire to know what reason the committee has for increasing these salaries. Also, Mr. Chairman, the bill carries an appropriation of $3,000 for the chief clerk, whereas the statute provides for a salary of $2,500.

There are other increases or variations from the ordinary appropriation for this department, but these are the chief points to which I desire to call the attention of the committee.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, we have in this paragraph continued the current appropriations. We have neither increased nor reduced anybody's salary. We have appropriated for one person less than the current law provides.

Mr. FOWLER. There is no authority by permanent law for increasing the assistant secretary's salary, is there?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. That is the salary that has been paid for many years. I have not examined the permanent law. If the gentleman from Illinois says that the law creating the office fixes the salary at $3,500, I am willing to accept the statement.

Mr. FOWLER. It does.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Does the gentleman from Illinois desire to make a point of order against it?

Mr. FOWLER. If I should do that, it would be easy for the committee to go over to the Senate and have it put in, and then in conference it will be easy to come in with an agreement of the House members of that committee to the Senate amendments, and then there will be no chance whatever in the House to interpose a point of order or correct the evil.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. There is no warrant for the gentleman from Illinois making any such assertion. We do not go to the Senate; we are legislating on our own responsibility. We are not responsible for what the Senate does. The gentleman has no intimation of what would be done in conference if there should be a conference. I insist that if the gentleman wants to make the point of order, let him make it; and if not, we will pass on.

Mr. FOWLER. If the gentleman demands the regular order, I make the point of order on all of these increases.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Having made the assertion I want the gentleman to produce the law, as the burden is upon him.

Mr. FOWLER. That is not the rule. It is just the reverse; the burden rests on your shoulders and not on mine. I say the statute itself fixes the salary at $3,500 for all three of these assistant secretaries, and the gentleman from South Carolina admitted it awhile ago.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I said I was willing to admit it if you said so.

Mr. FOWLER. I say so.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOWLER. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. Does not the gentleman think the salaries provided for in this bill for assistant secretaries are not unreasonable salaries, and does the gentleman think he would be justified in making the point of order?

Mr. FOWLER. I do not want a dozen questions in one, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I demand the regular order.

Mr. FOWLER. I want to say, in reply, that I do not regard this increase as being unreasonable, but the one thing I desire to do is to call the attention of the House to the loose and unsystematic method of increasing these salaries. They ought to be classified; we ought to have fixed salaries so that political graft could never show its miserable visage in this Hall.

Mr. STAFFORD. A parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STAFFORD. May I inquire what the point of order is?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will have to ask the gentleman from Illinois to state the provision of law to which he makes the point of order.

Mr. FOWLER. On page 32, in line 16, a provision is carried in the paragraph for $5,000 for the Assistant Secretary. Farther on in that line $4,500 is carried for each of the other two assistant secretaries. The statute places the salaries of all of them on a level at $3,500 annually, and I made the point of order against this increase. On page 32, line 3, the paragraph carries a provision for $3,000 for the chief clerk. The statute provides for a salary of $2,500, and I made the point of order against the increase.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman reserve his point of order?

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from South Carolina demanded the regular order and compelled me to make the point of order, and I did so at his instance.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman reserve it for a moment?

Mr. FOWLER. I can not do it unless the gentleman from South Carolina will withdraw his peremptory order. I obeyed it.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I have not used the expression "regular order."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has demanded the regular order, and the gentleman from Illinois has made the point of order against certain provisions in the paragraph. The Chair will ask the gentleman from South Carolina if he has the statute authorizing these appropriations?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I have not.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I do not think the gentleman from South Carolina demanded the regular order.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I said to the gentleman from Illinois, who has proceeded to make unwarranted, unjustifiable, insinuating statements that are unworthy of this place, that if he objected to these items I wanted him to make the point of order; that I did not care to listen to that sort of talk.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, with reference to the point of order which I have made, I desire to say that I have called these irregularities to the attention of the House because of the fact that it is, in my opinion, imperative that somebody should do it. The gentleman who is the chairman of the subcommittee has commanded my respect, as high as any other Member of this House, and his honor and integrity command my respect as completely as that of any other Member of this House, and I deny that I have insinuated against that integrity and that honor, and if he has so taken and construed my language, I desire to take it all back, with reference to him.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Including the point of order?

Mr. FOWLER. No; Mr. Chairman, I can not withdraw the point of order. I could not preserve my self-respect as a Member of this House if I should do so. Until this House classifies the public offices in the various departments and takes them out of the reach of what might be regarded as political graft and special favor, we will not have done our full duty.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOWLER. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Political graft. Does the gentleman consider that respectful language?

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I do not apply that language to this committee; but the way in which these increases can be made opens the door through which any committee or any Member may come for special favors, which amounts, or might amount in the final analysis, to political graft.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I wanted to ask the gentleman a question. I understood the gentleman to say a moment ago, in response to a question put by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT], that he did not consider these salaries unreasonable?

Mr. FOWLER. I do not consider them unreasonable.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I demand the regular order.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Does not the gentleman think it will be better to withdraw his point of order and permit these salaries to be given to these men who fill these positions, and then if the gentleman or any other Member of the House desires to introduce a bill to classify these offices he can do so?

Mr. FOWLER. Ordinarily, I think that would be the proper course to pursue.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. But the gentleman has not introduced any bill seeking to classify these salaries.

Mr. FOWLER. It would be just as hopeless for me to introduce a bill, or any other man to introduce a bill, for that purpose as it would be to attempt to cut through the Rocky Mountains with a penknife. The various standing committees must do this work. It is their duty to do it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, let us end this little controversy. Before reading to the House the law with respect to the salaries of the Assistant Secretaries in the Department of State, I want to say this for the benefit of the committee: This committee has had many earnest appeals to increase salaries. Barring the salaries of people who receive $900 or less a year, very few increases have been made in this bill. This committee is prepared, whenever we reach the salary of any person that has been increased, to explain the reason why we made the increase. There are many salaries carried in this bill that were provided for many years ago. They have been increased in appropriation bills. We have simply appropriated for them according to the current law. In cases where we have accepted current law, we did not feel that it was our duty to go back and examine the original law creating the office and to inquire into the motives that prompted some past Congress in increasing the compensation.

With that explanation I hope the full committee will understand the attitude of the Committee on Appropriations. The office of Assistant Secretary of State was created in 1865, at a salary of $3,500. In 1866 a Second Assistant Secretary of State was provided for by law at a salary of $3,500. Fifty years have gone since these laws were passed. How long ago some preceding Congress increased the appropriation without changing the original law this committee has not inquired. If the gentleman now desires to insist upon the point of order, well and good. I will offer the proper amendment if he does so. If he does not wish to make the point of order, I hope that we may now proceed.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I have made the point of order.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman inform the House how long we have been paying salaries for the purposes carried in the bill?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I do not know; something like 20 years, a long time, ever since I have been in Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois will again state his point of order, so the Clerk may know what item is to go out of the bill.

Mr. FOWLER. On page 32, line 16, there is an appropriation of $5,000 for the First Assistant Secretary of State, and in the same line there is a provision making appropriation for $4,500 for the Second and Third Assistant Secretaries of State. The salary as provided by law is $3,500, and I make the point of order against the proposed increase. Also, page 33, line 3, a provision is found carrying an appropriation of $3,000 for a chief clerk. The law provides for a salary of $2,500, and I make the point of order against the proposed increases.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, on page 32, line 16, I move to insert "$3,500."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BARTLETT. The whole paragraph goes out, as I understand it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman did not make the point of order against the entire paragraph, but certain provisions of it.

Mr. BARTLETT. I thought the gentleman made it against the entire paragraph.

Mr. FOWLER. No; I did not.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 32, line 16, strike out "$5,000" and insert "$3,500," and strike out "$4,500" and insert "$3,500."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Page 33, line 3, insert "$2,500" after the word "direct."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 33, line 3, strike out "$3,000" and insert "$2,500."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment. I wish to amend, line 15, page 32, by striking out "$12,000" and inserting "$25,000."

Mr. FOWLER. I reserve a point of order——

Mr. FOSTER. I make the point of order——

The CHAIRMAN. When the Clerk reports the amendment the Chair will recognize some one on the point of order. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 32, line 15, strike out "$12,000" and insert "$25,000."

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word in order to ask the chairman of the committee a question. Does this paragraph carry provision for the stenographers in the State Department? Can the chairman answer the question or some one else?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. There is no law authorizing any stenographers. I do not know whether any of those clerks are stenographers. They probably are—possibly are.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. The reason I made the inquiry was I was going to suggest probably there ought to be. Evidently there is not a sufficient force down in the State Department now.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will say to the gentleman that the committee gave the department every clerk asked for.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Well, the reason I make this statement is that it is practically impossible to get any reply to a letter written to the State Department within a week or ten days or sometimes three weeks. Now, I am sure that that must be because they have not a sufficient stenographic force there.

Mr. MURDOCK. Diplomatic caution.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. If they had a sufficient force of stenographers there, I am sure letters addressed by Members of Congress would be replied to more promptly. As a matter of fact, letters now addressed to that department by a Congressman—I assume by reason of the fact they have not sufficient stenographers there to attend to such correspondence—are not replied to for a week or ten days or two weeks and sometimes three weeks, to the great inconvenience and annoyance of Members, and it occurs to me some provision ought to be made for a proper force in that department.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 32, line 15, strike out "$12,000" and insert "$6,000."

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. On what grounds does the gentleman make the point of order?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That it is a change of existing law.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I thought that came under the Holman rule.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order. [Laughter.]

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I offered an amendment a moment ago to increase the salary of the Secretary of State, and my intentions evidently were misunderstood by the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER], who made a point of order against it. Now, I was not in favor of increasing the salary of the Secretary of State upon the theory that he would not then have to go out upon the Chautauqua platform to increase his earnings, because I am not at all certain but what the best services he renders to his Government is when he stays out of the city of Washington and out of his office. I have been listening to a great many speeches about the higher the salary we pay the better service we get, and if that is true we would be fully justified in paying almost any price if we can get some one to properly fill the office of Secretary of State.

An increase of $13,000 a year would be a very small sum to pay for some one to go into the State Department that knows something about its duties and how to perform them. Again, I had another motive in introducing this amendment. It appears that the distinguished Secretary of State, in a little more than a year, has so conducted his office that he has been compelled to ask his party to repudiate its platform and break its promises to the people in order that they may purchase the influence of England to help the administration out of the trouble into which he has led it. It has been very embarrassing to a great many Democrats, who have found themselves where they must either oppose the platform on which they were elected or else oppose the President. I do not think I am violating any secrets when I say that a great many of them are in a great deal of trouble over it. I think if we could get a Secretary of State who knows how to transact the business of the State Department so as not to get his party into a place where they had to repudiate their platform or endanger their patronage, it would be a great help to our Democratic friends. I have sympathy for the gentlemen on that side of the House, most of whom are my friends. I want to see them reelected, and if we can help do this by a little addition to the salary of the Secretary of State, I think it is a patriotic duty. I hope the gentlemen on that side of the House will join me in this commendable undertaking.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] is not acting the part of the wise statesman that he usually is in offering this kind of an amendment, and he is too intelligent to think he is doing so. I would suggest to the gentleman from Washington that he has endeavored as best he could to keep Mr. Bryan out of office in the city of Washington. Now, because he is in the city of Washington he thinks he ought to be gotten out. He is never satisfied. A great many special interests in this country that Mr. Bryan has fought for a good many years are not satisfied with his course and would like to drive him out of public life, but they will fail, as they have in the past, and he will go on fighting for the people's rights. And so upon every occasion there are in this country those who have been profiting and getting their money out of the hard earnings of the people by special privileges, attempting to belittle every man, whether it is Mr. Bryan or some other, who is attempting to save to the people their rights and their rightful earnings so that every citizen may have an equal chance.

You complain about President Wilson. Why, the people of this country are with the President, and if you have not found it out yet, you better do so, because it will be necessary in the coming campaign, and you will know it when the election comes next fall.

The aspirations of the gentleman representing in part the great State of Washington should be higher than offering such amendments in this House. I am surprised at it. He is a man of good judgment, but he has brooded so long over the success of a Democratic administration and it has worried him so much that if he keeps on a little longer I do not know what may happen to him. Mr. Wilson is in office for three years, and you may just as well make up your mind to that, and I do not know what will happen to my good friend from Washington before that time rolls by. I would suggest to him that he have a little more peaceful mind, that he quiet himself as best he can, because this Democratic administration is going on to carry out the will of the people, and they are going to do what is right for the people of this country, and the distinguished Representative from Washington can not make the country believe otherwise.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I am surprised that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER], after having discussed for five minutes the alleged foolish amendment made by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY], declares that he will not discuss it.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment, and I rise for this reason: The amendment is offered, as I understand it, on the theory that the Secretary of State will in all probability in the future, as in the past, spend a large portion of the people's time on the lucrative Chautauqua circuit. I am satisfied the Secretary has no intention to do so, and therefore should have his full salary. It is true he has not told us that he does not propose to lecture. I arrive at that conclusion by a process of pure reasoning, and I have the basis for that reasoning on page 70 of the hearings on this bill. The Secretary of State appeared before the committee and called their attention to the fact that not only did the Government furnish him a carriage and a coachman, but that it had been the practice in the past to detail a man from the department as a footman to the carriage of the Secretary of State. The Secretary said he did not believe that was quite proper; that while the footman was necessary, the Government should not be required to pay that extra charge unless specifically provided for, and that he had deducted from the salary of the footman paid by the Government a sum sufficient to cover the hours during which he had been so serving the Secretary of State. He did not state exactly the sum thus saved to the Treasury, but after a careful and somewhat complex series of mathematical calculations I have arrived at the conclusion that the sum saved is about $13.37 per annum, or thereabouts. [Laughter.]

Now, my process of reasoning is this: The Secretary having made up his mind that it is not proper that this footman, messenger, or whatever he may be, shall be taken from the public service and his time devoted to private service and the Government charged with his salary during that period—having come to that conclusion, of course, he has arrived at the same conclusion with regard to himself. And had he intended to go on the Chautauqua platform the coming year, he would have suggested to the committee a reduction of his salary by the amount of the time which he estimated he would occupy in Chautauqua lectures. And, following the same line of reasoning, I am satisfied, I am convinced—I am certain, in fact—that at the close of the present fiscal year we shall be notified of a remainder, a surplus, a balance of the salary of the Secretary for the present fiscal year remaining in the Treasury, left there by him, amounting to the sum which the Secretary estimates would represent his salary for the time he has spent in making political speeches and giving paid Chautauqua lectures throughout the country. That sum which, of course, our high-minded Secretary of State will leave in the Treasury will help a little toward reducing the deficit for the present fiscal year.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the amendment and to defend, in the absence of my Democratic colleagues from Nebraska, my distinguished fellow citizen, the Secretary of State of the United States. In the first place, I want to say that this objection to the employment of a footman and a coachman is directly against——

Mr. LOBECK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Nebraska?

Mr. SLOAN. Yes; I will yield to my colleague.

Mr. LOBECK. I hope that the Chair will protect us from "our friend the enemy" in his speech. [Laughter.]

Mr. SLOAN. Well, I trust that the gentleman's hopes will be realized now. I hope the gentleman will not interfere with this large economic proposition which I desire to submit. The distinguished gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] and the equally distinguished gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL]—I make no invidious distinction—are opposed to the employment of a coachman and footman in the Department of State.

Mr. MONDELL. Far from it.

Mr. SLOAN. I think they ought to be employed. I stand on that plank of the platform with the Secretary of State, and I think he ought to reduce the great army of unemployed in this country as much as possible; and if he can do it, ever so little, by the employment of one coachman and one footman——

Mr. MONDELL. Would you put them in English livery? [Laughter.]

Mr. SLOAN. No; not until the canal tolls repeal bill passes the Senate. The work of these poor men, otherwise unemployed, would be well done.

I object to the charges made against the Secretary of State. He is the distinguished head of the great Democratic Party. The people of the United States decreed that he should be such. He is remaining such. Nebraska is at the head of the national democracy yet, and the people chose the Secretary of State when they elected Woodrow Wilson President. They knew that was to be his employment. They knew that he was to occupy that position, and I think he fills the position as well as any great Democrat could fill it. I think that the standard of statesmanship in the handling of great foreign relations is being maintained as well by the distinguished Nebraskan as it could be by any Democrat who could be found, either upon the Pacific coast or among the mountains of Wyoming. [Laughter.] The superb gentleman who hails from Nebraska and sits at the right hand of the President in the Cabinet is known throughout the world for his excellent qualities of mind, heart, voice, and democracy, and I resent on the part of my Republican colleagues any aspersions upon his fair name, reputation, ability as a statesman, or a diplomat——

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Or orator.

Mr. SLOAN. Yes; I will include that. I fear that some of these gentlemen who are also orators are jealous of the Secretary of State. [Laughter.]

I think that all that he asks for in this bill should be readily granted him. I think that he ought to have these two men and such other assistants as will enable the distinguished gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS] to receive a speedy answer to the inquiries he submits. I presume that if he visited the great Secretary of State he would be delighted to explain face to face the great questions of state, and he would tell him all about the policy of this country—the "watchful waiting" and——

Mr. MURDOCK rose.

Mr. SLOAN. Does the distinguished gentleman from Kansas desire to interrupt me?

Mr. MURDOCK. I desire to follow the gentleman, not interrupt him. [Laughter.]

Mr. SLOAN. No higher compliment could be paid me than to have the distinguished gentleman from Kansas follow me. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I rise in behalf of the Secretary of State——

Mr. MONDELL. Against whom?

Mr. MURDOCK. I am surprised at the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN] and his indorsement of a uniformed coachman and footman. [Laughter.]

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kansas yield to the gentleman from Nebraska?

Mr. MURDOCK. No.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas declines to yield.

Mr. MURDOCK. Because I am going to pay particular attention to the gentleman from Nebraska. The gentleman from Nebraska and I myself come from the same country, and in the great trans-Missouri section——

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, will not the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURDOCK. No; I will not. [Laughter.]

Mr. SLOAN. Then, why do you try to prejudice me before this House? [Laughter.]

Mr. MURDOCK. That is precisely what I am attempting to do. [Laughter.] Mr. Chairman, in that great trans-Missouri section from which the gentleman and I hail the coachmen wear no tiles and the maids no caps, and the gardener, when we snatch him from his accustomed place and bring him into the house on great occasions, is innocent of gold braid. This is true in Lincoln, in Fremont, and in Wichita, and I admire the great Secretary of State for his refusal to accept these trappings. [Laughter.] For, Mr. Chairman, this matter of regalia in a democracy is an insidious thing. Why, even a plug hat has its perils, as I submit to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER].

Mr. FOSTER. I will say to the gentleman that I have not any. [Laughter.]

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, in my service here I have seen many sad sights, but I have never seen anything that would equal in pathos a view of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] in a plug hat. [Laughter.] Every true Democrat understands the dangers to the Republic in gold braid. Washington understood it. I read last Sunday that upon one momentous occasion Washington's relatives pressed him to wear a magnificent uniform that France had sent him. He refused, and wore instead his old Continental uniform of buff and blue. A contemporaneous account of Jefferson shows the great Democrat to have been a man careless of dress, usually with a coat too small for him, with a red waistcoat, slippers down at the heel. Andrew Jackson—the great Andrew Jackson—was in a condition of pitiable sartorial collapse all the time. [Laughter.]

Now, are we drifting away from the salutary customs of the past? I read not very long ago of a most absurd uniform worn by an American ambassador in Berlin. Within four years I myself saw Ambassador Wilson, then our delegate at Mexico City, appear at the head of a row of diplomats arrayed ridiculously in evening clothes, touched off with gold buttons.

Now, I fear that this great committee is making an attempt on the democratic tastes of the Secretary of State. He does not want a footman, and he does not want this coachman in skin-tight white breeches and rosetted hat and top-boots. He is against them, as the gentleman from Kansas is, but as the gentleman from Fremont, Nebr., is not.

Mr. SLOAN. Geneva.

Mr. MURDOCK. Oh, yes; Geneva. That is right.

I find on page 24 of the bill that this great committee has attempted to foist upon the Secretary of State this sort of official diplomatic trappings. In lines 6 and 7 of page 34 there is provision for an appropriation in this language:

Equipment for drivers.

"Equipment for drivers" means livery; it means nothing else; and when that paragraph is reached, Mr. Chairman, I propose to move to strike out those words.

I know the Secretary of State. I protest for him. I know the country from which he hails and its customs. We do not believe in that sort of thing out there; and I refuse to believe that the native hue of Nebraskan simplicity in the great Secretary of State is sicklied o'er with the pale cast of diplomatic fuss and feathers. [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, during my service in this House I have never engaged in political debate. I do not feel now that it is necessary for me to defend the Secretary of State against the sarcasm and ridicule that are attempted to be heaped upon him. I hold in my hand the Book of books, opened at the story where three Hebrews refused to fall down and worship the golden image, and complaint was made to Nebuchadnezzar that these Hebrews were true to the God of their fathers and refused to bow down to the golden image that Nebuchadnezzar had set up. The king was invoked to enforce the decree that whosoever refused to fall down and worship the golden image should be cast into the fiery furnace. A furnace seven times hotter than usual was heated, and the strong men of the army were commanded to seize the Hebrews and cast them into the fiery furnace. It was so hot that those who bore Shadrack, Meshak, and Abednego to the mouth of the furnace were themselves slain by the heat; but these three Hebrews came forth, as the story reads, with their hair unsinged, and their clothes did not have the smell of fire upon them.

No man in the history of this Republic has been so abused, misrepresented, and slandered as William Jennings Bryan. You have put him in the fiery furnace of misrepresentation, hate, sarcasm, and ridicule for 16 years, and he comes forth to-day and stands in the presence of all men with his hair unsinged and not the smell of fire upon his garment. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Many of those who have attempted to carry him to the fiery furnace have fallen by the wayside; and I undertake to say now and here that long after all of his critics shall have been forgotten, William Jennings Bryan will occupy a place in American history and in the hearts of all true men. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. No; it is not necessary.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I hold no brief for the Secretary of State. I do not always agree with what he advocates. I believe he stands as one of the great men of all the world. I have never known a man who was so bitterly criticized, and criticized for so many diverse reasons. Some gentlemen are troubled when he comes to Washington, and others are distressed when he leaves the city. The truth is that the men who criticize Mr. Bryan are steeped in prejudice, and are not willing to give him credit for his undoubted mental and moral worth. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. No.

Mr. SLOAN. I move to strike out the last word. Seeing that the gentleman from South Carolina has addressed his remarks to several of us, and seeing that he has made a number of us the subject of his prophecy, I desired to ask him a question. I had heard the story that the gentleman from South Carolina relates. In fact, it was pretty well known on this the American side of the line; and I desired simply to ask him if those three young men refused to bow down to the golden image because, like the man whom the gentleman from South Carolina was extolling, Mr. Bryan, they believed in the free and unlimited coinage of silver. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I have heard the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN] who has just taken his seat, attack the administration before and attack the Secretary of State before. I heard the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN] a few days ago, while discussing the tolls question, say, while standing there in the pit, that we did not know with whom the President of the United States had consulted in regard to his recommendation touching the tolls matter, but we knew that he had consulted with the enemies of the country. And when the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN] said that, I could not help wondering whether the gentleman from Nebraska thought that perchance while the President was considering this great question he had looked at the record of the vote of two years ago, and had observed the vote cast by the gentleman from Nebraska then upon the tolls question. The gentleman has just now referred to the "American side" of the House, evidently with the intention of having us bear in mind the tolls vote; and I submit now that it lies ill with the gentleman from Nebraska, who, two years ago, with every light before him then that is before us now, saw fit to cast a vote against free tolls to now—because, forsooth, an administration to which he is opposed and a Secretary of State to whom he is opposed seem to stand as he stood then—attack their honesty of purpose in expressing their views upon the question. The idea of the gentleman from Nebraska seems to be that he can change his mind and be honest, but that the President of the United States and the Secretary of State can not change their minds without being dishonest. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. To be entirely fair, will not the gentleman from Tennessee include in the change of heart on the tolls question my friend the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] as well as the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN].

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] made an explanation and apologized for his change of view. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN] made no apology.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to say anything upon this proposition. I have not been in sympathy with a good deal of the discussion, but I can not sit in my seat and listen to the criticism from that side of the House without pointing to a record that invites ten times more criticism than came from this side of the House against the Secretary of State. Let me read the statement of the Secretary of State before the committee with regard to this matter, and then let us qustion ourselves whether the criticism that has been levied is just or unjust. On page 70 of the hearings, Mr. Bryan said:

I find a man who has been acting as coachman for 30 years or more is carried here as a messenger. I think he ought to be carried by a term that will describe him; or, if you do not want to do that, if you will permit me to detail a messenger to act as coachman, that will be satisfactory. I am using a man now as a coachman and he is being paid by the Government, and there is apparently no authority for it, and I would rather have authority for what is done.

Then, further down on the same page, in complete answer to our friend from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK], he says:

May I say, while we are on this question of expense, that when I went in there I found that it had been customary to use another messenger, when necessary, as an assistant to the driver, as a footman. You gentlemen, of course, know you can not get along with a driver alone when engaged in the matter of returning calls.

Mr. MURDOCK. Of course the gentleman wants to be fair. He is referring to the footman and the coachman. I am referring to the equipment for drivers, which means the furbelows that they wear. Of course he has a driver and a footman.

Mr. GOOD. Oh, the gentleman said in exact words that the Secretary of State did not want a coachman and a footman.

Mr. MURDOCK. He did not want them with all these foolish decorations. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. GOOD. Now, Mr. Chairman, I believe the Secretary is right. I think he ought to have a footman if he wants one. I think he ought to have a coachman. The great office of the Secretary of State ought not to be belittled as it has been to-day on both sides of the House.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Does the gentleman think that giving the Secretary of State a footman would raise the dignity of the office?

Mr. GOOD. The Secretary of State appeared before the committee and said that a great number of calls had to be made through the wife of the Secretary. She is obliged to call on a very great many people, and if gentlemen will recognize the plain request of the Secretary of State when he says that this is necessary, and he knows more about it than any member of the committee, it seems to me we ought not to quibble over the item. I think the Secretary of State ought to be allowed to go on as his predecessors have done and use these employees without question; but as long as the Secretary of State does raise the question as to his right to use these employees for purposes not specifically authorized, the changes he wants ought to be granted, and thus put a stop, once for all, to any questions in regard to it. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi). The question is first on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD].

The Clerk read as follows:

One page 33, line 15, after the word "messengers" where it first appears insert, "one of whom shall act as coachman and one of whom shall act as footman."

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against that as new legislation and not authorized by law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I do so to call attention to the statement of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT], who has made a misquotation. I did not suggest the other day that the President had advised with the enemies of the country, or that anybody had advised with the enemies of the country. I did suggest that whether or not it had been debated abroad, as we were debating it here, the discussion in favor of the bill would warrant us in concluding that the arguments were foreign—not the arguments of enemies. Why, if we understand the affirmative of that debate in its philosophy, the real friends of this country are the foreigners, for they seem to be the ones most favored. Therefore, when I speak of foreigners I do not speak of the enemies of this country; I speak of the friends who are not citizens of this country.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I will change the remark in accordance with the suggestion of the gentleman. I presume they are the same friends that were in the gentleman's mind two years ago.

Mr. SLOAN. As to what occurred two years ago, I voted exclusively on the economic proposition of levying tolls, and I do not know that any gentleman on this side ever changed his views as to the economic proposition. But we were voting the other day, not on the economic proposition, but upon our right or our lack of right to levy or not to levy tolls, or the surrender or nonsurrender of our sovereignty over the Panama Canal. [Applause on the Republican side.] When we asked to have the rule so modified that an amendment could be submitted to the effect that it would repeal and not prejudice our right or preclude us from levying tolls or relieving the coastwise ships of payment of tolls, they refused to modify the rule, and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT], who saw fit to cast strictures on me, was one of the members of the committee that brought in the rule that said you can not, you shall not, amend that repeal bill [applause], so that we could vote on the proposition in the same conditions and under the same theory that we did two years ago. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto close in two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, my friend from Nebraska may argue with all the ingenuity he can use, but the fact remains, and the people of the country understand that the fact remains, that there was nothing involved in this question a few days ago that was not involved two years ago, when the gentleman voted differently from what he did a few days ago. I do not complain of the gentleman for inconsistency; that is all right; but what I do complain of is that the gentleman, when he himself voted inconsistently, makes an attack which by insinuation carries the suggestion of dishonesty on the part of other gentlemen who have changed their belief. The issue was the same this time as it was before.

The Clerk read as follows:

Contingent expenses: For stationery, furniture, fixtures, typewriters, including exchange of the same, repairs, and material for repairs, $10,500.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. My good friend from North Carolina [Mr. PAGE] has done me the honor to call attention to the fact that I was among those who voted against the surrender that took place in this House a few days ago relative to our rights in the Panama Canal. The gentleman suggests that I have changed my mind. It has frequently been said that consistency is not the greatest virtue, but the fact is that I have not changed my mind. I have the same views with regard to the economic questions involved that I had two years ago. The gentleman from Tennessee is not at all accurate when he says that the issues presented to us the other day were the issues presented to us two years ago.

I did not believe as a matter of national policy that it was wise to fortify the Panama Canal, and I have voted many times in this House against the fortification of the canal. But I would cut off my right hand sooner than to vote to the effect that we have not the right to fortify the Panama Canal. [Applause.]

There is a great deal of difference, I will suggest to the gentleman, between the propriety of doing a thing at a given time and the declaration that you have not the right to do it. [Applause.] That is the difference. The President of the United States by his message entirely changed the issues and presented to us three concrete propositions that eliminated entirely the question of tolls.

The first was, Is Congress to change over night a settled legislative policy because the President asks us to do it, advancing no facts or arguments in support of it? Second, Have we reached a time in this country when we are to surrender our rights under all of our treaties at the demand, or even the suggestion, of some one over seas? And, third, Are we to do these things in the defense of an entirely and absolutely indefensible foreign policy? [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph close in one minute.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I understand that the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] has not changed his views. He has merely changed his vote.

The Clerk read as follows:

For books and maps and periodicals, domestic and foreign, including the payment in advance for subscriptions to the same, for the library, $2,000.

Mr. TAYLOR of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, while we are appropriating money for the expenses of the Government, I would like to suggest to the Members of the House what the farmers of this country are doing. I have here a statement filed by Mr. James D. Milner, special agent, of Jefferson County, Ark., which I will read:

The cotton crop of Jefferson County for 1913 was 60,010 bales, exclusive of linters.

Just a few people will take the time to figure the per capita value of the cotton and cotton seed produced in Jefferson County, Ark., in 1913.

The average price obtained for the season was 12 cents per pound. The average weight of bales 500 pounds. If you multiply this by the number of bales produced in the county (60,010 bales) you have the following amount	$3,600,600
Counting one-half ton seed per bale equals 30,000 tons, deduct 10,000 for planting seed, leaves 20,000, average value $20 per ton	400,000
Total value	4,000,600

The population of Jefferson County is 52,734.

Divide this sum by the value of the crop equals $75.88 per capita.

This, perhaps, is the largest per capita value ever produced in any one county of the several States of the Southwest.

JAMES D. MILNER,
Special Agent, Jefferson County, Ark.

This statement shows what the people are doing to take care of the Government. The gentleman who signed this paper is sometimes familiarly called "Colonel," though he is not a regular war colonel. Some one, I think, said the other day that we are going to have war after a while. If that war ever comes, maybe "Col." Milner will be one of the colonels in the war that is prophesied. But, gentlemen, there will never be war, I believe, so long as Woodrow Wilson is President of the United States. So long as he sits in the White House there will be in this country "peace on earth and good will to man."

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to know the significance of the term "reigns" which the gentleman from Arkansas has just used?

Mr. TAYLOR of Arkansas. You misunderstood me. So long as he is President of these United States, I said.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I do not like to cut out gentlemen who desire to talk, but hereafter I shall be obliged to object to debate covering every subject under the sun. Gentlemen who desire to speak hereafter must confine themselves to the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

For miscellaneous expenses, including the purchase, care, and subsistence of horses, to be used only for official purposes; repair and maintenance of vehicles and automobile mail wagon, including the exchange of the same, harness, equipment for drivers, street car tickets not exceeding $100, and other items not included in the foregoing, $7,000.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 34, lines 6 and 7, after the word "harness," strike out the words "equipment for drivers."

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, this is an item which carries $7,000 for the upkeep of the horses, carriages, and automobile mail wagon which are used by the Secretary of State and for street car tickets, not exceeding $100. The one item which I seek to eliminate is the one for "equipment for drivers." The Secretary of State must have vehicles, of course; and, so far as I am concerned, it is all right for him to have a coachman and a footman. It is in keeping with the dignity of his high station; but I do not think any of the hearings anywhere show that the Secretary of State has asked for the payment by the Government for liveries of this coachman and this footman.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman does not understand that that means liveries.

Mr. MURDOCK. I do not see how it can mean anything else.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Has the gentleman read what the Secretary said about that?

Mr. MURDOCK. I have not.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. He was asked what it meant and he said it referred to gloves and rubber boots, to be used in bad weather to make them comfortable, and that it would not exceed twenty-five or fifty dollars a year.

Mr. MURDOCK. I did not know that he had made such a statement as that.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. It is not the usual livery and uniform which the gentleman has in mind.

Mr. MURDOCK. It does not include that at all?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Oh, no.

Mr. MONDELL rose.

Mr. MURDOCK. Then, I will be very glad to withdraw my amendment, after the gentleman from Wyoming asks his question.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be recognized in my own right.

Mr. MURDOCK. I will leave the amendment there or withdraw it now, on the explanation given me by the chairman of the committee that this does not mean uniforms and liveries for the coachman and footman, but applies only to rubber boots and gloves. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, it is true——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman offer an amendment?

Mr. MONDELL. I rise in opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas.

The CHAIRMAN. But the Chair understands no amendment is pending.

Mr. MURDOCK. I withdrew my amendment.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman can not do that without unanimous consent.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. It is true, Mr. Chairman, that the language referred to, which the honorable Secretary of State asked to have inserted in the bill, is explained by one of the officials of his office as intended only to cover rubber boots, gloves, etc., but it would cover a uniform—of course, the gentleman understands that—a uniform for drivers. What other drivers in the Government service are equipped in the way in which proposed? And if a uniform in keeping with the recent surrender on the tolls question is contemplated, this language is opportune just at this particular time. I have in mind a pencil artist of a great American newspaper published in the city of New York who could probably give some very interesting suggestions as to the character of the uniform that might be provided and worn under this item. Whether the Union Jack would be placed on the back or front of the uniform, of course, would be entirely a question of taste [laughter], but that it should be on one side or the other is undoubtedly true. I oppose the amendment, because after what happened in the matter of our surrender of our rights with Panama I think the Secretary is entitled to have his coachman in proper uniform to fittingly express the situation.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I raise the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I am tired of the Panama Canal and outside references. If the gentleman wants to discuss the amendment, well and good; but if he desires to go outside I shall endeavor to prevent it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will confine himself to the subject under discussion.

Mr. MONDELL. I did not understand the Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The last word is "$7,000," and the gentleman will proceed in order.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, there are 7,000 different ways suggested by this lamentable surrender of American rights in Panama——

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not proceeding in order.

Mr. MONDELL. In which this particular uniform could be decorated to fittingly express the surrender which was made to Great Britain. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GOOD. What has become of the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas withdrew the amendment.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, a further parliamentary inquiry. Can the gentleman withdraw the amendment without unanimous consent being submitted to the House?

Mr. BRYAN. When the request was submitted there was no objection.

Mr. FESS. I objected.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman withdrew the amendment, and the Chair failed to put that question to the House for unanimous consent.

Mr. GOOD. I think the request for unanimous consent should be submitted to the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment to the paragraph. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the Clerk will read.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to get one little piece of information of the chairman of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. There is no amendment pending.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I desire to ask the chairman of the Subcommittee on Appropriations what is included in the term "and other items not included in the foregoing"? For what would that be spent?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Any like item to those mentioned.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Well, in other words, they could spend it for anything they pleased?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. No; it must be something like the articles enumerated.

Mr. RAGSDALE. When there are other miscellaneous expenses, would it not be regarded as part of like items and cover anything?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. No; because miscellaneous expenses as construed by the Comptroller of the Treasury has a well-defined meaning, and applies to such things as are referred to in the law carrying the appropriation.

Mr. RAGSDALE. All right, sir.

The Clerk read as follows:

For rent of buildings in the District of Columbia, $11,200.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph. Mr. Chairman, before leaving the provisions of this bill dealing with the office of the Secretary of State, I deem it my duty to say to this House that in interposing a point of order against certain appropriations for this great office, that I did not do it with any disrespect for the gentlemen who hold those subordinate positions or to the gentleman who has so ably conducted the affairs of this country during this administration as Secretary of State. It has been said that great men are admired and loved because of the character of the enemies they have made. This is true with Mr. Bryan in a large measure, but he is best loved because of his rare gifts of mind and soul and his manly courage in battling for liberty and equality of rights for all the people. I believe Mr. Bryan has done more than any other man in America in his efforts to rescue this Government from the hands of its enemies and to place it in the hands of common people. I believe he has done more to expose the abuses of free government in America than any other one man in public life to-day.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MONDELL. It has not been my practice to complain because gentlemen have not addressed themselves to the matter under discussion, but the chairman of this committee took occasion a moment ago——

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. And I rise for that purpose now.

Mr. MONDELL. My parliamentary inquiry is, whether the gentleman now addressing the Chair is discussing the matter before the House.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman makes the point of order——

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I gave notice a while ago I would be compelled to object to outside discussion——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman make the point of order?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina (continuing). And that gentlemen must confine their remarks to the amendment under consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois will proceed in order.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for three minutes in which to conclude my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] asks unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I thank the members of the committee for their courtesy. I do not desire to trespass upon your time, nor do I desire to be irregular in debate. But before leaving this paragraph I desire to offer a few observations. Mr. Bryan has been criticized unjustly by Members on the other side of the aisle, but all of their well-directed shafts have fallen harmless at his feet. Mr. Chairman, it is an honor to any man to have the friendship of the great commoner. I heard him deliver his "Crown of thorns and cross of gold" speech at the Chicago convention in 1896, which made him the nominee of the greatest political party in the world for President. His speeches during that campaign electrified the world and drew the line between government controlled by the people and government dominated by gold. Give us more Bryans and less Morgans if you would preserve our free institutions. In his hands the rights of the many are safe, regardless of criticism and temptation. He has raised the standard of politics by his able political and literary contributions. I would rather be the author of "The Prince of Peace" than to be Mr. Bryan's greatest critic. The one will live forever, the other will be thrown among the rubbish and forgotten in the rush of time. Nothing that may be said against him will ever mar the luster of his brilliant career. He stands at the top with Jefferson, Clay, Jackson, and Lincoln, and his name will go down in history as one of America's greatest men.

The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

Office of the Secretary: Secretary of the Treasury, $12,000; 3 Assistant Secretaries, at $5,000 each; clerk to the Secretary, $2,500; executive clerk, $2,400; stenographer, $1,800; 3 private secretaries, 1 to each Assistant Secretary, at $1,800 each; Government actuary, under control of the Treasury, $2,250; clerks—1 of class 4, 4 of class 3, 2 of class 2; chief messenger, $1,100; 2 assistant chief messengers, at $1,000 each; messengers—3 at $900 each, 3 at $840 each; in all, $60,670.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I want to reserve a point of order against the paragraph. I do not want to take the floor from the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RAGSDALE], who is on his feet.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I ask to have read.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I submit that the gentleman can not offer an amendment if there is a point of order pending.

Mr. RAGSDALE. There is no point of order pending.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman from Illinois reserved a point of order.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Will the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] state what his point of order is?

Mr. FOWLER. Yes. On page 34, line 13, the paragraph carries a provision for $5,000 for three Assistant Secretaries. The permanent law provides a salary of $4,500. My point of order is against the proposed increase of the salary.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I will say to the gentleman that $4,500 is the amount provided by law. I move, Mr. Chairman, to insert "$4,500" after the word "at," on page 34, line 13.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend, on line 16, by reducing the sum of $1,800 to $1,500.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 34, line 16, after the word "at," strike out "$1,800" and insert "$1,500."

Mr. RAGSDALE. Now, Mr. Chairman, to my mind the clerks in our offices are rendering just as valuable services as the clerks to the Assistant Secretaries around in these departments.

Mr. BRYAN. The $1,800, if the gentleman will permit, is the amount we gave the other day to our clerks.

Mr. RAGSDALE. I was not familiar with that. Then, I will move to withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be withdrawn and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of chief clerk and superintendent: Chief clerk, including $300 as superintendent of Treasury Building, who shall be the chief executive officer of the department and who may be designated by the Secretary of the Treasury to sign official papers and documents during the temporary absence of the Secretary and the Assistant Secretaries of the department, $4,000; assistant superintendent of Treasury Building, $2,500; clerks—1, $2,000, 4 of class 4, 1 of class 3, 2 of class 2, 2 of class 1, 1, $1,000, 1, $900; operator of photographic copying machine, $800; 2 messengers; 3 assistant messengers; messenger boy, $360; storekeeper, $1,200; telegraph operator, $1,200; telephone operator and assistant telegraph operator, $1,200; chief engineer, $1,400; 3 assistant engineers, at $1,000 each; 8 elevator conductors, at $720 each, and the use of laborers as relief elevator conductors during rush hours is authorized; 8 firemen; coal passer, $500; locksmith and electrician, $1,400; captain of the watch, $1,400; 2 lieutenants of the watch, at $900 each; 65 watchmen; foreman of laborers, $1,000; skilled laborers—2 at $840 each, 2 at $720 each; electrician, $1,200; wireman, $900; 34 laborers; 10 laborers, at $500 each; plumber, $1,100; painter, $1,100; plumber's assistant, $780; 85 charwomen; carpenters—2 at $1,000 each, 1, $720. Winder Building: Engineer, $1,000; 3 firemen; elevator conductor, $720; 4 watchmen; 3 laborers, 1 of whom, when necessary, shall assist and relieve the elevator conductor; forewoman of char force, $480; 8 charwomen. Cox Building, 1709 New York Avenue: Two watchmen-firemen, at $720 each; laborer. Old Bureau of Engraving and Printing Building: One forewoman of char force, $480; 22 charwomen; elevator conductor, $720; 3 laborers, at $500 each, 1 of whom, when necessary, shall assist and relieve the elevator conductor; 2 female laborers, at $480 each; in all, $182,760.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order against the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois reserves the point of order against the paragraph.

Mr. FOWLER. On page 35, line 3, this paragraph carries an appropriation of $4,000 for the chief clerk to the Secretary of the Treasury. The statute provides a salary of $2,200, and in addition $300 as superintendent of the Treasury Building, making a total of $2,500. My point of order is directed at the proposed increase of the salary of this office.

The CHAIRMAN. To what line on page 35?

Mr. FOWLER. Line 2.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. The salary authorized by law, Mr. Chairman, is $2,500.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained. Did the gentleman make the point of order?

Mr. FOWLER. I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I move to insert "$2,500" on line 2.

The CHAIRMAN. If the Chair understands, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] makes a point of order against the amount only.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I was wrong. The salary fixed by law is $3,000, and we pay him $300 for taking care of the building. I therefore move to amend by inserting "$3,300."

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order against the language as well as the amount?

Mr. FOWLER. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the entire item will go out. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSON] will have to amend the language as well as the amount.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I move, Mr. Chairman, to amend the paragraph so as to make the salary $3,000 as chief clerk. That is the amount authorized by law.

Mr. FOWLER. I make a point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order against the amendment is well taken. The Chair suggests to the gentleman from South Carolina that the gentleman from Illinois makes a point of order against the entire language, covering lines 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, on page 34, and line 1 and part of line 2, on page 35. The entire language goes out. The result is that the gentleman from South Carolina will have to offer the language again, with the amount authorized by law.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I move to amend, on line 21, page 34, after the words "office of chief clerk," by inserting the figures "$3,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 34, line 21, after the word "clerk," by inserting the figures "$3,000."

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I think I can relieve the situation largely if I can get the attention of the distinguished chairman of the committee. I desire only, if it will relieve the situation, to make my point of order against the proposed increase from $2,200 to $4,000. The statute provides for $2,200 as a salary, and then $300 additional.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. The gentleman looked at the wrong statute, that is all.

Mr. FOWLER. Three hundred dollars additional as the Superintendent of the Treasury Department.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman speaks of this as an increase. This salary has been paid to the Chief Clerk of the Treasury Department for many, many years. It is not increased in this bill.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be perfectly frank with the committee, and——

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It is not increased in this particular bill over what has been paid heretofore.

Mr. FOWLER. It is an increase over the statutory provision. I am not complaining of the committee for carrying this amount, but I am complaining because it is not authorized by law. On the contrary, the law fixes the salary at a different sum.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is just mistaken; that is all. I have the law in my hand. The salary of the chief clerk in the Treasury Department was fixed, beginning July 1, 1876, at $3,000 by the act of March 3, 1875. I have the law right here before me.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, the salary is fixed at $2,200 by permanent law and $300 additional as superintendent of the Treasury Building.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I have the law before me, and the gentleman has not; that is the difference.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] give the citation for his statement that it is only $2,200?

Mr. FOWLER. I have just gone through the Annotated Statutes of the United States, in 10 volumes, with an additional volume of date 1909, and if there had been any change in the salary up to that time I would have found it, and nowhere is there any provision for any salary for this office above that of $2,200 and $300 additional as superintendent of the Treasury Building that I was able to find.

Mr. STAFFORD. But the gentleman has not compared that with the annotation compiled by that painstaking annotator, the clerk of the Committee on Appropriations, who is the authority on this matter.

Mr. FOWLER. I always bow to him as a walking encyclopedia——

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Here is the law——

Mr. FOWLER. But as to the statutes denominated the "Annotated Statutes of the United States," I place them second to none.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman can be shown in a minute that he is in error by the citation that will be given to him.

Mr. FOWLER. Well, the gentleman from Wisconsin may be able to do it, but that will be something that he is not ordinarily in the habit of doing.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am not in the habit, I may say, like the gentleman from Illinois, of only reading from a manuscript.

Mr. FOWLER. Oh, the gentleman from Wisconsin is certainly a magnificent authority, but it is not upon legislation in this House. [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, we are wasting valuable time.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman from Wisconsin is an authority on matters on which he expresses an opinion different from that of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, under the act of March 3, 1875, it is provided:

That on and after July 1, 1875, the organization of the Treasury Department, and the several offices thereof, and the full salaries paid, shall be as follows: * * * Chief clerk, $3,000.

Here is the law itself.

Mr. FOWLER. That was done about the time sweeping increases in salaries were made, but the people condemned such acts and recalled many of the Congressmen who participated in such recklessness and disregard of the rights of the people.

Mr. FESS. Oh, that was before. That was in 1873.

Mr. FOWLER. It was about that time.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, this is the law, and it has not been changed since.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] has any other statute to offer, of course the Chair will be glad to have it.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I am not going to quibble on amounts, but I think I know that I am telling the truth.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course, the Chair does not know what the statute is; and the chairman of the committee in charge of the bill having read a statute which he says is the one governing the salary in this particular case, the Chair is compelled to be governed by that.

Mr. FOWLER. I have no complaint to make against the Chair.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I offer the amendment, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina offers an amendment, which the Clerk will again report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 34, line 21, after the word "clerk" insert the figures "$3,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I have another point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSON] desire to offer any other amendments?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. The gentleman from Illinois has not made any other point of order.

Mr. FOWLER. I think that has all been cured, Mr. Chairman. Now, on page 35, line 9, there is a provision of $1,400 for a laboring man, a chief engineer. The statute provides for a salary of $1,600. I am at a loss to know why the committee took away from this laboring man $200 of his legal salary, and I feel that it ought to be restored. Whether a point of order would lie or not, I am not going to contend seriously that it would; but I do say that if the committee will not offer an amendment to restore the salary, I desire to offer it myself.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. We have not reduced this man's salary. We have taken the amount as we found it in the current law.

Mr. FOWLER. The statute provides for $1,600.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The committee took it as it was estimated for and as it has been carried heretofore.

Mr. FOWLER. I understand that. I want to be perfectly fair.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina The gentleman is correct. The same statute that he complained about a moment ago is the one that fixes the salary of the engineer at $1,600. The department has not asked for any more than we have given.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, it is now 5 o'clock, and I promised some gentlemen who have now left the Hall that we would rise at 5 o'clock.

Mr. FOWLER. I want to offer an amendment, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. FOWLER. On page 35, in line 9, strike out the figures "$1,400" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$1,600."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 35, line 9, strike out the figures "$1,400" and insert "$1,600."

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, we have provided the amount carried in the current law and in the estimates.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard on the amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. If the gentleman is going to speak, I will move that the committee rise.

Mr. BRYAN. Before the committee rises I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, will the gentleman indicate along what lines he wishes to extend his remarks?

Mr. BRYAN. Just a brief extension on the subject of railroad rate reductions.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, in this hour of turmoil and struggle on the part of all the forces of the administration to lower the excessive rates charged by the railroads by water competition through the Panama Canal; when the Democratic administration is by day and by night explaining to hesitant Senators and a halting public that the only use and purpose of the canal from an economical standpoint is to reduce railroad rates; when the expensive machinery of the Interstate Commerce Commission is being oiled and put into shape to appraise all the railroads of the country in order that that commission and the public generally will have the data to put a stop to railroad peculations and railroad bankers' swindles, to the end that railroad rates may be reduced and the high cost of living lowered, it must create an unusual sensation, a peculiar and conflicting confusion of thought and action must result when it is realized that the announcement is about to be made in a quasi judicial manner that railroad rates are already too low, and that they must be immediately increased.

Mr. Chairman, is it all fake? Is it all pure superheated atmosphere with which we have been recently regaled? Every breeze that sweeps the White House green brings tidings now of rates that are too low, railroads that are starving. Is the repeal of free tolls a part of the same plan?

Note the following bulletins, one each day. Would you call that intimidation or mere suggestion? The Montessori system of treating school children.

On February 16, in the usual course of routine work, the Interstate Commerce Commission suspended the 5 per cent increase rates of trunk-line roads to September 12.

The New York Times of February 19 has the following:

In expressing surprise over the information given to him by the New York Times correspondent that there had been a flurry in the stock market over the commission's order to-day, Commissioner Harlan said that he did not understand how there could have been any concern on the part of railroads, as they were familiar with the commission's practice.

The New York Times of February 18 has the following:

EARLY RATE RULING DESIRED BY WILSON.

Following a conference at the White House to-day between President Wilson and E. E. Clark, the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission, reports were circulated that the President had asked Mr. Clark to expedite the commission's decision in the 5 per cent freight-rate advance. * * *

The President has said that he would not discuss the advanced matter while it was pending before the Interstate Commerce Commission any more than he would discuss a case pending in the courts. There has been a general belief, however, that the President would be much gratified if the commission should grant the 5 per cent advance in freight rates asked for by the 57 eastern railroads.

This belief is based on the fact that persons close to the President who have the political interests of the Wilson administration at heart are openly in sympathy with the cause of the eastern railroads. They hold that if the rate advance is granted by the commission, business conditions will be produced that will be of material help to the Democratic Party in the next presidential campaign, and even in the congressional campaigns this year.

The New York Times of February 19 has the following:

PRICES HIGHER ON HOPE OF EARLY RATE DECISION.

Practically all other considerations yielded place in the shaping of prices on the stock exchange yesterday to the reports from Washington regarding a conference between the President and the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission, at which it was said the President had urged as much expedition as possible in arriving at a decision in the advanced freight-rate case which is now before the commission. The market was swayed by this report, and a denial later that any such suggestion had been made. Prices rose, reacted sharply, and then recovered, ending the day with a moderate net gain in the general level of prices.

Most of the day's changes of exceptional scope were recorded among the advances. Wall Street received with much gratification the report that the President had used his good offices to bring about as early a decision as possible in the freight-rate case, upon which much hope for increased trade activity has been built. It was taken for granted that the most the President had done was to suggest the advisability of an early decision in this important matter, but the satisfaction with which the morning's report of the conference between the President and the chairman of the commission was received showed plainly enough that the financial community looked upon the report as carrying the inference that the decision would give some relief to the railroads.

The New York Times of February 20 has the following:

WON'T DELAY RULING ON RATE ADVANCES.

In order to correct misapprehension that has arisen from the action of the Interstate Commerce Commission in making a further suspension until September 12 of the 5 per cent advance in rates proposed by the eastern railroads, Commissioner Harlan stated to-day at a further hearing that there was no intention on the commission's part to delay its decision until the expiration of the given suspension period.

Recognizing the public importance of an early disposition of the problems before us here, the carriers, shippers, and the commission are using every effort to bring the inquiry to an early conclusion, and there is reason to think the record on the main issue in the case may be closed and the arguments had in time to enable the commission to dispose of those questions before the summer recess.

Commissioner Harlan explained that the commission had before it two broad inquiries in respect to the proposed advance.

Are the present revenues of the carriers adequate?

If not, how may they be supplemented?

"With the first of these issues the carriers have already offered much testimony," said Mr. Harlan, "but their witnesses have not been cross-examined, nor have the investigations by the commission on that question been completed. We are also advised that certain shipping interests will submit important testimony touching the adequacy of the present revenues of carriers. * * *

Wednesday's reports that the decision in the rate case was to be expedited had this much basis, that the President was in favor of as early a decision as possible, that he inclined to the view that some relief should be granted to the railroads, and, further, that the chairman of the Commerce Commission had informed the President that the decision would be rendered as soon as possible.

There also appeared in the metropolitan press a Washington dispatch that the introduction of further evidence by protesting shippers would be discouraged by the commission in order to hurry along a final decision.

WASHINGTON, March 16, 1915.

The opening argument was heard by the court to-day on the famous railroad case.

WASHINGTON, March 17, 1915.

A justice of court of railroad claims expressed surprise to-day at the fall in prices of railroad securities. Justice said that he did not understand how there could have been, as it is quite usual to have all of the testimony in before deciding the case.

WASHINGTON, March 18, 1915.

The presiding justice of the court of railroad claims was sent for by the President to-day, and they had a half-hour conference.

WASHINGTON, March 19, 1915.

Wall Street received with much gratification the report of conference between the President and the presiding judge of the court of railroad claims yesterday, as it is known from Senators near to the President that he is in favor of increased rates to the railroads.

WASHINGTON, March 20, 1915.

In order to correct misapprehension that has arisen from the action of the court of railroad claims in continuing the famous railroad case until all of the testimony has been submitted, the court is using every effort to bring the inquiry to an early conclusion.

It may be that the people of this country will be so easily worked as to permit the rates to be raised without demanding reprisals of the party that puts over the trick, but I think not. Why should the watered stock and fictitious bonds of the railroads continue to receive dividends? Why should the fortunes in this country continue to flow into the hands of the same favored few?

"Constitution of peace," the President says; but there is no peace so long as prices continue to soar skyward. Heretofore the railroads have surreptitiously and stealthily worked the people; but now they are to raise their rates by governmental decree and presidential suggestion.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Now, Mr. Chairman, I renew my motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GARNER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 15279, the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi, indefinitely, on account of dangerous illness in his family.

To Mr. NEELEY of Kansas, indefinitely, on account of important business.

To Mr. BOWDLE, for Monday and Tuesday next, on account of important business.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 8 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday, April 6, 1914, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, reports on preliminary examination and survey of Trent River from Newbern to Pollocksville, N. C., for a depth of 10 feet (H. Doc. No. 882); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, reports on preliminary examination and survey of Grays Reef Passage, off Waugoshance, in Lake Michigan, with a view to removing shoals and deepening passage (H. Doc. No. 883); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed, with illustrations.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. ROTHERMEL, from the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Commerce, submitted a report (No. 500) on the fur-seal industry in Alaska, which said report was referred to the House Calendar.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. ASHBROOK: A bill (H. R. 15373) authorizing the Secretary of War to donate to the Danville-Buckeye City public schools, of Danville, Ohio, 100 Army rifles; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 15374) authorizing the Secretary of War to deliver to Denison University, of Granville, Ohio, one condemned bronze or brass cannon; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 15375) authorizing the Secretary of War to donate to the Sons of Veterans' Camp of Coshocton, Ohio, 200 Army rifles; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. KAHN: A bill (H. R. 15376) to amend section 16 of an act entitled "An act for the organization of the militia in the District of Columbia," approved February 18, 1909; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi: Resolution (H. Res. 458) to authorize the printing of certain reports relative to the control of floods in the Mississippi River; to the Committee on Printing.

By Mr. HAY: Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 241) for the appointment of four members of the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, joint resolution (H. J. Res. 242) authorizing the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy to loan equipment for the purpose of instruction and training to sanitary organizations of the American National Red Cross; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. PARK: Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 243) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. HAY: Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 244) to authorize the President to grant leave of absence to an officer of the Corps of Engineers for the purpose of accepting an appointment under the Government of China on works of conservation and public improvement; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. AINEY: A bill (H. R. 15377) granting a pension to Olive J. Hale; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. BEALL of Texas: A bill (H. R. 15378) granting an increase of pension to Mary A. Daniel; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. BELL of California: A bill (H. R. 15379) to remove the charge of desertion from the record of Benjamin L. Gorsuch; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin: A bill (H. R. 15380) granting a pension to Joseph Gaffron; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. CAMPBELL: A bill (H. R. 15381) granting a pension to Thomas Jefferson Rothgeb; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 15383) granting an increase of pension to Edward R. Turnbach; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. DERSHEM: A bill (H. R. 15384) granting an increase of pension to David E. Shaver; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. DYER: A bill (H. R. 15385) granting a pension to Joseph E. Mitchell; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. EVANS: A bill (H. R. 15386) for the relief of Charles A. Spotts; to the Committee on Public Lands.

By Mr. HULINGS: A bill (H. R. 15387) for the relief of Samuel C. Koonce; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. KENNEDY of Connecticut: A bill (H. R. 15388) granting an increase of pension to Daniel Lynch; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 15389) granting an increase of pension to Mary E. McChistock; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. LEWIS of Maryland: A bill (H. R. 15390) granting an increase of pension to John W. Lynch; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 15391) granting an increase of pension to Mary Jane Madary; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. J. I. NOLAN: A bill (H. R. 15392) for the relief of James Ross; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. RUSSELL: A bill (H. R. 15393) granting an increase of pension to Thomas B. Forbs; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. SHERWOOD: A bill (H. R. 15394) granting an increase of pension to Ernest H. Peterson; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. STEPHENS of Texas: A bill (H. R. 15395) granting an increase of pension to Sarah Guttry; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. WOODRUFF: A bill (H. R. 15396) granting a pension to Lewis M. Benaway; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By Mr. ASHBROOK: Resolutions of Local Union No. 2459, of the United Mine Workers, protesting against the injustices in the Colorado mines; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, petition of over 200 master plumbers of Mansfield, Ohio, and vicinity, in favor of House bill 14288; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Also, resolutions of Local Union No. 978 of the United Mine Workers of Tuscarawas County, Ohio, protesting against the injustices in the Colorado mines; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. BAILEY (by request): Petitions of various voters of Altoona, Pa., favoring national prohibition; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also (by request), petitions of sundry citizens of Patton, Pa., protesting against the repeal of the canal-tolls exemption; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. BATHRICK: Petition of Ivan Stokice, of Summit County, Ohio, protesting against national prohibition; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, petition of sundry citizens of the nineteenth Ohio congressional district, favoring national prohibition; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. BROWNING: Petitions of sundry citizens of the State of New Jersey, favoring national prohibition; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. BRUMBAUGH: Petition of sundry citizens of Columbus, Ohio, against national prohibition; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin: Petition signed by various voters of the city of Port Washington, Wis., protesting against the passage of House joint resolution 168, Senate joint resolutions 50 and 88, and against all other similar prohibition measures; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, petitions signed by various merchants of Lodi, West Bend, Arlington, Plymouth, Port Washington, Beaver Dam, Hartford, Fox Lake, and Randolph, all of the second congressional district of Wisconsin, asking for the passage of a bill (H. R. 5308) to compel concerns selling goods direct to consumers entirely by mail to contribute their portion of funds in the development of the local community; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. CLINE: Petition of sundry citizens of St. Joe, Ind., favoring passage of the Bathrick bill (H. R. 11897) farm-credits bill; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.
